Another outbreak of boyish spite against the civil-service law has taken place in the House. In the committee of the whole, where the roll is not called Mr. Grosvenor, doubtless smarting under the recollection of the poor figure he has cut, made the point of order that no appropriation could be made for additional clerks for the civil service commission because it would change existing law. This would cut the commission down to what the original civil service law of 1883 gave them, that is, a secretary, a stenographer and a messenger. Payson of Illinois, being in the chair, sustained the point, and on appeal the decision was sustained by 109 to 36. This action was meant to cripple the commission, and if not reversed would effectually do so. A three hours' debate followed, in which Grosvenor and Cannon let out all their pent up malice. Against them were Butterworth, Greenhalge, Dockery, Boatner, Lodge, McComas and others. One of Grosvenor's statements will make New England smile. This was that the republicans have "carried the banner of civil service reform to the extent" that they have driven John F. Andrew, Sherman Hoar, George Fred Williams, and other young men of distinguished New England families, out of the party "because among other reasons they are excluded from all participation in the government." The debate covers twenty-four pages of the Record of February 14, and in our limited space it seems that an extract from the speech of Mr. Lodge is, on the whole, the most satisfactory:

"Now, I have listened to my friend from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor] with a great deal of attention. I was anxious to find out exactly what the matter was; and also what system he proposed to substitute for the existing system. I think I have found out what the matter is. The present commission, we are told, is too aggressive. It has been a familiar sport in this house to make these speeches in regard to civil service reform, and to assail the commission; but it has never been part of the game to have the commission or any one of the commissioners answer back and make defense against these assaults.

One of the present commissioners did that when he was attacked here. I think he was very sensible to do it; but it was inconsiderate of the feelings of the gentlemen engaged in the annual practice of assailing civil service reform. He was not put there, according to the idea of the gentlemen who attacked him, to resent attack. He was put there simply to be made a text for speeches in regard to the "humbug of civil service reform," and to receive attacks in silence. * * *

Now, I will just quote from the printed Record to show some of the difficulties which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor] has found in the civil service. He stated in his speech last year—

I will vote not only to strike out this appropriation, but I will vote to repeal the whole law.

He then went before the committee; and in his testimony of August 23, 1890, page 97, he said:

I do not want to repeal the civil service law; and I never said so.

[Laughter.]

In his testimony at the same time he said:

Rufus P. Putnam, fraudulently credited to Washington county, Ohio, never lived in Washington county, Ohio, nor in my congressional district; nor in Ohio, so far as I know.

Then an inconsiderate person goes to work and digs up out of the files of Commissioner Morgan's office a letter from the gentleman from Ohio, dated February 5, 1890, which says:

Mr. Rufus P. Putnam is a legal resident of my district, and has relatives living there now.

The gentleman from Ohio in his speech said:

I have not been informed of one applicant who has found a place in the classified service from my district.

And in his testimony on August 23, found on page 98 of the report, he says:

That the eight men [whose names were furnished him as being appointed from his district] all live in my district as now constituted.

So, I say the gentleman from Ohio was disturbed by the aggressions of the civil service commission.

He says he has only seen one of them, and has not seen him frequently. But on one occasion, at least, it was by his own invitation, for he wrote to Mr. Roosevelt the following letter. He said:

I have for some weeks sought an opportunity to appear before the committee to refer briefly to a statement made by you in which you impugned the character of the statement made by me in the house of representatives in regard to the administration of the civil service law. I respectfully request that you will be present.

In accordance with that request, Mr. Roosevelt was present. They had a discussion which went on for a little while and then Mr. Grosvenor said, as appears from the record of the testimony:

A congressman making a speech on the floor of the house of representatives is perhaps in a little different position from a witness testifying under examination.

[Laughter.]

There I had the right to give my judgment about this matter under the constitution of the United States and not have it called in question for that reason. * * *

I must go up to the house now.

[Laughter.]

And, Mr. Chairman, he went up to the house and left Mr. Roosevelt, and was not pleased with the interview, as he said there. But he returned to the committee after Mr. Roosevelt had gone to North Dakota, and was two thousand miles away, and then said:

My statement in the house of representatives has been shamefully and criminally misrepresented by Mr. Roosevelt, who says I said there had been no clerical appointments in my district. I never said any such thing, and he knew it.

Here is what Mr. Roosevelt did say:

General Grosvenor says he does not know of one applicant who has found a place in the classified service from his congressional district.

And here is what the gentleman from Ohio actually said in the House:

[Mr. Grosvenor's speech April 22—Record, 3897.]

I have not been informed of one (applicant) who has found a place in the classified service from my congressional district. * * * So far as I know not one clerical position has been assigned to my congressional district."

When Mr. Lodge had concluded, Cannon let Grosvenor have five minutes of his time, but the latter's remarks are not printed and are withheld for revision. Very likely they needed it. As Grosvenor sat by and saw Mr. Lodge strew by the way the Grosvenor malice, the Grosvenor cowardice, the Grosvenor hypocrisy, the Grosvenor mendacity, and all the other unhappy qualities which make up the Grosvenor character, Grosvenor himself must have passed into a state of ungovernable incoherency and probably his ravings would not look well in print. At the end of the debate, Mr. Dingley, of Maine, offered an amendment that the commission be given an additional sum of $36,400, to carry out the law. No point of order would lie to this, and after the chair had twice declared it lost, tellers were appointed and the amendment was adopted by 95 to 76. This gives the commission some $1,500 more than it asked.

Mr. George William Curtis will address the state superintendents of common schools in Philadelphia the last week in February, on the public school and civil service reform.

The Civil Service Reformer in its January and February numbers prints some specimen applications for office from people whose unfitness caused them to fail in the examinations. They are worth examining.

Several cases have been reported where the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is not regularly received at colleges and libraries. It will be a favor if every case is at once made known; also, the CHRONICLE repeats its request of last month that such libraries as have not already done so will acknowledge the donation of the paper and state if it is placed on file.

If there is any reader of the CHRONICLE who does not read the other two civil service reform papers, let him send for the Civil Service Reformer for February, and have the pleasure of seeing Census Superintendent Porter thoroughly routed by Mr. Roosevelt before the civil service committee of the house of representatives, January 29, 1891.

The Civil Service Record prints in its February issue an editorial based on the recent speech of Congressman Roswell P. Flower, a democrat from New York. Mr. Flower's congressional experience makes him an authority, and the viciousness of the present system of making about 60,000 post-offices a part of a great political machine has never been more completely exposed. There is space but for a single quotation:

The present system has too much that attribute of monarchy which centers in the power of one man the appointment of thousands, which makes official position the reward for partisan intrigue, engenders a lack of responsibility on the part of public officials, and consumes too much of the time of executive and legislative officers in securing appointments which should be given to the consideration of affairs of state.

But there are two results which arise from our system which seem more deplorable than those I have already enumerated. These have only to be stated to be conceded. The present system of federal appointments exercises an undue influence on elections, and tends to subvert and render impossible the true expressions of the will of the people as expressed in those elections. This system has already murdered one President. Is there a member of the house who does not feel in his congressional district the influence of the post-office, the custom-house, or the internal revenue bureau?

The seventh report of the Massachusetts Civil Service Commission has been printed. It is not too much to say that nowhere else has the law been uniformly administered with such good faith and intelligence, and the yearly reports are indispensable to any one who desires to know how the merit system really works.

The report states:

"The number of public employes in the first division of the classified service is about 4,700. Of the public offices in the first division, 2,133 have been appointed under civil service rules since 1885; and, with the lapse of time, the proportion steadily increases. Of these appointments, only a very small fraction of one per cent. has been removed for cause.

"In the labor service of Boston 152 requisitions were received during the year, and 2,029 men were certified, of whom 1,550 were required to be under fifty years of age. This shows the increasing tendency of the departments to call for the strongest and most able-bodied men. Of those certified, 874 were employed, of whom 90 were veterans. The number of certifications compared with the number employed was owing to the declination of some to accept employment, especially upon Basin V in Ashland. The comparatively small number of veterans employed was owing to the age limit fixed in the requisitions. Of the men employed under certification, only one-half of one percent. were discharged for cause. There have been 2,360 men registered, including restorations to the list during the year. The total number at present on the department rolls in this office is 3,466."

The Pennsylvania Civil Service Reform Association has introduced a civil service reform bill into both houses of the state legislature. This bill, like the Massachusetts law, brings the service of the cities and of the state under the control of one commission. It also, like the Massachusetts law, seems to include laborers.

We notice that the law is to apply only to "such office of employment" where the number of "officers, clerks, or employes amounts to six or more." In the twenty-five cities of Massachusetts there are several offices where the law is applied with the best results, and with very little trouble or expense where there are in each only one, two, three, or more employes. Taken altogether, the total number is quite large. Indeed, in an ordinary-sized city, where there is considerable subdivision of the city work into different departments, there may not be a single department besides the police and fire department, which has as many as six clerks in one office. The object of this limitation seems to be to save a large number of small examinations; but in actual practice this difficulty is found to be rather imaginary than real.—Civil Service Record, February, 1891.

To the President of the United States:

SIR—The undersigned, the officers of the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association, beg leave, in the name of the association, respectfully to request you to extend the limits of the classified civil service so as to include all persons employed in custom-houses and post-offices where there number is not less than twenty-five (as recommended in the sixth report of the civil service commission) and also the clerical force at navy yards and arsenals.

Further, the undersigned believing that the recent troubles with the Indians afford convincing evidence that a change in the manner of appointment of the officials of the Indian bureau is imperatively demanded, respectfully urge that the civil service rules may be extended, with proper modifications, to include all officers employed under this bureau.

They desire, finally, to urge that the rules be extended, with due regard to the interest of the public, to all departments of the civil service.

Vice-Presidents—Charles W. Eliot, Chauncey Smith, James Russell Lowell, Charles Theodore Russell.

Executive Committee—Philip Stanley Abbot, James Barr Ames, William F. Bradbury, Josiah M. Brooks, Sanford H. Dudley, Edward H. Hall, William O. Henshaw, William R. Howland, Francis V. B. Kern, George V. Leverett, James J. Myers, Albert S. Parsons, Ezra R. Thayer, Joseph G. Thorp, Jr., Robert N. Toppan, William W. Vanghan, George G. Wright, Charles F. Wyman, Morrill Wyman, Jr., Sec'y.

CHARLES ELIOT NORTON, President.
Cambridge, Mass., 31st January, 1891.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, }
February 4, 1891. }

Gentlemen: I have received by the hands of Senator Hoar the communication addressed to me by you as officers of the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association, and in reply beg to say that your suggestions will have my respectful attention.

Your reference to the recent outbreak among the Sioux as affording convincing evidence of the necessity of a change in the manner of appointing the officials of the Indian bureau, leads me to say that I have not found in a very full examination of all the facts from all sources evidence of any deterioration in the Indian service. On the other hand, the board of Indian commissioners, through Merrill E. Gates, their chairman, have as the result of close observation declared to me under date of January 10th last, "that upon the whole the Indian service is now in better condition than ever before." The object of their communication was to urge the extension of civil service rules to the Indian service, but they were careful to recognize that the argument was not to be found in any special or recent incidents, but in the broader fact that the work among the Indians is educational and philanthropic and should, therefore, be separated from party politics.

I may add that before any special appeal had been made to me from any source, the subject of including Indian agency clerks and employes in the classified service had been under consideration.

Very respectfully yours,

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

To CHARLES ELIOT NORTON, Esq., and others,
Cambridge, Mass.

LOCAL FREEBOOTING.

The rise and fall of the democratic gang of which Simeon Coy was for years the leader forms an interesting chapter in the history of Marion county. The beginning of the end came when the tally-sheets were forged two years ago last November, and the departure of John E. Sullivan for Canada marked the final downfall of the corruptionists. The formation of this corrupt gang of democratic politicians dates back several years, when Sim Coy gathered around him a few unscrupulous men, some of them possessed of means, who were anxious to be able to control the elections in this county. In a measure successful in managing campaigns, the little gang began to grow, and its corrupt influences began to permeate the entire democratic part of the county. Emboldened by their success in carrying elections by corrupt methods, the leaders of the gang in 1886 decided to take a step far in advance of any they had before dared take—to change the tally-sheets so as to elect a criminal judge and a coroner, and officers who the face of the returns showed had been elected by the republicans. It is needless to repeat the story of that infamous crime. It is familiar to the people, not only of Indiana, but of other states. How many men were connected, directly and remotely, with that conspiracy will, perhaps, never be known, but there was evidence brought out in court that a great many were in some manner connected with it. All the evidence showed that John E. Sullivan was one of the prominent figures in the conspiracy, but the influence which he and other members of the gang wielded prevented the courts from ever convicting him.

The story of how justice struggled to get a hold upon the ring-leaders in the conspiracy is interesting at this time. The effort was made first to secure indictment by the county grand jury, but after three months of failures it was decided to call upon the United States grand jury, through which partial justice at least was finally meted out. The refusal of the county grand jury, in the face of positive evidence, to return indictments against the forgers, was condemned by every honest man in the state. That refusal showed the power and influences Sullivan and the members of the gang exerted. Sullivan, as clerk, controlled the drawing of the grand jury, and he succeeded in securing a jury composed entirely of democrats. The jury was of his own selection, and was drawn with special reference to preventing any indictments being returned. It is somewhat remarkable that among the members of that jury who turned a deaf ear to the public's demand, and refused to indict Sullivan or any of the forgers, were J. B. Conaty and James Renihan, two of Sullivan's official bondsmen, and the principal losers by the clerk's dishonesty. These men were on Sullivan's bond at the time they were serving the county as grand jurors, sworn to do their duty, and when that is recalled it goes a long way toward explaining why that grand jury constantly ignored Judge Irvin's instructions in regard to the tally-sheet forgeries. "Can it be retribution these men are now receiving?" queried a gentleman yesterday who recalled the facts. "I suspect these gentlemen feel that it is," continued he. "I judge they now wish they had followed the oft-repeated instructions of Judge Irvin, and indicted all the tally-sheet forgers. How much better off they would be if they had done their duty?" With the conviction of Coy and Bernhamer and their removal to the penitentiary, the gang began to disintegrate. Sullivan still attempted to use its waning power to his advantage, but there could be no concert of action like when the little boss was here. With the departure of Sullivan it is to be hoped that the county has witnessed the last of the acts of the gang. In his departure Sullivan has involved and turned against him those who kept him from going behind the prison bars two years ago, and it seems impossible that the remnants of the gang can again be able to muster their forces.—Indianapolis Journal.

That noble patriot, Simeon Coy, who was pardoned out of the state's prison because, foresooth, he was too poor to pay the fine and costs assessed against him, has evidently struck it rich somewhere or somehow. He seems to have plenty of money that he is spending freely as he plays his great role as a public benefactor. It is well to remember that a councilman's salary is $150 a year.

Simeon, it will be remembered, has been playing street commissioner down in ward eighteen. He proposes to have fine streets, and for twelve days has had three teams and a man at work. He has already placed three car loads of cracked stone on Delaware, Alabama, New Jersey and South streets. Saturday he placed fifteen loads of gravel on the streets, and thus far this week he has placed twelve loads, making twenty-seven loads of gravel spread on the streets. One of the teams belongs to Lee Fulmer and two to Mr. Myers.

Emanuel Green, an old colored man, was poking cracked stone about South street this morning when a News reporter happened along. "The city is doing a good deal of work here?" suggested the reporter.

"The city ain't doing this. Mr. Coy is having the work done," was the answer.

"But the city pays for it?"

"No, indeed. Mr. Coy pays for it all. He hires the teams, pays for the gravel, bought the stone and he pays me. I know when he paid me Saturday he gave me half a dollar more than was coming to me, and he had a great big roll of money, for I saw it."

"How much will this work cost, do you suppose?"

"There's a man down there says it will cost Mr. Coy a $1,000, but that ain't so. The three teams and me cost about $10 a day. We have been at work about twelve days, and there is lots to do yet."

For a man who was pardoned because he wasn't able to pay his fine, Statesman Coy is under very large expense. The three car-loads of stone will cost about $35. The gravel will cost sixty cents per load, or $16.20. It will require at least twenty-five days to "fix things" as Simeon wants them "fixed." That is $250, making a total of $301.20. The pay of a councilman is $150 a year. Thus Mr. Coy is spending more than two years' salary on the public streets. This is only one "budget" of campaign expenses. This is an investment. What is the return!

The stone used on the streets by Coy is broken at the work-house, and Emanuel Green said Mr. Coy had purchased the stone at the works. Colonel Boone, superintendent of the work-house, says Coy bought no stone out there; that it is all shipped to the street commissioner. Mr. De Ruiter says that he has sold no stone to Coy, and that Coy is getting neither stone nor any help whatever from the city. Green says that one day the city wagon and Coy's wagons were being loaded from the same ear, and that Coy objected because there was no more stone than he needed himself.

If Coy could not pay his fine and costs because he was too poor, how does it happen that he can pay $10 per day to improve the public streets of his ward and carry around a big roll of money? Who is backing him and furnishing this money? What return will he make for it?—Indianapolis News, September, 1889.

Street Commissioner De Facto Sim Coy was holding down a chair in the court-house and resting a pair of prominent feet on a table this morning, when a News reporter accosted him: "Do you propose to pay for that stone you hauled away from the city yards?"

"Pay for it?" retorted the statesman from ward eighteenth. "Well, I guess I won't. I put that stone on the streets for the benefit of the tax payers, and I don't propose to pay for it out of my own pocket by a jug full. I will settle with them fellows in open council."

"How do you propose to settle with them?"

"Well, you will see how. I have had some experience in street making, and I know if I had had the $42,000 that the street commissioner claims to have spent this year I could have had every street in Indianapolis in first-class condition."

Here's a state of things! When Coy's little scheme was discovered he claimed to be paying for everything and flashed up plenty of money to do it with. Now he declares the stone belonged to the city, he used it and won't pay for it. He says he "don't think De Ruiter knew he intended taking the stone," and the street commissioner has demanded pay for the material used.

"You fellows talk about twenty-seven loads of sand and gravel," said Coy, waving a chubby hand in the air, "why, twenty-seven loads ain't a patching to what I used. You couldn't get all the gravel in this room that I put on the streets."

"And that belonged to the city, too?"

"Why, of course it did."

The room to which Coy referred was the sheriff's office, which is large enough to hold a hundred and fifty loads of gravel, and still the street commissioner did not know that Coy was carting this stuff away! Indianapolis News, September, 1889.

Street Commissioner DeRuiter was interviewed by a Journal reporter yesterday, concerning Sim Coy's alleged appropriation of city property for the purpose of strengthening his councilmanic canvass in the eighteenth ward. "I heard Monday afternoon," said the street commissioner, "that Coy had taken a car-load of stone belonging to the city, which had been broken at the work house, and set out on the tracks to be hauled down to the yard. I immediately started to find Coy, went to his town residence, to Joe Wagner's and other places, without finding him, and finally drove out to his road house east of the city. He was not there, but I left word that I wanted to see him, and this morning he came to my office. I told him what I had heard, and he said it was true, that he had taken the car load of stone, and that he proposed to take any of the city's property that he chose that was lying around loose.

told him I did not think he would, and suggested to him that if he kept on he would get himself into serious trouble, and after some further talk, in which we both got pretty thoroughly heated, he went out."

"How did he happen to get the car-load of stone referred to?"

"He took it as any one else would have taken it without authority. The car was set out on the switch, and was, I suppose, in the possession of the railroad people. We were notified of the presence there of two other car-loads of stone, which we got, but had no notice whatever that this one was there, and of course did not send after it. I have notified Superintendent Boone not to deliver any more stone at the railroad without notifying me."

"What do you propose to do about the city material already taken by Coy?"

"I propose to be guided by the advice of the city attorney. In any event, I will ask that Coy be indicted by the next grand jury, and if there is any way of bringing him up sooner, I will take advantage of it. I do not consider that he has any more right to carry off property belonging to the city than you have. As for the stories that he did it with my consent, express or implied, they are simply lies. Setting apart my republicanism, and my desire on that account to see Coy beaten in his race for council, I would be a fool to help elect a man whose earliest vote would be cast for my removal."—Indianapolis Journal, September 2, 1889.

"We have been examining the street commissioner's pay-rolls and find on every one of them the name of H. S. Post, who is Mr. De Ruiter's father-in-law. He is credited with $2 a day for himself and a one-horse wagon. According to the pay-roll, Mr. Post has not been idle a day; at least he has been receiving his $2 per day right along. On the night of the first Saturday after January 1, Mr. Post went to Cincinnati, and was there for ten days. During the time he has been back he has been idle a number of days, yet he is accredited on his son-in-law's pay-roll with working all the time.

"There are two one-horse wagons employed by the street commissioner. One of these wagons has been standing in the city yard until the tires on the wheels are thick with rust, and it is apparent to any one that the wagon has not been used for a long time; yet the city has been paying for it just the same. Mr. De Ruiter told me that one horse and wagon is owned by George Yanthes, a colored man, and the other horse and wagon by Mr. Post, his father-in-law. The records in the assessor's office show that Yanthes pays a poll-tax and is the owner of a $3 watch. According to the books, he owns no horse and wagon. I sent a man to him under pretense of buying a horse. Yanthes said he owned no horse or wagon. Mr. Post's name does not appear on the assessor's books at all, and he does not even pay a poll-tax."—Indianapolis News, February 26, 1890, Interview with Councilman Martin Murphy.

The suburbs of Indianapolis are a unit in seeking legislation that will enable them to build street-car lines into the city. Senate bill 179 is the embodiment of their request. It has passed the senate and is reposing in the hands of the judiciary committee. The suburbs see great prosperity ahead if they are not walled out. At present they can not construct lines to the city because the Citizens' Company will not permit them to enter with tracks after they have brought them to the corporation limit. What they demand as reasonable is that if the Citizens' Company jumps in ahead and pre-empt a street to prevent suburban companies from entering, the suburban lines by paying a fair rental may use the Citizens' tracks, or that the suburban companies, in a word, be enabled to deliver passengers into the city. The Citizens' Company will not build to Greenwood nor Broad Ripple. Its West Indianapolis, Irvington and Brightwood lines are, without an exception, wholly unsatisfactory. Greenwood has $130,000 subscribed for a suburban line; Broad Ripple has a company signed to put down a rapid transit line so soon as this legislation is enacted. Shall the two towns be shut out of Indianapolis? This is virtually the question they ask.

Meantime the Citizens' Company is fighting the bill with tremendous vigor. Lobbyists of every degree, from Sim Coy up to ex-state officers and congressmen, are lobbying for the company. Sim has taken up a temporary office in the state house, and is often in consultation with Steele and other representatives of the company.—Indianapolis News, February 17, 1891.

Mr. Coy has still another year of service in the Indianapolis City Council, and will therefore not sever his connections with Hoosier politics entirely until he has done all the good that can possibly be accomplished at the Indiana capital. Thus far his stays in this city have been brief. After the adjournment of the Indiana Legislature, which will occur in about a month, he says he will be here "right along." He will then be ready to introduce to the attention of the Chicago political fine-workers that peculiar brand of politics that made his name famous at home, and which is produced in no other state in the Union.

"I carried Indianapolis for Cleveland, Gray and the rest of the ticket in 1884," he modestly suggested, "and it was the first time we ever showed our full strength. Until that time the republicans had defeated us because of their superior party organization. The eighteenth ward was always republican by more than two hundred, but I have made it democratic by nearly that figure. I reckon there are democrats there now who would vote for me for President if I should ask it."

"To what do you ascribe your wonderful political success?" Mr. Coy was asked, and he outlined the following code: "I never had a quarrel with a man in my life. I never lost my temper in my life. Life is too short to dispute with those who dispute with you. I haven't the time. Then, again, I don't stand on the street corner and proclaim my policy. Secret organization is the only road to political success. The day for brass-band campaigns is past. We have the Australian voting system in Indiana, minus, of course, the registration clause. The registration clause would have defeated us, and it will defeat the democrats in Illinois. Laboring men can't take the time to go and register. At the last election in Chicago I find that only four votes were registered from this house. That shows lack of organization. There should have been twenty-five, at least.

"I am not ready to say what I will or will not do in Chicago," said he, "nor do I care to be quoted as criticising your politics. The great trouble with politicians that I have found is that it isn't one in a hundred who knows politics when he sees it. Down in Indiana we have the advantage of a political education not to be obtained anywhere outside of that state. This is because it has always been a hand-to-hand fight. First one party was on top, then the other. We are familiar with every subterfuge known to modern politics. We take a back seat for nobody"—Chicago News, February 9, 1891.

Some days ago the News mentioned the fact that the South Side Foundry Company had a bill of $50 against the city for supplies furnished. Councilman Markey is a large stockholder in that concern; in fact, "Markey's foundry" is a common name for the establishment.

A glance over the city books reveals the fact that the foundry has been selling considerable amounts of goods to the city, and Councilman Markey has been voting to allow the payment of the bills from the city treasury. On May 24 and 28 his foundry sold the city $19.20 worth of castings; May 21, $9.60; on April 25, $3.15. The bills, however, are not made out in Thomas Markey's name, but in the name of Peter Zeirn, treasurer of the South Side Foundry Company.

The records show also that on May 30 Councilman William Long sold the city three yards of gravel for $1.80.—Indianapolis News, Aug. 3, 1889.

Hospital Trustee Markey has gnawed off more of a political cud than he can masticate. He has tried to keep his grip on all that he has held to and embrace new fields. He is like many another politician who "did well from a precinct, but was too thin to spread over a state." The two or three scores of democrats down in Markey's ward who are said to have been encouraged to hope for appointments at the hospital, spend their time in devising means to defeat Markey for re-election to council. "We got him the place as trustee in the hope that he would give up the council and give us help at the asylum," said one of them, "out he wants to hold both places. He wants to get his father into the capitol as deputy custodian—and, by the way, this is the same person whom Markey, a democrat, had councilman Pearson, a republican, retain two years as janitor at Tomlinson Hall. Some of us were promised the place of watchmen at the hospital, but Markey appointed Mike Kelley (who is clever with a pen, which Markey isn't), and has him do duty as assistant secretary of the hospital board."—Indianapolis News.

Dr. Thomas H. Harrisou, late president of the state benevolent boards, has issued a pamphlet in defense of the management of the insane hospital under his administration. The statements it contains are those that have long ago been urged by the ex-trustees and the democratic party, and are based altogether upon the claim that the Harrison trustees have been vindicated by an examination of the books of the institution by their successors. In the beginning of his defense the doctor states: "The hospital was not governed by civil service. It was absolutely a partisan management, as was evidenced by the fact that Wayne township, in which the hospital is located, was changed from a republican majority to nearly 400 Democratic within a period of six years."—Indianapolis Journal, June, 1889.

The publication in the News last evening of the business dealings between Phil Gapen, treasurer of the insane hospital board, and John E. Sullivan, embezzler, forger, fugitive from justice, and high muck-a-muck of the corruptest gang that ever ruled in Marion county, has caused the people to be more clamorous than ever to have the books opened.

The money loaned to Sullivan was state funds, and if Sullivan has paid it back dollar for dollar he has been "guilty" of something that his most intimate friend has never accused him with. Complaint is made, too, that firms having claims against the hospital for supplies furnished have had to wait from month to month for their pay, and there are some claims of ancient date still unpaid. Governor Hovey believes that no investigation can properly be made by the general assembly, but the work must be done by experts, and the governor might have added, by experts who would not be "influenced."

The report of the trustees for the year ending October 31, 1888, shows that food, fruit and ice cost $110,000; coal, $25,619.93; wood, $1,682; sweet milk, $5,724.70; butter, $2,185, making the milk and butter cost $8,009.70. Last year potatoes cost $10,000. The total expenditure for 1888 amounts to the modest sum of $260,000. These figures alone should urge every honest man with a desire to see the inside of "them" books.

State Treasurer Lemcke says that at different times he has loaned Sullivan small sums of money, but always had it well secured and got it back within a few days. Sullivan, he says, was a most persistent beggar, but he had been warned against the late county clerk and at last shut down on the beggar, and he didn't get his sticky fingers into the state vaults.

Since December, 1883, up to date, Gapen has drawn from the state treasurer, as treasurer of the hospital board, the immense sum of $1,477,268.82. If Sullivan borrowed nearly $14,000 in so short a time as four months, how much did he borrow from this immense fund in so many years?

It is not much of a wonder that Gapen and his friends do not appear to want the books opened, at least they are not making any frantic efforts to have the backs of the books torn off in order to get them open.

These figures show the amount of checks placed in the Meridian National bank by Gapen, from August 21 to January 23, inclusive. Each of the checks was signed by John E. Sullivan, made payable to the order of Philip M. Gapen. They were on Sullivan's New York bank, and Gapen asked that they be placed to his credit on his account, as treasurer of the hospital board.

August 21.....	$1,000
August 31.....	250
September 18.....	1,000
September 29.....	300
December 18.....	2,000
December 18.....	1,000
December 20.....	800
December 21.....	700
January 21.....	4,700
January 23.....	2,000

Total.....$13,750

Thus, in the very short time of about three months John E. Sullivan had, by permission of Phillip M. Gopen, his clutches on $13,750 of the state's funds, and Sullivan's fingers are sticky ones. The News showed yesterday that unless Gopen can hold the bank responsible for $3,043.66, that he has lost that much of the state's money by lending it to Sullivan. Wonder what is in "them" books that is being guarded so zealously?—Indianapolis News, 1889.

West Market Master Wells is still languishing behind iron bars. He can not be liberated on bail until the grand jury meets next Monday. Now that he is in jail, all the little and big tin horns are beginning to say, "I told you so." They accuse him of all sorts of misconduct, and blame Councilman "Bill" Davis in having him appointed. Davis and Wells were old cronies. One of Derk De Ruiter's deputies claims that there was a big kick when Wells was appointed, as he was known to be the proprietor of a low den and "oontz" headquarters. The murder of George Thomas was the result of a fight in Wells's dive. It was the duty of the city clerk to see that Wells turned in the money when he made the affidavit before him. Last Saturday night Wells took a 'possum in payment of stall rent. Does the 'possum belong to the city?—Indianapolis News, 1890.

Noah Rounds, who drives one of Councilman Sweetland's teams, walked into the city clerk's office and asked for his order. Deputy Bushong informed him that the warrants would not be ready until later in the day, and then said:

"Noah, why don't Sweetland come after the order himself?"

"'Cause he told me to come and get it, and he wants it now."

John Dunn was standing by and laughed at Rounds for giving the snap away that Sweetland has his team in the city service.

"Oh, he knows all about it," replied Rounds.

Deputy Bushong, in relating the incident this morning, laughed and continued, "but I guess Mr. Sweetland's team don't work for the city now. I understand both of them are in the street railroad company's service."

Let's see. Is it lawful for a member of the city council to hire to the city his team and assist in allowing his own claim against the city?—Indianapolis News, October 1, 1890.

The history of that peculiar transaction whereby the republican county central committee was to be enriched as the price of favorable street railway legislation in the council, is coming slowly into the light.

The councilmen whose names were used in connection with charges to which Mayor Denny referred on Monday night, are restive under the imputations that grow out of Mr. Darnell's disclosures. They say that the whole truth will make them free, and will at the same time give Mr. Darnell something to think about. One of them makes this statement:

"Mr. C. F. Darnell came to me and asked me to meet certain republicans at the county committee rooms (republican), on a matter of importance. I went there and found Darnell, Newt. Harding, Mr. Floyd, Mr. Fulmer and John Clinton. Mr. Darnell said that it rested with me whether we should carry the county or lose it; that if I would change my vote and vote against the granting of the MacNeal charter that Mr. Shaffer would donate $500 to the county committee and would compel every man in his employ to vote the republican ticket on election day. I have never regarded this as more than one of Mr. Darnell's day dreams, and did not think Mr. Shaffer made any such impossible proposition. I make this statement for the reason that Mr. Darnell has seen fit to charge the mayor and certain councilmen with having done something illegitimate in this matter, when, so far as I know, he is the only one who advocated or proposed anything that was wrong."

It appears that this statement is the key that unlocks much of the secret business which swayed councilmen in their street car legislation. When Mr. Darnell let drop the statement that the Citizens' Street Car Company would give $500 or more toward the campaign fund, if the ordinance granting a competitive franchise to the MacNeal Company was defeated, the friends of the MacNeal ordinance carried the word to the MacNeal authorities. These no doubt recognized the importance of action and prepared to meet it. The opportunity was not to be lost. A check for $500 was made out, and Councilman Cummings, who was a friend to the MacNeal ordinance, was entrusted with it. He, in due course of time, endorsed it over to the chairman of the county republican central committee. Either by chance, or by pre-arrangement, it was carried for several days before it was presented at Fletcher's bank for payment. Payment had been stopped in the meantime, but the existence of the check had become known to the select few, and it had done its perfect work. It had saved the day. The MacNeal ordinance was passed. The supporter of that company's ordinance who had been appealed to so tenderly to save the county ticket by voting against the MacNeal franchise, was not persuaded to do so. As to whether the Citizens' Company paid $500 and voted its men "straight" will be matter for further inquiry. Also as what became of the canceled MacNeal check.—Indianapolis News.

A correspondent writes the News that Otto Williams, while drawing pay as steward at the county poor-house, is attending school in this city. Commissioner Reveal states that the duties of steward are such that young Mr. Williams can easily perform them and still have plenty of time to pursue his studies at the Indiana Medical College.—Indianapolis News, 1890.

Chief Webster entered the fire department as a substitute in March, 1860. He showed adaptability for the business, care in his work, energy, obedience to discipline and was steadily advanced through the various branches of the service until eight years ago, when he was made chief. From the moment Webster took charge the efficiency and morals of the department began to improve. Discipline was maintained, new methods and improvements were adopted as soon as they were found to be of utility, and the members were given to understand that their retention in place depended wholly upon their merits as firemen. For years this high degree of efficiency was maintained and the people slept soundly of nights, feeling that their houses and places of business were reasonably safe from the ravages of fire.

But the greedy gang which has controlled the republican organization in this city for years was dissatisfied. It saw in the fire department a machine which, if put on a political basis, could be made of great service. P. C. Trusler, a councilman from the twenty-first ward, was selected by the gang to reconstruct the department on a machine basis. He approached Webster cautiously and, as chairman of the fire committee, demanded the removal of a certain member of the department. The man whose head was asked was a thoroughly competent man, against whom no charge had been made, and Chief Webster refused to dismiss him. Trusler vowed vengeance on Webster and threatened him with dismissal.

For a time Trusler's plans failed of fruition. He was defeated for re-election and for two years Webster was left in comparative peace, though whenever his name was mentioned the members of the gang ground their teeth and indulged in expletives more forcible than polite. When Trusler returned to the council plans for revenge were immediately formulated. Trusler told Webster: "I have come back into the council for the express purpose of downing you, and I'm going to do it." Trusler brought even those members who felt disinclined to such a plan to his way of thinking, urging that Webster had been appointed as a republican and owed his first allegiance to that party rather than to the city. But a presidential campaign was on, votes were highly important things to have, and the cooler heads saw that it wouldn't do to remove Webster just then. So a compromise was attempted. The chief was approached by Trusler and informed that if he would drop one democrat a month he would be permitted to retain his place. Mr. Webster replied that his business was putting out fires, not democrats, and that he didn't propose to discharge competent men because of their politics. He was then told that he might expect to be discharged.

After the interview a new course was adopted—that of hampering the movements of the chief. The fire committee reported adversely on every suggestion by Chief Webster looking to an improvement of the department, subordinates were encouraged to mutiny, and everything possible was done to disorganize the force. The men were encouraged to make the engine-houses headquarters for the distribution of republican documents, and every obstacle was thrown in Webster's way. It didn't matter to the members of the gang that public and private property was endangered. That didn't concern them. They had none to lose. If the whole business portion of the town was destroyed it wouldn't injure them a cent. Their business consisted wholly in devising schemes to get their hands into the city treasury.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

A Journal editorial makes the stunning assertion that of "eighty odd members of the fire department thirty are democrats." The editorial concludes with the amusing observation "that one by one the campaign falsehoods of the democratic organs are exploded." Will the Journal please "explode" by naming the thirty democrats?

There are only nine democrats in the department. They are Tom Quinn, at No. 1 Engine House; John Fox, at No. 1; Tom Barrett and Fred Clump, at No. 6; Tony Voltz and Gus Ernst, at No. 2 truck; John Klug and William Tobin, on the tower, and Matt Rodgers, at headquarters. While these nine have been classed as democrats, some of them vote the republican ticket about as often as any other.

It is the height of Trusler's ambition to see every democrat out of the department and the force then used as a political machine.—Indianapolis News, 1889.

The election returns were not all in before the machinery was put into motion for the removal of Webster. On the 8th of November, a caucus was held for the nomination of city officers and Trusler began to work for the election of Dougherty as chief. Protests against a change were filed by insurance men and property-owners, but they were given no heed. In the second caucus Trusler promised Joe Gasper that the latter's brother-in-law, Jim Davis, should be given a fair place, and that councilman, who had hitherto opposed Webster's removal, fell into line. On the 12th of November, in joint session, the councilmen and aldermen chose Frank Dougherty chief to succeed Webster, the vote standing: For Dougherty—Aldermen Connett, Reynolds, Smith, Tousey and Wright; Councilmen Cummings, Darnell, Davis, Dunn, Elliott, Finch, Gasper, Long McClelland, Pearson, Smith, Swain, Thalman, Trusler and Wilson—20. For Webster—Aldermen Clark, Rail and Reinecke; Councilman Burns, Ganl, Hicklin, Johnston, Kelley, Markey, O'Connor and Parkinson—11.

Not a republican there had the nerve to stand out against the demands of the gang and demand that the fire department be kept efficient. They voted as the gang told them to, and the department was made an adjunct to the republican machine.—Indianapolis Sentinel, 1889.

The Trusler syndicate still has its fangs fastened in the fire department and continues to make and unmake, as it pleases. Jack Robinson, who was selected by Dougherty as foreman of the No. 3's, fell into disfavor with the Trusler gang and through its influence has been made driver of the No. 3's reel. Mr. Frank Harvey has taken his place as captain of the 3's. Mayor Denny showed the most sickening servility in the matter, advising Robinson that he had better not kick against Trusler. The Trusler gang wanted to get Mr. R. H. Brown into Robinson's place, but did not succeed, and accordingly Brown has been transferred to the 13's, Louis Rafert to the 3's, vice Huffman to the 10's, vice Mountain to the 4's, vice John Keating to headquarters to fill the vacancy caused by Harvey's removal. — Indianapolis Sentinel, May 1, 1889.

Instead of giving heed to the political shysters who are now clamoring to get into the fire department, some attention should be paid to those already on the "sub" list. Men like Kiley and Loucks, who have served long and faithfully in hope of promotion, are deserving of recognition. In his "subbing" Loucks has had a serious time, being twice injured. It can be said for Dougherty that he favors these trained "subs," and in consequence the umbilical cord between himself and the "Tin Horns" has been badly ruptured. — Indianapolis News, 1889.

Among the changes which Chief Dougherty made for betterment of the fire department was detailing "Jack" Robinson, a trained and valuable fireman, as foreman of the No. "3's." Mr. Robinson was a Webster man in the recent trouble, but he is noted for his fidelity to duty. His selection displeased the Trusler syndicate, and for two weeks and more there has been constant friction in the effort to displace him and substitute R. H. Brown, a Trusler man. The mayor advised Robinson to retire, "promising to stand by him," and he talked as if fearful of antagonizing the Trusler syndicate in any way. Robinson objected to being displaced at the dictation of the syndicate, but eventually he placed himself in Dougherty's hands, and the latter has compromised by making him driver of the "3's" reel. — Indianapolis News, May 2, 1890.

Engine House No. 13 has been used during the city campaign as a Trusler headquarters. For some time past circulars have been thrown broadcast in the twenty-first ward. They relate how "everybody knows Mr. Trusler is a candidate for re-election as councilman; how for two years he has looked after their interests; how he has endeavored to open up new territory by building the Willow street bridge, and how by the change in the fire department (for which he has no apology to offer) better discipline has been obtained."

There are many other plaintive wails which Mr. Trusler makes in his circular, too numerous to be mentioned, as Mr. Trusler received many wounds to which to apply circular balm while he was a councilman. Mr. Trusler thought explanation a great healer, and used lots of it in his circular balm. When he wrote his circular about the fire department, the Bates House fire had not occurred. To Mr. Trusler undoubtedly the department service had been bettered, but certainly not in extinguishing fires, as was shown yesterday. It was bettered for him, as he had by the change in the service more men to work for his re-election. They worked and worked well to that end. They peddled the circulars at No. 13 which related what a good councilman he had been. Since the campaign opened Foreman Tallentire has not attended a fire, but has devoted his entire time to Trusler's re-election.

When the alarm sounded, announcing the fire at the Bates house, members of the department at No. 13 were out electioneering. One of them, named Partie, was talking to J. C. Treeter, brick-layer and boiler-setter, urging him to vote for Trusler. Only three men turned out with that chemical engine, whose services were worthless, unless while the fire was in embryo. One of those was a sub. Verily, the services of the fire department have been bettered, so far as Mr. Trusler's interests are concerned. When the alarm was turned in Tallentire was seen electioneering for Trusler. He was dressed in citizen's clothes; and was in the company of Trusler; Barrows, the inspector of that ward, and Despo, the candidate for alderman in the fourth ward. This is something that Dougherty permits, but would never have occurred under Webster.

Another incident shows Trusler's desperation. A well-known citizen on Hoyt avenue had occasion to fill his back yard with dirt. He went to the street gang working on Virginia avenue, and asked them if they would give him a load of the street scrapings. They told him that a few good cigars would act with a magician's skill. The cigars were forthcoming, but the dirt never reached its destination. The citizen then met Rubens, the disabled fireman, who is doing yeoman service for Trusler, and was promised a load the next day. The next day a fine load of soil rolled up to the citizen's door, but it never came from the streets. It was soil that Trusler had probably paid for. — Indianapolis Sentinel, October 7, 1889.

Councilman Hicklin, as president of the committee on fire department, was completely knocked out last night. Hicklin had prepared a list of statesmen to be appointed firemen, and didn't consult with Messrs. Cooper and Olsen, members of the committee. Last night at the meeting of the fire board Olsen asked to see the list.

"Ah, never mind," said Hicklin, waving the list grandly, "we will just put it through."

"Well, we won't put it through until we know something about it," exclaimed the mild-mannered Cooper.

"Now, ain't this thing all right—?"

"Haven't we got our chief here who is responsible for the men, and who should have something to say?" interrupted Olsen.

"Well, yes, but—"

"I move," said Cooper, "that the chief of the fire department be instructed to make his own appointments, and select the men who are competent firemen and who will best serve the city's interests."

"Those are my sentiments exactly," said Olsen, "and I am with you, Mr. Cooper."

The result was that Mr. Hicklin's list was ignored. Chief Webster will make out his own list and the council will approve it. Hicklin was very anxious that the little affair of last night be kept out of the papers, and the Indianapolis News has it that he informed one gentleman by telephone this morning that no meeting had been held. Mr. Cooper has advised Chief Webster to take his time and make appointments that will be creditable to his judgment, if not satisfactory to the bummers who want to make a political machine out of the fire department. — Indianapolis News, January 30, 1891.

SENATE BILL NO. 275.

A BILL FOR AN ACT TO REGULATE THE EMPLOYMENT OF OFFICERS AND PERSONS IN THE SERVICE OF THE STATE IN THE BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the Board of State Charities shall prepare rules for the selection of officers and persons to be employed in the service of the State in the Hospital for the Insane at Indianapolis, the Northern Indiana Hospital for the Insane at Logansport, the Southern Indiana Hospital for the Insane at Evansville, the Eastern Indiana Hospital for the Insane at Richmond, the Institution for the Education of the Blind, the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb, the Indiana School for Feeble-Minded Youth, and the Indiana Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home. Said Board of State Charities shall supervise the administration of the rules so established.

SEC. 2. The rules mentioned in Section 1 of this act may be made from time to time and they shall among other things provide:

First. For the classification of the positions and employments to be filled.

Second. For open and competitive examinations by which to test applicants touching their practical fitness to discharge the duties of the positions which they desire to fill.

Third. For the selection of officers and persons for positions in said institutions in accordance with the results of such examinations.

Fourth. For promotion on the basis of merit ascertained by competition.

Fifth. For a period of probation before permanent appointment or employment.

Sixth. For reports to be given in writing by the appointing power to said Board of State Charities of the persons selected for appointment or employment among those examined; of rejections after probation; of resignations, suspensions, and removals, and the dates thereof; and in case of rejection after probation, suspensions, or removal of the cause therefor.

Seventh. For the transfer of officers or employees from any of said institutions to positions of the same grade in any other of said institutions.

Eighth. For determining the moral fitness of applicants for examination.

SEC. 3. The Board of State Charities shall appoint local examining boards in localities where examinations are to be held, each consisting of three persons, not more than one of whom shall be in the employ of the State, and not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party. The Board of State Charities may appoint one member of each local board to act as secretary thereof. Said boards shall be composed of persons of known impartiality and integrity. Said boards shall act under the rules provided for in Section 1 of this act. Members of said boards shall each be paid five dollars for each day actually employed.

SEC. 4. The secretary of the Board of State Charities shall, under the rules of said board, have supervision of all examinations under this act. Every examination held shall be attended in person by the secretary, or, in case of his inability, by at least one member of the Board of State Charities. If the Board of State Charities at any time fail to appoint a secretary, the Governor shall appoint a secretary of said board.

SEC. 5. The Board of State Charities shall grade the competitors in the various examinations in the respective classes for which they are examined, and make lists of the same accordingly, ranging from the highest downward, and shall re-arrange such lists after each examination. No name shall be retained in said lists longer than one year from the time of examination. No name shall be retained in said lists after the same has been certified three times for appointment.

SEC. 6. Within three months after this act takes effect the Board of State Charities shall, for the purpose of the examination herein provided for, arrange in one or more classes the offices and places of employment within the scope of this act. And at the end of said three months no person shall be appointed or admitted to or promoted to any office or place so classified until he has passed an examination in conformity herewith. The superintendents of said institutions respectively and laborers shall not be classified hereunder.

SEC. 7. Wherever an appointment is to be made in said classified service, the appointing power shall give notice of the same under the rules of the Board of State Charities, and thereupon under said rules the highest three names from the corresponding list of examined persons, with the rating of each, shall be certified to said appointing power, and one of the three persons whose names are thus certified shall receive said appointment. In any and all cases where a person is appointed of lower rating than one or both of those whose names are certified with his, the appointing power shall, under said rules, report in writing in each case the reasons for not appointing such person or persons of higher rating. Each examined person shall be entitled to three consecutive certifications for appointment.

SEC. 8. No question in any examination under the aforesaid rules shall relate to political opinions, and no appointment or dismissal shall be affected by political reasons, influence or affiliations. Examinations shall be practical and shall relate to matters which will fairly test the relative fitness of the applicants. The Board of State Charities shall openly publish in all notices of examinations to be held that the competition is impartial to all, without regard to political opinions or affiliation.

SEC. 9. No recommendation or statement concerning any person applying for office or place under this act, except as to the character of the applicant, shall be received or considered by any person concerned in holding any examination or making any appointment under this act; and said recommendations or statements as to character shall be in writing.

SEC. 10. The Board of State Charities shall make a separate classification of the labor service of said institutions, and shall keep registers of deserving applicants for places in said labor service and shall make rules for determining what applicants are entitled to have their names entered upon such registers. Such rules shall guard against political or other favoritism in securing entry of names upon said registers, but for meritorious reasons, such as having families to support, or where special qualifications are required, they may provide for preference for employment among those registered; otherwise laborers shall be employed in the order in which they stand on the respective registers. No laborer shall be discharged from said labor service for political reasons nor except for cause stated in writing under the rules of the State Board of Charities. A registration shall be good for one year.

SEC. 11. All notices and reports required herein, all recommendations concerning character, all lists of persons examined, with their respective ratings, all records of examinations, all examination papers, with the rating given to each answer marked thereon, and all records of every kind of said respective institutions and of said Board of State Charities shall be open to public inspection.

SEC. 12. The duties herein assigned to the Secretary of the Board of State Charities are in addition to such other duties as may be assigned to him by said board, and said board may, if necessary, appoint a clerk to said secretary at a compensation to be fixed by said board. All expenses necessary to carry out this act shall be certified as the Board of State Charities shall direct, and shall be paid by the Treasurer of State upon an order from the Auditor of State.

SEC. 13. The county commissioners of any county where any examination under this act is to be held, shall provide a suitable place for holding the same, properly furnished, heated and lighted, and shall furnish the necessary stationery for said examination.

SEC. 14. The Board of State Charities shall annually prepare and print a report of all proceedings and expenses under this act.

SEC. 15. The sum of three thousand dollars is hereby annually appropriated out of any funds not otherwise appropriated for the payment of all expenses made necessary by this act.

SEC. 16. Whoever refuses or neglects to comply with the provisions of this act, or violates any of its provisions, or knowingly makes an appointment to office, or selects a person for employment contrary to any rules duly established according to the provisions of this act, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars for such offense.

THE MAGEE BILL.

Resolutions adopted by the Social Turn Verein at its meeting February 14th inst.:

The Social Turn Verein of Indianapolis has been informed that Senate Bill No. 275, will be introduced to the legislature. This bill has the object of the employment of officers and persons for our benevolent institutions according to their fitness and merits instead of their party faiths, and,

WHEREAS, the Social Turn Verein is heartily in favor of taking our benevolent institutions out of politics, therefore, be it

Resolved, We regard this as a timely reform, fully in the interest of our unfortunates under the care of the state, as well as for the public good in general.

THE STATE DEMOCRATIC PRESS.

—There is no measure before the legislature which, from a strictly partisan point of view, is entitled to more hearty support from the democrats than the Magee bill to regulate the appointment of subordinate employes in the state benevolent institutions. The arguments for the bill are so obvious that it seems unnecessary to recapitulate them. The bill provides for the examination of all applicants for positions in these institutions, the tests to be applied being those only of character and capacity. If it becomes a law, it will insure the selection of honest and capable men only for positions in these institutions, and will put a stop forever to the scandal and disgrace of the rise as asylums for party workers. Every practical democratic politician in the state knows that for every vote which the possession of the "patronage" of these institutions makes for the party it loses five votes. For every person who is pacified with an appointment there are half a dozen disappointed and disgruntled applicants, and for the actions of every employe the party becomes responsible, and is frequently obliged to bear odium which does not belong to it. The attendant in the eastern hospital who was recently convicted of manslaughter, is and always has been a republican, yet his offense is charged to the account of the democratic party. Considerations of party expediency, not to speak of the higher considerations of justice, humanity and christianity, demand the enactment of the Magee bill, which, leaving the general management of the benevolent institutions still in the hands of the dominant party, will take the subordinate appointments out of politics, thus relieving the state of an acknowledged and serious evil and the democratic party of a heavy burden. There should be no doubt of the passage of the Magee bill.—Indianapolis Sentinel, February 19.

—Senator Magee has done one thing for which The Signal can heartily commend him. He is ably championing senate bill No. 275, to regulate the employment of officers and persons in the service of the state in the benevolent institutions. The bill may not be perfect in all its parts, but any law which will remove the state benevolent institutions from the control of political bosses is a move in the right direction. The state federation of labor put itself on record as favoring such a reform at its last annual meeting.—Labor Signal, February 20.

—The Linton Call says: "The present legislature may well heed the timely warning and place themselves in line with the demand for this needed reform. The control of these institutions is the source of party weakness, and the sooner the democratic party unloads this responsibility the better it will be, from a party stand-point. The people yet have a few antiquated notions that parties should not be held together for the spoils, and their love of justice will correct these growing evils. Party fealty will not condone a wrong or excuse those in control."—Indianapolis News, February 3.

—The Seymour Democrat says: "The control of all benevolent institutions should be non-partisan. Every time politics is found in contact with state charities mischief is found. Men can not stifle partisanship once it is aroused. Wherever party interests are presumed to be in peril partisans will instinctively spring to their defense. There ought to be no party interests for any party in public charities. Party and politics should be wholly eliminated from them."—Indianapolis Journal, February 2.

—Speaking of the bill to place benevolent institutions under non-partisan management, the Covington Friend says: "By all means let this bill be passed, and put these institutions into the hands of thoroughly competent officials, and stop this trading on the woes and misfortunes of the poor unfortunates."—Indianapolis Sentinel, February 17.

—The Logansport Pharos says: "Senator Magee's bill providing for the non-partisan management of the benevolent institutions of the state is a good one. The benevolent boards should be wholly non-partisan. Men of unquestionable fitness should be placed in control of these institutions and they should be managed as a man of affairs manages his business. The partisan management of the benevolent institutions is a detriment rather than a benefit to the party in power."—Indianapolis Sentinel, February 17.

—During the past years the citizens of Indiana, without regard to party distinctions, have concluded that the officers of our benevolent institution, together with the entire management and administration, should be regulated independently of all party connection, and purely with a view to fitness and merit. The masses, taught by the innumerable scandals, demand it in the interests of the general welfare, and even discerning party chiefs of both sides unite in the same demands for party sake. The latter are aware that the "right" of distributing patronage, weakens the party instead of giving it strength; that with each appointment a considerable number of "unnoticed" candidates became dissatisfied if not rebellious, while the fortunate one, who takes away the prize, recognizes in it only the well-deserved reward for party service (a soft warm bed and the opportunity of making money), not the acceptance of onerous duties and responsibilities which he ordinarily neglects to the shame and disgrace of his party. The far-seeing and more resolute politicians attribute the re-action, which so often appears in the general elections after a presidential election, to the distribution of spoils, which never ends without a veritable dog-fight. But with indisputable right the citizen says, in relation to our benevolent institutions, that, as we do not inquire into the political faith of the patient, so also should this faith not determine the choice of his officers, physician, nurse, etc.

From such reflections as these, which in the first instance bears with it the general welfare and in the second party advantages, senate bill No. 275 finds its source.—Indianapolis Täglicher Telegraph [dem.], February 16.

Resolutions adopted by the Marion County Medical Society, at its meeting February 10:

The Marion County Medical Society having been informed that a bill has been presented to the Indiana state legislature having for its object the placing of the state charitable institutions upon a non-partisan basis, and making the positions of assistant physicians competitive, therefore Resolved, That the Marion County Medical Society heartily indorses the principles involved in this bill.

REFORM IN THE BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

The editor of The Sentinel has received congratulations, both in person and by letter, from many leading democrats of Indiana upon the article published in last Saturday's issue regarding the defeat of the Magee bill in the senate. Among the letters received is one from a prominent democrat of Frankfort—a man who has always been active in the service of his party, spending his time and money freely in its behalf. This letter was not intended for publication, but we take the liberty of printing the main portions of it:

I want to take you by both hands as an expression of the cordiality with which I indorsed your editorial expressions in to-day's Sentinel, especially on the Magee bill. Your advice to the legislature has been timely, and had it been followed would have saved the democratic party the chagrin and humiliation of future explanations and apologies. Can't something be done to have the Magee bill reconsidered? For the good of the party, for the good of the state, let something be done next week by the legislature to save it from shame. I don't deal in flattery, but I mean all I say when I write that you have proven yourself a patriot, and therefore, in the broadest sense, a good democrat by your courageous course in The Sentinel. I may not have approved of all your editorial sentiments, but you have proven my ideal of what a file leader in the democratic party should be. A good many members of the legislature act as though they thought the people did not read and think. In this they deceive themselves. This is a progressive age, and if the democratic party expects to absorb the votes of the young men of push, it must in action as well as name be democratic. The curse of the party has always been its political barnacles. We must cleanse the hull of our gallant old vessel of them, else we surely will be distanced in the race for popular favor. The actions of our legislature may have a potent effect on the national campaign of '92, and it is exasperating in the extreme that it should thus put in jeopardy the democratic party of the whole country. Commending you again for your courage, as well as your sound judgment, I remain yours sincerely.

Another Indiana democrat of eminence—a man who has voted the democratic ticket and worked for the democratic party more than fifty years—writes the Sentinel lamenting the defeat of the Magee bill. He declares that a continuance of the existing system, with all its evils and abuses, "ought to be enough to bring down the vengeance of God upon the state and people, who suffer it." He adds that if this legislature "does not do something in the line of the Magee bill it must not claim to be honest in its professions of reform." He continues:

"Merely pretending to do a great reform work by cutting down the salaries of public officers will not satisfy the demands of humanity and christian charity. The Sentinel has shown its willingness to do a good work in this direction heretofore, and I hope it will not quit now."

Our venerable democratic friend need have no apprehensions on this score. The Sentinel is not a quitter. It is not "built that way." One swallow does not make a summer, and the defeat of the Magee bill is merely an incident in the struggle for reform in the benevolent institutions. We believe, as we have frequently said, that these institutions, with one exception, are to-day as well managed as it is possible for them to be under the existing system. Whatever abuses exist in them are the fault of the system and not of the men who are in charge of the institutions. That system will have to go sooner or later. The reform contemplated by the Magee bill has been postponed; it has not been defeated. It has been established in all the eastern and middle states and in several of the western states. Two years hence it will be introduced in Indiana, and by the democratic party—the only party which has ever given the people of this state any valuable reform in legislation or administration.—Indianapolis Sentinel, February 24.

VICTIMS STILL FOR CRUELTY AND CRIME.

Victor Hugo says that America in the nineteenth century after she had awakened to her condition looked upon herself and said: "What! I had slaves!" And that Europe would awake in the twentieth century and exclaim: "What! I had kings!" We believe that this goodly state of Indiana will reach the condition in which with equal disgust and horror she will look at herself and say of her helpless insane and other wards: "What! I once turned these defenseless beings over as the spoils of politics, the victims of the cruelty and ignorance of political heelers and ruffians!" Indiana's good name was again detracted from yesterday when the state senate defeated the bill to remove the benevolent institutions from politics. There was no mistaking the issue. Senator Magee and those who voted with him offered the incontestable demonstrations of business principles, common sense, fair play and every consideration of humanity in support of the measure. From these grounds the opposition fled, and took its stand squarely in the mire and filth of spoils politics. It smeared everything in reach with the exudations of appetite as a snake covers with saliva the victim of its fangs before it begins to gorge. And the comparison is exact at other points. The seizure of a public trust is as clearly an outrageous attack as a snake's is, and its gluttonizing for the appetite of a few bummers and heelers as much of an infamy.

The care of the state's wards is the people's concern. They pay for it. The objects of this care are the unfortunate and afflicted from households all over the state. This legislature began by denying the common rights of the public mails to the most helpless class of these unfortunates; absolutely forbid them from communication with the hearts and homes of those to whom nature has primarily tied them by blood and affection. They are immured in asylums beyond the reach of such appeal. And now these places of confinement are denied the administration of business fitness, of honest, of common right and humanity, the helpless subjects there to be held as so much spoils to be "worked" for the benefit of party bummers, though it may mean neglect, starvation, cruelty, murder. Those things have been done in the past. They are inherent in the system. They are liable to be repeated in the future, and the majority of the state senate of Indiana, deliberately taking its stand in the blood and the mire of this infamy, declares that no change shall be made that will prevent this. O shame! O cruelty and infamy! But a change will be made! The people of Indiana will not forever submit to this inhumanity. They will remove this curse and crime and stain, and visit with their righteous indignation and pity the vile cruelty that partisan corruption works in man.—Indianapolis News, February 20.

The Courier regrets to see that the Magee bill, to place the benevolent institutions of the state on a non partisan basis, in which merit alone will win a position, failed to pass the senate Thursday. The democratic party is always the sufferer under the spoils system. We lost the presidential election in 1888 because of the soreheads who failed to get office under Cleveland. So from a party point of view alone, the patronage of the benevolent institutions of the state ought to be taken out of the hands of politicians. But from a humane point of view every consideration that leads to sympathy for the unfortunate pleads that their management be entirely eliminated from politics. The Courier is certain that this view is concurred in by nine-tenths of the people outside of the partisans who are politicians for revenue only.—Evansville Courier, February 23.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE repeats its request that all libraries that have not already done so will acknowledge the receipt of the paper, it having been sent for the last six months to over four hundred libraries.

Harper's Weekly of March 24 says:

The actual service of the last two years to reform is really summed up in the fidelity of the commission. But there is no allegation that under the Cleveland administration the commission was not equally faithful.

In justice to the present civil service commission, it must be said that in the latter part of the preceding administration the commission was not only unfaithful but was in a state of helpless inefficiency. This is a mild statement of the actual situation. It is not made in contradiction, but to supply the missing allegation which the Weekly or any one else can now support by abundance of facts.

THE President has removed the democratic district attorney in Washington who had charge of not prosecuting Mahone's blackmailers. There is a decided appearance that he thought masterly inactivity was his best guaranty of continuance in office. Will his successor break the spell? If he secures conviction followed by a fine will the administration then dispense with the services of the convicts?

OF the 2,899 presidential post-offices in existence March 4, 1891, changes had then been made in all but 290 since March 4, 1889. Aside from a small proportion caused by death or other legitimate causes, these changes were made for reasons that had no reference to the good transaction of the public business or to the public welfare. The acts were done to help persons or to satisfy the demand of a party machine. They were, therefore, without qualification, corrupt acts. The constitution does not contemplate that a President shall reward his friends and his partisans as a king rewards his courtiers and his followers.

THE civil service commission after all got no allowance for additional clerks. The senate changed the house appropriation of a lump sum to specific items, which made a conference committee necessary, and Cannon was put upon that committee. He overawed Dawes, Butterworth, and other civil service reform republicans, and got the conference agreement shaped to omit the additional allowance. Long ago defeated and repudiated by an overwhelmingly republican community, in his anger and spite he thus runs amuck among matters of good administration and public welfare. The merit system is marching irresistibly on, and in a little while "Joe" Cannon will be known simply as one of the men who undertook to stop its progress and was brushed aside. The Indianapolis Journal reports that he is very "near" to the President, and that the latter will soon make use of Cannon's services. This would certainly appear like a recompense for success in hampering the operations of the commission and in breaking republican promises.

ROYER is in Washington trying to get back the Pine Ridge agency, and is telegraphing that his prospects are good. If, under the circumstances, his prospects are really good with the President, it is useless to attempt to add any facts with a view to prevent the re-instatement. Voters, however, should read the letter of Mr. Cleveland, in another column, so that in this, as in many other like matters, they may be informed.

MR. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS addressed the meeting of the department of superintendence of the national educational association February 25, upon "The Public School and Civil Service Reform." A resolution was passed commending the application of the merit system to the public schools. The Civil Service Reformer in its current issue gives an idea of how patronage taints the public school system of Baltimore.

ELSEWHERE are a few items to illustrate current spoil. The time concerned is only a month and a half, and the range is wide. Ingalls fitly makes his exit with a brazen and brutal spoils act. How spoilsmen know no party and are bound together for mutual interest is indicated by the connection of the republican assemblyman, Hendricks, with Governor Hill's man Pierce, of unsavory Tweed association. The fights about the post-office troughs in several states continue. Vandervoort, whose scandalous appointment was not revoked in the face of his disgraceful record, evidently feels secure with the President and the postmaster-general, and is up to his eyes in private snaps of divers sorts.

It would seem that a casual survey would impress any one that the spoils question is a question of morals, and that to tolerate these scenes over the country is to tolerate the lowest and most sordid acts in public affairs.

IN the general assembly, just adjourned, the senate appointed nineteen door-keepers, although the law allows but seven, and although there are but seven doors, including the doors to the cloak-rooms, and from these into the senate chamber, which have any possible communication with the senate chamber. These door-keepers were paid five dollars a day, although it was urged and admitted that dozens of good men could be had for two dollars and a half. "But, no!" say our buccaneering senators, "that would give all the patronage to Marion county. A man can not afford to come to Indianapolis from South Bend or Evansville and be a door-keeper for less than five dollars a day." And for this freely expressed reason the people who do not care where a door-keeper lives pay double wages.

THE spoils system in our insane hospitals goes merrily on. A patient died at the central hospital, and Dr. Curtis, an assistant physician, furnished the relatives with the necessary certificate of death, for which he charged and pocketed the neat sum of ten dollars. This, says the doctor, is not a service for which the state hired me. True, no one else can render it, for in the service of the state, I alone, as the patient's doctor, obtained the peculiar knowledge that enables me to make the certificate. But there was no agreement that I was to put this knowledge into writing. What political or personal "pull" enables this buccaneer to continue to live off from the state?

AT THE eastern hospital, recently, a patient suddenly dies. The doctors examine the body and report that the man's ribs broke of themselves. Later, three attendants, ignorant of this finding, are examined, and carefully state that another patient kicked the dead man. The three attendants are discharged for lying. How do the people like the sneaking, and thieving, and murderous system of Hudson, and Foley, and Old Dr. Thompson, and Thompson of Pulaski, and Burke, and Sweeney, and all the rest of the twenty-six senators who voted that it was good and wholesome.

DURING the month the general assembly has passed a new charter for this city. A bitter and desperate opposition to it was made under the leadership of Sim Coy, Jim Rice, Sterling R. Holt, and Leon O. Bailey, the last named being at the same time city attorney and deputy attorney-general of the state. The ground of opposition is indicated by the names mentioned. It was feared that the new charter might make more difficult the exploitation of city affairs for personal or party benefit. It was enough for this opposition that there appeared the least cloud of uncertainty in the matter. They very nearly succeeded. Dr. Thompson, old and superannuated, and those two counterfeit representatives of working men, these being the three senators from this county, were mere puppets in the hands of Coy and his co-workers. It was only by the greatest effort that the opposition was overcome, and yet of the 125,000 people concerned, it is within the facts to say that 124,000 were earnestly in favor of the enactment of the measure.

IN considering the new city charter it must be remembered that under the old system of a mayor without power and a council and board of aldermen which passed ordinances and superintended their execution by boards of their own members, city government had practically broken down. The new charter is a vast concentration of power in the mayor and under him in heads of different departments whom he appoints and may remove. The city legislature consists of twenty-one councilmen acting as one body. Fifteen of these are elected by wards and six by the city at large. This is an undoubted improvement as the one body permits of prompt action, and the choice of six by the whole city added to those chosen from wards apt to choose good councilmen will give the city a majority made up of honest and capable men, if the voters who want such will take the trouble to elect them. Such fellows as Coy only get into the council by going to wards largely made up of their stripe and where the city as a whole has no chance to get at them. The council has large legislative powers, the most important of which is the appropriation of money.

As a foundation which makes the best city government possible, the charter must appeal to every one, and those who secured its passage may feel that they have rendered a public service. There is, however, too great an inclination to rest upon the assumption that the best city government must follow the enactment of this law. No greater mistake can be made. The charter may become a two-edged sword, with the sharp edge cutting into the public welfare. In the hands of faithful and competent officers, the best hopes will be realized. But with an able, shrewd, partisan, and unprincipled mayor, backed by a council of his kind, or with a respectable, weak mayor and council handled by outsiders like Coy, we shall have, on a smaller scale, a Tweed regime, and any department falling into such hands will just so far be the worst kind of government. Only by eternal vigilance will good results be obtained. The charter will not run itself, and those citizens who stand back and let others criticize public affairs will have to lay aside their reserve and hold themselves in readiness to denounce the first appearance of official venality, or, sooner or later, now this department, now that, will be controlled by political buccaneers, whose small numbers and concentrated powers will enable them to enjoy to the full the political paradise described by Coy in the words, "The fewer men you have in this politics, the better." When Governor Hill, of New York, appoints Paddy Divver to a judgeship at $8,000 a year, and a member of the Tweed ring insurance commissioner of his state, the same kind of a man with the same motives, may, as mayor of this city, give us a similar dose.

THERE is a tendency, also, to over-estimate what has been done. One of the principal framers and advocates of the charter remarked in an interview the day after its passage: "If there is a modern improvement to be found in municipal government in this country which we have not secured it must have been invented within the last three months." This shows a provincial limitation of view. Perhaps the greatest reform in city government during the last fifty years has been in the system of employing labor, which has been followed in many cities in Massachusetts for several years, and in Boston still longer. Yet our charter makes no provision for it. A second great reform in city government has been in the application of the merit system to the police and fire departments and other skilled employment in many cities of New York and Massachusetts for seven or eight years; and in some of them, notably in Buffalo and Boston, the perfection of the system, the thorough working out of its methods, its unqualified success, and the ease with which knowledge of it and its workings might have been obtained, leave the framers of this charter still far behind the times.

Their chief action in this direction consisted in incorporating the silly and vicious expedient that appointments in the police and fire divisions "shall be as nearly as possible equally divided politically." This city is not concerned in the politics of its firemen and policemen. It is vitally concerned in their fitness, and the best way to determine that fitness, now proved beyond all cavil by the experience of many cities, is by competition, physical and otherwise, open to all.

SOME good lessons may even now be drawn from the department of public safety which includes the police and fire forces. This department is managed by three commissioners appointed by the mayor, and he has already appointed Sterling R. Holt and Messrs. Catterson and Sullivan. They have power to make all appointments and removals. Removals may be "for any cause other than politics" and written reasons must be entered of record for any removals. Section 97 seems to contemplate a trial, for it says, "On conviction of a member of said fire and police force" of a number of named offenses, he may be punished in various ways, including dismissal. This is at best an unfortunate arrangement. Having unlimited power of appointment, a board of partisans will appoint according to the "pull" or "influence" of personal or party considerations. That such a board will retain worthless employes, the practice of thousands of similar boards fully proves. Over against this may be fearlessly set the plan of appointment by the superintendent of the police or of the firemen, according to merit, determined by competition, and of removal by him with the single limitation that he make a public written record of his reasons. Under this system we should have the highest discipline and efficiency.

IF it should happen that the commissioners of public safety should consist of one strong partisan and two weak men, we shall see this department in the hands of a boss. If, in all the city, a boss had been looked for, Sterling R. Holt, the president of the board, would have filled the requirement. Of the other two members of the board, enough is not yet known to say positively how they would act if Mr. Holt assumed the functions of a boss. It is not yet to be said that he will. The board intends to dismiss every man in the fire and police forces, or rather to take the ground that they have not yet been appointed, and will make, in every case, a new appointment upon application. This seems an uncalled for act of cruelty. Both divisions contain many men of the highest efficiency, who have been years in the service. The superintendents of both divisions have had a like service, and each could inform the board in five minutes of the comparatively small number of men unfit for appointment. Instead, here are some two hundred men, nearly every one with a family, put upon the rack for no cause whatever, and compelled to besiege the board in a most humiliating manner to keep from being deprived of employment by outsiders who have greater influence but no experience. The Indianapolis News, of March 11, thus describes the situation:

If there are three men for whom life is rapidly losing its charms, who are growing wan and haggard, who are haunted day and night, button-holed and pulled into corners, who a thousand times a day respond to "Say, let me see you a minit," those three men are the commissioners of public safety. "If I don't become on freezing terms with truth I think I deserve to be congratulated," moaned Commissioner Catterson. Persons who try to get into Sterling R. Holt's office find there such a crowd of would-be policemen and firemen around the door that admittance is next to impossible at times. The applicants will not budge an inch for fear some other applicant would gain some advantage. One of Mr. Holt's agents stood out in the hallway for an hour. He had $600 he desired to pay his principal. A cannon ball might have been forced through the crowd, and the agent with the $600 was not a cannon ball. Commissioner Sullivan looked himself up, and wouldn't let his own brother see him. But when going to his meals he was waylaid.

"Now, I tell you," said the youngest commissioner, "I would like to see you get something, but to tell you the truth I ain't in it. Holt and Catterson make all the appointments, but if you think it will do you any good you can tell them I sent you."

This accounts for the unusual rush after the other commissioners. But at public headquarters the crowds are immense, and one needn't be surprised to hear of Superintendent Colbert managing the force from the court-house tower by telephone if this mad rush does not stop soon. In one hour over two hundred called at the superintendent's office for applications. Big men and little men, young men and old men, some drunk and some sober, ward politicians, heelers and bootlers, all came, and the majority of them insisted on talking with the superintendent. It was a sight calculated to shake one's faith in the city charter. One man said he was too old to do active work, and he wanted to act on the force. Another applied for a place in either department, he didn't care whether he was a policeman or a fireman. A man with one arm wanted to be janitor, and a man without legs asked to be appointed turnkey. A colored citizen dragged Superintendent Colbert out into the hall-way, and on behalf of the colored voters of the city demanded for himself a policeman's job.

"Why, you are drunk," exclaimed the superintendent.

"Well, boss, I'll be sober when I go on de foree," was the reply.

This was the last straw that broke the camel's back. Chief of Detectives Splann was appointed sergeant-at-arms, and he rushed the crowd out as fast as he could supply them with blank applications. At 6 o'clock last night about seven hundred applications had been filed, and to-day they are still rolling in. The most persistent are the cheap politicians, who want places for "the gang." They haven't any idea of the requirements of a policeman or a fireman. All they want is a job for some striker or tough. There is no use in worrying the life out of the commissioners. Every candidate must file an application, and this application is the basis on which the commissioners procure their information.

It must be apparent that the opportunities for yielding to temptation in the management of these two divisions of the city government are wide. The only prevention is public opinion, and if public opinion goes to sleep there will, sooner or later, be no prevention. City officers must be given to understand at the start that the people expect them to be guided in their acts by business principles, and not by politics. This understanding can only be brought about by constant public criticism. There is another important matter for public agitation. Under the charter the different boards could introduce the merit system and the Boston labor-service system. The mayor appoints and may remove the boards. Will he require these systems to be introduced? If not, what will the candidates for mayor who will seek the office next October say about it?

EDITOR RICKETTS, of the Delphi Journal, left for his home this afternoon. Mr. Ricketts has been clerk to the house committee on immigration and naturalization, and had many friends here.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, March 4.

The Delphi Journal is the sheet that accused the Indianapolis Journal some weeks since of suffering from hysterics because it rebuked Lawyer Brush, of Crawfordsville, for stating that Indiana could not be carried in 1892 without the use of money. The Delphi Journal's views will bear repeating:

"The Journal [Indianapolis] then goes on and attributes the victories won by the republicans in this state to the 'resistless tide of public opinion,' 'boundless enthusiasm and the Lord,' and attempts to make itself and the dear people believe that the two-dollar bill has not been 'in it' at all. All of which has a tendency to make any one but a hypocrite and a pharisaical political psalm singer very tired."

This seemed to the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE at the time an impudent gibe at the President and Mr. Wanamaker for being religious men. And it seemed gross insubordination in the view that one of its owners and editors was postmaster. And coming from a subsidized sheet, it seemed to savor of treachery. But this is doubly bad, now that it comes to light that the other owner, Ricketts, was provided for.

GENERAL CORSE.

The President has removed General Corse as postmaster of Boston because he is not a republican. That he is a patriot in every sense of the word no American will deny. That he was the best postmaster that Boston ever had, and was wholly non-partisan in the management of his office, the President and the postmaster-general freely admit. The business men of Boston were a unit for his retention, and six Massachusetts congressmen, including both senators, urged the President to keep him. But, at last, the stolid, stupid negative came, based upon the corrupt reason that General Corse was not a republican. Now, the retention of a single officer, even in every way so admirably efficient as General Corse, cuts but a small figure for or against the progress of civil service reform. That progress is made by gathering in the great multitude below the rank of postmaster. Nor would such a retention in any manner clear the skirts of an administration engaged in removing a hundred thousand other officers for spoils purposes, any more than one swallow makes a summer in January. But, under the circumstances, the removal of General Corse is an irritating, laughable, humiliating proof of the contemptibly small size of the President's public mind.

Of this removal Mr. John J. Henry, at a dinner of the Brookline Republican Club, said in disgust: "For whom? An honest man? A business man? No! But a republican!" Of himself the new postmaster says, in the Boston Post of March 2: "I know nothing about the post-office business, and I shall have to begin by learning my trade." Of General Corse he had a short time before written to Senator Hoar: "If the interest of the public service is to decide, Gen. Corse will be renominated." The Massachusetts Civil Service Reform League composed of republicans and democrats, has passed a resolution of censure, wherein they quote from the President's letter of acceptance, "that in appointments to every grade and department fitness and not party service should be the essential and discriminating test, and fidelity and efficiency the only sure tenure of office."

ALL OTHER REFORMS SHOULD BE SUBORDINATED TO CIVIL SERVICE REFORMS.

The bosses know, first, that they live by the offices, and second, that if the people once realize the evils of patronage they will take away the offices. The skill of the machine is therefore directed to diverting the attention of the people from this division and enjoyment of spoils. To this end, issues true or false are urged forward. For many years southern outrages, an issue which never did and never was intended to lead to any practicable measure, blinded the majority, and enabled the republican machine to keep the offices. In Pennsylvania, to-day, Quay raises jeopardized protection like a wall close to the eyes of republicans to blind them to the criminal evil of himself as a man and of his literally feudal rulership of his state. For years the people of the state of Maryland, in a manner disgraceful to themselves, have permitted Gorman to keep his heel on their necks, solely by his control of the offices; and in every campaign when they might have overthrown him, he has blinded them by the cry that such a result would lead to national party disaster. * * *

Again, Senator Gorman, the overlord of overlords, two years ago was a protectionist. To-day he is a tariff reformer. No one will ask us to believe that the merits of the tariff question had anything to do with this change of heart. Mr. Gorman read in the signs of the times that his party machine was against him, and that he must bring about this change if he would continue as the absolute party controller of offices in Maryland. * *

Our boss system of office-holders, with its paramount boss and a graded line of under-bosses, has thus become a quasi-feudal system, without the romance or the courtesy or the honor of feudalism. It is the footpad in armor. It uses various interests for its own ends and lets itself for hire to various interests. Destroy it and leave every reform and every interest standing alone, and spontaneous discussion, followed by the untrammelled action of the people, will reward every agitation with that result to which the civilization of the country entitles it.

Therefore, I say that the destruction of the spoils system ought to regulate individual political effort. Not that other reforms may not have sympathy and support. But in every case there comes a time when the roads part. Then there can be no compromise, no hesitation. The pursuit of these bloodsuckers upon all our civil governments should be relentless. To cease this attack at any point and unite with this common enemy with the hope of benefiting some other object is to strengthen the common enemy and fill him with joy. Such deviation prolongs the unequal struggle on our hands and does not accomplish its object.—From a paper read by Lucius B. Swift before the National Civil Service Reform League in Boston, October, 1890.

The opinion expressed in this extract is the opinion guiding the course of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, and the career of Mr. Gorman seems always to afford new and diverting illustrations of these principles. To keep clearly in mind what Gorman, as a boss, really is, it is well to quote from the report of an address adopted at a great public meeting in Baltimore, September 30, 1887, the object of which was his overthrow:

"Time would fail to tell all the outrages that have been committed openly, publicly, and systematically by this [Gorman's] association. It has appointed to public office thieves, burglars, express robbers, murderers, and men stained with every crime. It has burned the ballots when in the custody of the clerk of the court, and the perpetrators of the act have publicly boasted of it. Indeed, every one connected with that act has been rewarded from the public treasury. It has secured places in the government employ for the two most notorious election thieves in the city. It has garrisoned a ward with ruffians and kept them in the city's pay. Of twenty-three city, state and federal employes in that ward, we have found nineteen whose names appear on the criminal records of the city.

But it has been curious and depressing to note how, after Gorman became a tariff reformer, great numbers of respectable and intelligent men in his own party in Maryland began to forget how dangerous a man they had not long before considered him. There have been traces even of a pride that Gorman's adroitness as a politician would be successfully used in his new rôles. In the midst of his growing popularity as a tariff reformer he gave a slight shock to the Better Element Democrats of his state by going down to New York last November and speaking for Grant and Tammany against the citizens' movement. But this, too, was judiciously forgotten when he used all his astuteness to lead his party in the election bill fight in the senate. Then he reached the top wave and almost won a "dinner" in honor of his efforts.

The movement to give Senator Gorman a big banquet in recognition of his work in the elections bill fight, like the one tendered to him after the election of Cleveland, is still being boomed by his admirers. The News, one of the two democratic papers of the city, continues its interviews with citizens. The general expression is that when the banquet is held the eight republican senators who voted with the democrats should be invited. This sentiment is echoed by Capt. John Hall, president of the first national bank, who said to-day:

"I think that Senator Gorman ought to receive public recognition, but I also think that the invitations to any banquet tendered to him ought also to include every democratic and every republican senator who helped him to achieve his glorious victory."—Baltimore Dispatch to New York Times, February 3.

That this particular animal can not change his spots is shown by the following from the Civil Service Reformer for March:

A singular instance of the solidarity of spoilsmen was seen in the senate during the debate on the proposal to open the supervising architect's office to plunder, when Senator Gorman arose to defend Mr. John Wanamaker from the attacks of Mr. Roosevelt. It would require the tongue of John Randolph, of Roanoke, to fitly describe the alliance thus first avowed, though Mr. Gorman's success in providing for his friends under this administration has heretofore given the strongest presumptive proof of its existence. The combination effected by Mr. Gorman was successful, and the draughtsmen's places on the new public buildings will hereafter be distributed among the retainers of Messrs. Gorman and Plumb.

PERMANENCE OF ISSUES.

The ebb and flow of a large class of public questions is well illustrated by Ex-Senator McDonald who says in an interview in the Indianapolis News of February 14:

"This tariff question," continued Senator McDonald, "is an evidence how history repeats itself. The first political speech that I ever made was at my old home in Crawfordsville, in Indiana. It was forty-four years ago, and President Polk was the candidate upon a tariff-for-revenue platform substantially the same as that of the democratic party during the last presidential campaign. During the Cleveland-Harrison campaign I made my last speech at Crawfordsville, and the chairman introducing me said that he did not believe an instance could be shown in our history of a man making two speeches for a presidential candidate forty-four years apart and advocating substantially the same issues. The first message of President Polk was substantially the same as the tariff reform message of President Cleveland, and it brought about the enactment of the tariff of 1846."

This has an important bearing upon the tendency of those interested in tariff reform to regard the question as new and their movement as original, and to claim for it paramount attention. In fact, as Mr. McDonald shows, they are but traveling the road traveled in 1844 and later, and which was then well beaten. Such questions as taxation and currency always have been and always will be living questions. They are questions which must be dealt with as we go along, just as the navy must be supported and the mails must be carried. The passage, however, of a currency bill or of a bill raising or lowering the tariff does not mark an epoch in the country's history. They are comparatively but temporary matters. Mr. McDonald is now doing over again the work he did in 1844. If he had then declared that the abolition of slavery was the most important public object to work for, he would have been told that the American people were opposed to it and that the tariff question was the one question of paramount importance. Yet how small the successful efforts which secured the tariff act of 1846 now seem. The spoils system, which is now such a curse to our cities, counties, states and the nation, once broken up will be like slavery, forever broken up. Its destruction will mark an epoch in our history. It is the great step now to be urged upon the people.

It must be urged in season and out of season—and especially out of season. No other question must be allowed to supersede it.

If the republican party lives only to secure * * * employment at public cost for place hunters, it will die because it ought to die, provided, of course, that there is something better to replace it, and sooner or later this will be forthcoming.

But will this something be the democratic party? Only the future will show, but there is some room for doubt. Thanks to the methods of republican politicians, the state senate of Indiana is now democratic by more than a two-thirds vote. Thanks to the conduct of this democratic majority, there will be little cause for wonder if in 1892, as in 1888, the electoral vote of Indiana is cast for a republican. A bill was recently introduced in that body to take the eight charitable institutions of the state out of politics. Of these four are refuges for the insane, one for feeble-minded youth, one for the blind, one for the deaf and dumb, and one for orphans of soldiers and sailors. An investigation, set on foot and in great measure carried on by the Civil Service Reform Association of Indiana some four years since, brought to light shameful abuses in the management of some among these institutions, and a narrative of the cruel and revolting outrages perpetrated on their helpless inmates by the political bummers and workers employed among their officers and attendants, excited a wide-spread indignation through the state, and caused some temporary improvement in their administration. The bill in question proposed to safeguard the state's responsibility for similar horrors in future by committing their control to a non-partisan board of state charities and recruiting their employes on the merit system. Its author, a Mr. Magee, is a democrat, and was minister to Sweden under the late administration. It received the cordial approval of the medical profession, of various public bodies and of all the best newspapers of the state regardless of party. Yet twenty-six out of thirty-three democratic senators voted against it on avowedly partisan grounds, and it was defeated by four votes. Within a few days a Connecticut forger has gone unwhipt of justice because Governor Hill, of New York, considered it was, in his own words, "good democratic politics" to refuse a requisition from the de facto governor of that state. In Indiana it is thought "good democratic politics" to turn over miserable lunatics and deaf mutes and friendless children of both sexes as prey for hangers-on of the local machine, many of them habitual criminals, whose brutal passions are known to have been indulged in the past with an utter disregard of decency or pity. It avails nothing to say that respectable democrats are disgusted with all this; respectable republicans are disgusted with Quay, and Dudley, and Clarkson, but they can not thus escape the disgrace and the danger of their fellowship. In either case the tree will be judged by its fruits. A party which commits power to such men as Hill and the Indiana senators must suffer and suffer rightfully for its abuse.—Civil Service Reformer, March, 1891.

THE defeat in the senate of Mr. Magee's bill for the government of the state benevolent institutions was as crushing as it was unexpected. The intelligence of the democratic party throughout the state was arrayed on Mr. Magee's side, and only the party bosses and parasites who draw sustenance from the public treasury opposed it. But the present legislature is thoroughly bourbon; it is literally covered with moss; it is as impervious to reform ideas as a duck's back to rain. Many expressions of regret at the failure of the Magee bill have been heard, and none are given more forcibly than by Hon. I. D. G. Nelson, of Fort Wayne, who writes to the editor as follows:

I have read, or at least have had the opportunity of reading, the Labor Signal since its establishment. By inheritance, education and instinct I have always been a democrat and a free-trader. But I have, also, if I have known myself, been a friend of the laborer. Hence, I became a subscriber to The Signal, and interested in its success, although not always approving of its policy. I am now too old to read much, or take much interest in the current politics of the day. But I do, nevertheless, even at the advanced age of over four score years, try to keep posted in regard to what is done at Washington and Indianapolis in regard to legislation, and I am compelled to say that I have never witnessed a more humiliating act of my party than the voting down of the Magee bill, that was so eminently calculated to vindicate the party, if not in the wrong, or, at least, to show that we are not opposed to the civil service experiments being tested in the great battle of reform in behalf of our common humanity.—Labor Signal, February 27.

THE Sentinel is right in rapping the democratic senators over the knuckles for their failure to support the Magee bill, which proposes to apply the principle of non-partisan appointments in our state benevolent institutions. Humanity demands that the state's wards should be placed in the hands of competent persons. The salaries of the attendants in the several benevolent institutions are limited, and it is impossible to get the proper help if it feels it must be kicked out at each election. Nor can the proper discipline be maintained where subordinates feel they owe their position to a political boss, and not on good behavior. The state is more interested in the efficiency of administration of our state institutions than in the politics of the subordinates. The Magee bill is right in principle, and must eventually be adopted. The democrats would have found considerable advantage in adopting it, now that the benevolent institutions are principally in the hands of the democrats.—Jeffersonville News, February, 1891.

SHAME upon a party that desires to continue as a sewer to the democratic party institutions provided for the helpless orphans, deaf and dumb and insane of the state.—Shelbyville Republican, February, 1891.

As to the efficiency, fidelity, and non-partisanship of General Corse as postmaster, every one admits that. Ex-Mayor Thomas N. Hart will in time probably become an efficient postmaster; but he is far from being non-partisan, and his appointment was made in preference to that of General Corse on party grounds alone. Of all the republican party candidates likely to get the post-office, perhaps Mr. Hart is the most capable and business-like. There is some difference of opinion among his own party as to his having exhibited any remarkable or unusual executive powers while mayor. As to civil service reform, Mr. Hart has always declared himself in favor of the reform; and he has never refused to obey the civil service law. In the only instance where he had an opportunity to prevent an invasion of the law by those under him he conspicuously failed to do anything, and yet at the same time he kept himself within the letter of the law and rules. As far as carrying out the spirit of the law to the offices to which the law does not apply, it is notorious that Mayor Hart appointed a street commissioner who would take in Meehan, the democratic politician and former street commissioner, who had thrown his influence over to Hart. There were other appointments to which we have made objection from time to time, as having all the appearances of consummations of trades and little or none of being for fitness only. Indeed, Mayor Hart has admitted their badness, and pleaded "pressure." There are one hundred and thirty-six positions in the Boston post-office exempted from the civil service rules.—Civil Service Record, March, 1891.

CURRENT SPOIL.

—A disturbance is threatened in the assembly. It is the old story, a quarrel over patronage. The speaker and clerk of the lower house are allowed by law the appointment of sixty officers. Contrary to precedent, when the announcements of appointments were read from the desk two months ago, the residences of the fortunate officers were not given. A good reason existed for this, as developments have shown. It was the deliberate purpose of Speaker Sheehan and Clerk DeFrest to prevent the assembly and the democratic bosses throughout the state from knowing that the debatable county of Erie and the iron-bound county of New York, the extreme counties in the state, had gobbled not only the best but 50 per cent of the appointments in the gift of the assembly. Erie ought to have been satisfied with the selection of speaker, but the speaker was not satisfied with the privilege of making personal appointments, but reached out and brought to Albany eleven of his constituents, who are now drawing salary from the state.

New York's share in the distribution of spoils is eleven also. Mayor Ed. Murphy, Jr., of Troy, chairman of the state committee, has corralled five of his heelers; while Boss McLaughlin made a demand for two places, which was promptly granted, one of the appointees emphasizing his feeling of security from interference by taking a two weeks' absence without leave, marked by a protracted drunk, during which the clerk of the assembly has had to shift to find a man to do the work assigned to McLaughlin's appointee.

The charge of nepotism has been raised against Col. George P. Webster, of the twenty-third New York district, who obtained the appointment of his son as clerk of the committee on privileges and elections and of his nephew as stenographer.—Albany, N. Y., Dispatch to the New York Times, March 8.

—As chairman of the committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. Ingalls has had at his disposal the position of clerk of the committee. Last night Mr. Ingalls removed the gentleman who has filled that office for several years, and is spoken of as a very capable and faithful clerk, and appointed in his place the senator's son. By this means young Mr. Ingalls will draw the salary of clerk to the committee from now until December, as his father's retirement leaves the committee without any chairman to make another change before the next congress meets.—New York Times, March 5.

—Every democrat on the floor of the assembly has pursued Sergeant-at-Arms Harrigan with wolfish greed to demand that his son or his nephew or the son or nephew of his friend be given one of the two-hundred-dollar sinecures. Harrigan was unable to discriminate between them, and he has been guilty of the folly of appointing a page for each. There are forty democratic assemblymen and, of course, forty pages.—Trenton, N. J., Dispatch to New York Times March 1.

—The state legislature is torn up over a scandal which throws the senatorial struggle into the background. Elgood Brunner, one of the leaders of the assembly, was charged to-day by the San Francisco Examiner with selling police positions in San Francisco for $400 each.

Brunner accused the correspondent of blackmail. He attempted to show that he knew of the correspondent's scheme to entrap him into recommending a man to the police commissioners for money, and that he accepted the offer so as to expose the correspondent.—Sacramento, Cal., Dispatch to New York Times, March 6.

—The administration, and especially the post-office department, is being scandalized in this city and state by the conduct of a man whom ex-Postmaster General Gresham once summarily discharged from the postal service, and who has done more to corrupt the politics of Nebraska than any other one man. State politicians declare that his pernicious influence must be shaken off, or the powers at Washington must take the consequence. Reference is made to Paul Vandervoort, ex-commander in chief of the grand army, ex-railroad lobbyist, and professional war veteran.

Upon request of the railway officials at Omaha the Nebraska delegation in congress a year or two ago put Vandervoort into a sinecure in the Omaha post-office. The title of the position is superintendent of local mails. Since the appointment of postmaster Clarkson of Omaha Vandervoort is said to have done absolutely nothing in the line of official duty. It is asserted that there is nothing for him to do; that he is drawing $1,500 a year as a reward for past services to the railroad managers, who must see that he gets a living lest he make damaging disclosures.

The legislature has been in session here for two months. Most of that time Vandervoort has been lobbying here for the telephone company and the telegraph company, to ward off a threatened reduction of tolls. He has also been working on a scheme to increase the liquor license, so that, if necessary, he might explain to the postmaster general that he had been really working for prohibition at Lincoln. Vandervoort has been incidentally looking after the interests of the railways and has not given an hour's time to the office he holds. This scandal is assuming such proportions that the postmaster general will be unable to explain the ease away. He created this soft berth for Vandervoort soon after taking the post-office portfolio, in the face of the fact that Vandervoort was dishonorably dismissed from the service, and for that reason was debarred from an appointment.

During the administration of President Arthur, and when Gen. Gresham was postmaster-general, Vandervoort's defiant neglect of duty and his pernicious interference in local and state politics became a state-wide scandal. He was dismissed from the service for neglect of duty and insubordination. He retaliated, and threatened Gresham with the thunderbolts of the grand army, and subjected him to vindictive abuse in the columns of the claim agents' paper, the National Tribune, for which Vandervoort had also played capper by reason of his temporary prominence in the grand army organization. Gresham was as firm as a rock, and would not recede.

From the railway mail service Vandervoort fell back upon his friends, the Union Pacific Railroad, and was kept upon the pay roll of that road for a year or two. During the legislature here four years ago he was in charge of the most venal and disreputable railroad lobby that has ever infested this city. The investigation into the conduct of the Pacific railroads, by the commission of which Gov. Pattison was the head, brought out the history of what is here called "the oil rooms" in strong relief. This testimony showed that the oil rooms were places where members of the legislature had been debauched with drink and were corruptly manipulated to defeat or carry measures as the railroad managers saw fit to decree. It was also brought out that Vandervoort maintained room 15 in a prominent hotel in this city during that session of the legislature; that every night, almost, cases of beer bottles, wine, and demijohns of whisky were carried there and consumed by Vandervoort and his special friends, and it has since been proved beyond question that the railroads paid not only the room rent but also the bar bill incurred by Vandervoort.—Lincoln, Neb., Dispatch to New York Times, February 22.

—The first important change in the treasury department under Secretary Foster was made to-day. Acting Secretary Nettleton accepted the resignation of Captain John G. MacGregor, the chief of the customs division of the secretary's office. Assistant Secretary Spalding, who is in charge of customs matters, said in reply to a question that there was nothing on the face of the resignation which showed that it was not voluntary. He refused to commit himself, however, to the statement that it was voluntary, and he and General Nettleton smiled significantly when the question was persisted in. General Nettleton said that Captain MacGregor had been appointed inspector of immigration at $6 per day. His salary as chief of the customs division was $2,750 per annum.

General Nettleton said there was no politics in the change, and if there had been Captain MacGregor would have been removed from the service altogether. It is rather significant, however, that Captain MacGregor is one of the few democrats left in the treasury department, and that he should be the first person to go so soon after the advent of Secretary Foster, whose skill as a politician is well-known. Captain MacGregor was in the customs service prior to the democratic administration, but he was promoted to the position he has just resigned by Secretary Manning when a vacancy occurred there.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, March 9.

—Joy is going to reign in the camp of the faithful in this town. News has come that the great men in Washington have heeded the prayer of the envoys who journeyed down from New York to tell them how badly good republicans needed that which a democrat was in a fair way to secure, just because he underbid the righteous. But, mingled with the rejoicings, there will be needless wasting of breath. The scramble for the plums will be too lively to allow that.

Two weeks ago gloom reigned among the republican workers. A terrible thing had come to pass. The bids for the custom-house cartage contract had been forwarded to Washington. Experts had spent days in figuring out the schedules and Thomas A. Briggs, the old contractor, who secured the job under a democratic administration, appeared to be the lowest bidder. Anywhere from $30,000 to $40,000 a year was what the contract was worth, and that was a great deal of money to be allowed to go out of the political family. Now, however, the treasury department has sent out a ruling that the cartage need not be let by contract, and the harps will be taken down from the willows.

Advertisements for bids for the contract brought eight answers. Briggs sent a bid; so did Bernard Biglin; so did six others. Of all of them Biglin was the ablest professional republican. Briggs was the lowest bidder, and then Col. Erhardt sent on the proposals to Washington. B. Biglin, patriot, was understood to be the second man in the race.

When news of this got out, there was a precious howdy-do. Statesmen rushed to the custom-house to see what kind of arithmetic was practiced there. The republican county committee was in a state of mind. It wanted to become popular with the truckmen's association for one thing, and the contract would have been a help—a great help.

There was just one hope left, and that lay in an appeal to the powers at Washington. Down to that city traveled a delegation full of persuasive eloquence and arguments touching the proper disposition of patronage where it would "do the most good." Apparently the party succeeded in making out a case; at least, the contract is not going to be awarded to Mr. Briggs.

The decision of the attorney general and the treasury department is just what the pilgrims to Washington wanted. They went there to get a change in the method of letting out the contract, and they got it. From now on they have merely to fight among themselves for the good things they expect to secure.—New York Times, March 3.

—The political atmosphere in the republican camp is just now pretty close and murky. A fight is in progress over the appointment of a postmaster never before equaled in the party. The office is the only one of importance in this part of the state held by a democrat.

The candidates for the position are many, but the fight has narrowed down to Joseph A. Ward, one of proprietors of the Lockport Journal, and John A. Merritt, ex-chairman of the county committee. The friends of the Journal, which paper has been the republican organ here for forty years and always supported the ticket, feel that the administration can ill afford to ignore their demands. Merritt is backed by a lot of politicians, and previously wanted the custom-house at the Bridge. It is understood that Senator Hiscock promised him his support for the post-office.

A large number of politicians have gone to Washington to-night.—Lockport, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, February 22.

—President Harrison has waited until the last night of the session to make a nomination that will disgust every decent citizen of Pennsylvania in general and of Philadelphia in particular. Late this afternoon he sent to the senate the nomination of the notorious William R. Leeds, of Philadelphia, to be marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

As sheriff of the county, a few years ago, and as leader of the ring which made the municipal government of Philadelphia a by-word and a reproach, Leeds made such a record that when he tried to be re-elected his own party defeated him, while carrying all the other offices by very large majorities. Leeds was the man Senator Quay picked out for postmaster of Philadelphia, but his record was so bad that even Mr. Wanamaker could not then indorse him. All the decent men in the republican party joined in sending protest after protest to Washington, and delegations of leading citizens visited the President and laid before him the exposures of his corruption, made by the citizens' committee, which undertook to save Philadelphia from the gang which, under Leeds's leadership, had taken her by the throat.

When it became known, a few weeks ago, that Quay was pushing Leeds for the marshalship, there was another deluge of protests from the respectable citizens, and the President was again fully informed of the character of Quay's candidate. But a change had come over the President and the postmaster-general, Mr. Wanamaker, who could not stomach Leeds a few months ago, now indorse him for marshal, and, in spite of assurances given to the Philadelphians that the President would not make such an utterly indefensible appointment, the nomination has been made.—Washington Dispatch in New York Times, March 3.

—The appointment of A. T. Anderson to the Cleveland postmastership to-day ends a bitter party fight, but will only make local dissatisfaction with the Harrison administration more extended, permanent and pronounced.

Anderson has been county recorder five years, and has still one year to serve. The annual fees of the office amount to $11,000. He has had a large share of public "pap," and for him to secure the postmastership besides is very galling to old party workers who have done far more than he for the party and received nothing for it.—Cleveland Dispatch to New York Times, March 3.

—There have been some racy developments to-day in connection with the senatorial canvass. The information comes from reliable sources that Hansbrough was compelled to make written pledges of the most extraordinary character to secure his election.

By the first agreement made Alexander McKenzie is to be consulted with reference to the distribution of the patronage throughout the state and no appointments unsatisfactory to him are to be made. Col. Ball and one or two others, trusted leaders in Fargo, are to control the patronage in that district, with McKenzie's consent. This power is to be used for the upbuilding of the element which started the war on Pierce, and is now supposed to be dominant in the state.—Bismarck, N. D., Dispatch to New York Times, January 28.

—Chief of police H. C. Austin and police captain Brant, republicans, both of whom were deposed by the democrats when the latter took hold of the reins of local government here January 1, will not remain long out in the cold, as comfortable berths have been obtained for them by ex-congressman Kean, the republican dispenser of government patronage in Union county. He has got both officers places as government weighers of the mails at Jersey City, at $3 per day. The retired republican city clerk Coleman will also be taken care of, as the sinking fund commissioners here will, it is said, appoint him to a position in the controller's department.—Elizabeth, N. J., Dispatch to New York Times, January 5.

—In the opinion of the best posted politicians in Syracuse, Gov. Hill has begun very promptly to get on good terms with the man who is to be his colleague in the United States Senate for the next two years. Nobody but Senator Hiscock, they believe, could have induced Mr. Hendricks to give his support to such a nomination as that of Pierce for insurance superintendent. It is perfectly well known here that Hiscock is extremely anxious to secure the re-nomination of Hendricks, who, if re-elected next fall, will have a vote for Hiscock's successor at Washington. The senator has made a thorough search of the district, and has found no man so available as Hendricks.

Recent events in political history here have been far from encouraging to Hiscock, whose anxiety to be his own successor is very great. Hendricks is the only strong man the senator can feel sure of controlling. His friends, indeed, will regard themselves as lost if Hendricks fails to be renominated. The office of superintendent of the Onondaga salt springs is the best bit of state patronage here. It carries with it a lot of minor appointments, such as inspectors and weighers, which are made absolutely by the superintendent, untrammelled by any civil service restrictions. This patronage can be made very useful in securing Mr. Hendricks' renomination if it can only be put into friendly hands. The anti-Cleveland democrats have long been greedy for the superintendency, and, as everybody knows, the Hiscock-Hendricks-Smith-Cowie faction of the Republicans is in hearty sympathy with the Hill men. These people have given evidence enough of this fact in the open alliance with the Hill crowd in the pending row between Mayor Cowie and some of the aldermen.

Nobody believes that Hendricks voted for Pierce without a consideration, or that Hiscock let him vote that way without an object of interest to the senator. Everybody believes that Hendricks has been promised the office of salt superintendent for either an out-and-out Hiscock republican or for a Hill democrat satisfactory to him who will live up to a bargain by which the superintendent's heelers shall aid in re-nominating Hendricks. With Hendricks in the state senate for one other term Hiscock would be certain of one very much needed vote when he asks the legislature to send him to Washington for another six years. Mr. Hendricks was likely to have a hard enough row to hoe as Hancock's candidate before this latest disgraceful deal. His vote for Pierce to-day will go a good way toward offsetting any benefit he may get out of the patronage of the salt superintendent's office.—Syracuse N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, February 11.

—Congressman-elect Henry U. Johnson spent several days in the city last week, with headquarters at the Kirby, where he kept open house. His visit ostensibly was for the purpose of finding the proper person to recommend for the appointment.

There were no less than ten applicants for the place, viz.: Major John F. Wildman, of the Muncie Times, a pioneer Harrison boomer, and a stayer for "Little Ben" in the Chicago convention; Charles F. W. Neely, of the Muncie News, a hustler for Johnson and an anti-Gregory delegate to the New Castle congressional convention; Robert I. Patterson, better known as "corporal Bob," campaign poet and ex-postmaster, who served the last two years of his term under the Cleveland administration; N. N. Spence, an attorney at law; Jerre Gerrard, secretary of the county central committee; James L. Streeter, a well-known business man; S. W. Hntler, an insurance and real estate agent; J. W. Ream, ex-chairman of the county central committee; Mrs. Kate Wilson, wife of S. A. Wilson, also an ex-chairman of the county central committee, and later cashier of the Burson banking company, but now an invalid; the Rev. Jacob W. Heath, father of Col. P. S. Heath, the well-known and talented Washington newspaper correspondent; and last, but by no means least, the Hon. Frank Ellis, mayor.—Muncie Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, February 2.

—The President sent to the senate this afternoon the nomination of Captain Frank Ellis to be postmaster at Muncie. In this he followed the recommendation of Congressman-elect Johnson and the wishes of a majority of the patrons of the office. Mr. Johnson went to Muncie a fortnight since, and remained three days, looking over the field and investigating the claims of the various aspirants, of whom there were more than a dozen. There was a spirited contest between the various factions, but at the last moment several of the aspirants requested Captain Ellis to consent to the use of his name as a compromise candidate. This he finally did, reluctantly, for he had never applied for an appointive office.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journals February 5.

—The bitterest political contest ever witnessed in this county came to an abrupt termination this morning by the announcement of the appointment of Mayor Frank Ellis as postmaster. In the congressional fight last spring, Delaware county had a candidate in the Hon. Ralph Gregory. The delegates from this county went to the convention instructed to vote for him as long as there was a chance for his nomination. When the delegates went to the convention at New Castle it soon developed that there was treachery in the Delaware delegation. Later developments proved that there was a bargain and sale of some of the delegates who were promised control of the political appointments in the county in the event that Henry U. Johnson was nominated. The conspiracy resulted in the demoralization of the Delaware county delegation and the election of Johnson.

Frank Ellis, who was yesterday appointed postmaster, defeated Gregory for the nomination. The matter created bad blood, and since that time there has been merry war here.—Muncie Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, February 6.

—John Blair is the sole survivor of Mr. Cleveland's appointments among the Indian agents. There are fifty-eight of these places, but they are now all filled with loyal republicans except the one where Mr. Blair serves and two which are in the care of army officers. This condition of affairs is not so very different from what it was after Mr. Atkins had been Indian commissioner awhile under President Cleveland. President Harrison found three men in the agencies whom President Cleveland found there. The showing was bad enough in either event, and the practical workings of the spoils system have shown how fatal it is to good administration. The men whom Mr. Cleveland appointed were beginning to become of some use to the department when the political wheel took another turn and a fresh lot of novices came into the service. President Harrison restored to the service three Indian agents who had been displaced by Mr. Cleveland, and there are now seven of the fifty-eight, including the two army officers, whose experience dates back of the 14th of March, 1889. Indian Commissioner Morgan has had nothing to do with the appointments except to make complaint where the new agents were conspicuously inefficient. This he has done in a number of cases, and President Harrison has removed five of his own appointees. This ratio of removals is a commentary upon the character of the appointments.—Boston Post, March 14.

—It is said that there are fifty-two ex-representatives and ex-senators in the city who expect to get appointments at one time in the office of Secretary Foster. This morning there were over a dozen representatives seeking official influence in procuring places for themselves. Many men elected to the congress which meets next December are already on the ground prowling around the departments for appointments. It will take the alliance and some of the democratic members a month, it seems, to learn that partisan patronage is not given out under this administration to persons who are plotting to break down the republican party.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, March 5.

—The triple loss of the Galena, the Nina, and the Triana, at Gay Head and Cuttyhunk, may prove to be not only a national but a political disaster.

The Galena was about the only ship available for repairs at Portsmouth. She was worth a good deal of money and she was to have been thoroughly overhauled at the hands of those persons in Maine and New Hampshire whose republicanism is stalwart enough to entitle them to employment under Uncle Sam. The wreck of the Galena will take bread out of the mouths of these employes and, of course, will make them irritable. Unless some other vessel can be found upon which to make political repairs, the uselessness of a navy yard at Portsmouth will be apparent, and a powerful political magnet will be destroyed.

At Portsmouth, the bureau of construction and repair was to spend $34,000 upon her, and the bureau of steam engineering about $45,000 for new boilers and other machinery. These boilers had been made at the New York navy yard, and the Galena had them on board. When the order was issued sending the Galena around to the Portsmouth navy yard for repairs, it was stated at the navy department that she was sent there because the New York yard was full of work, while the completion of the repairs on the Lancaster would leave the Portsmouth yard with no work on hand. This would have made necessary a reduction in force.

The Portsmouth yard is not supplied with the necessary machinery for repairing steel vessels, and, as the Galena was the only wooden vessel at the time awaiting repairs, she was sent around to keep the yard force in operation. Her old boilers were entirely useless, and she could not steam around, so she was taken in tow by the little 357-ton tug Nina, and carried on her deck the new boilers that were to be put in her at Portsmouth.

It looks now as if there was no way to avert the dreadful discharge of workmen at Portsmouth, unless the wrecked Galena can be floated up there and rebuilt, for there is only one other wooden vessel left in the North Atlantic—the Kearsarge—and though she is cruising around the West Indies in pretty fair condition, she can be called in by cable and sent up to keep the Portsmouth yard busy.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, March 16.

—A well-grounded opinion appears to have arisen that the Galena was in no condition to put to sea, and that her fate is what might have been expected, nothing more and nothing less. Even had the vessel been sound in the hull, going to sea in March without boilers or engines, loaded with a full battery and with ammunition for the Lancaster, and all this in tow of a single tug of limited strength, strikes the average sea-going man as extremely foolhardy.

Inquiry at the navy yard fails to show that the Galena's repairs were absolutely needed at this time, and even if they were, they could have been made at the Brooklyn navy yard as well as at Portsmouth. In the former yard there are three times the men and facilities of the Portsmouth yard, and as the docks were quite empty there was abundant room for the repairs to go on uninterruptedly. She was going to Portsmouth, say the officers at the navy yard, to get her new boilers. Three of these were stored on her spar deck at the time of the accident, and might have been fitted here as easily as at Portsmouth, if not more easily. The Brooklyn navy yard is engaged at present in shipping a lot of material to Philadelphia for the equipment of the Newark, and the question naturally arises, why could not the Portsmouth material have been shipped to New York?

The Portsmouth navy yard is not at Portsmouth, but at Kittery, Me., a small town just below Portsmouth and across the river. It was suggested to an officer yesterday that possibly Maine workmen needed employment by the government at this time; that the $100,000 expenditure promised for the Galena was a rich morsel for them, and that this offered a reasonable explanation of the hazardous attempt to give them the Galena. The proposition was not indorsed, but it plainly suggested something that naval officers have thought of many times before.—New York Times, March 17.

Your reference to the recent outbreak among the Sioux as affording convincing evidence of the necessity of a change in the manner of appointing the officials of the Indian bureau, leads me to say that I have not found in a very full examination of all the facts from all sources evidence of any deterioration in the Indian service.—The President to the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association, February, 1891.

PINE RIDGE AGENCY, S. D., Mar. 4, '91.

My Dear Mr. Welsh—It is evident that, sooner or later, under any agent, there would have been trouble at this agency. Dissatisfaction and disappointments, with actual hunger amounting almost to starvation with some, added to strong jealousy of the progressive party on the part of the old chiefs and heathen element, had prepared the people for the ghost-dance craze.

Dr. Royer took charge when the people were at the worst as regards hunger. Nearly all supplies were exhausted. Instead of three and one-half pounds gross per day, the individual ration provided by treaty, they were getting less than one pound. The issue got as low as one two-year old steer to sixty persons for eighteen days, instead of one good sized steer to thirty persons for fourteen days, which had been the practice, though itself less than the treaty gave.

Flour, sugar and coffee were exhausted. The traders supplied them sometimes; whole corn was issued in place of them sometimes. Indians were living on wild turnips and buying food if they could. Several instances are given (Miss Goodale gives one) in which Indians begged for the corn being fed to the horses, and on its being given them they parched and ate it eagerly. They said frequently, "our Great Father had better kill us outright, than in this slow manner." There can be no doubt of much actual suffering from,

if not deaths hastened by, hunger. Yet the people do not appear to have entertained hostile intentions at that time toward the government or the whites, and I meet occasionally Indians and half-breeds who insist that hunger had nothing to do with the trouble, which came after the troops appeared here.

Major Gallagher had made several ineffectual efforts to stop the ghost-dance, and with his police had been defeated in the attempt, arousing to some extent the hostility of the ghost-dancers toward the police. There was still no sign of their having hostile feelings toward the whites. Had that been the case, they had abundant opportunity to show it against whites continually passing back and forth. Or as Dr. Gillycuddy said: "If they had been on the war-path, they would have had half a dozen cow boys for breakfast each morning."

Things had gone so far, however, that they were in a very critical condition, and needed very wise and careful handling, when Dr. Royer was sent as agent. He knew nothing about Indians or about handling men generally. He came with the expectation of soon needing to call for troops, which he did at once and secretly when the first little trouble arose over the arrest of an Indian for killing a cow which did not belong to him. He fled with his family to Rushville without warning any one else, and meeting one of the agency traders there, tried to persuade him to remove his family at once, as he said the Indians were "on the war-path" and about to burn the agency and kill all the whites. There were a large number of Indians in Rushville at that very time (the day the troops reached there) after freight for the agency. He returned with about 1,000 soldiers by a forced night march, constantly cautioning Gen. Brooke, in command, to keep scouts out ahead as he was sure they would meet one or more parties of "hostiles" in ambush before they got to the agency. Not an Indian was discovered, nor were there any Indians in or near the agency when they arrived. The greatest astonishment, curiosity and indignation prevailed among all, even the quietest Indians, when they heard that soldiers had been sent to their agency. They could put no interpretation on it except the intention was to disarm and dismount them all as had sometimes happened to portions of their people before, and as they had been frequently told by some would some day happen to them all. Especially the ghost-dancers thought this.

When General Brooke arrived he requested Dr. Royer to send his police out and ask all the Indians to come in that he might have a talk and understanding with them. Royer, of his own accord, instructed the police to tell the people that only those who had taken no part in the ghost-dance would be allowed to come in—the rest must stay away. The police seem to have gone beyond Royer's instructions, and told them also that this separation was in order that the soldiers might disarm the ghost-dancers and take all their horses. The country was thus left in possession of the ghost-dancers—no one being at home to protect the property of those who had been invited and gone to the agency. The ghost-dancers were convinced that there was probably no way out of it for them but by fighting. The Brules came along just then in very large numbers, filled with the same alarm, and a growing hostility toward the police and such men as American Horse, who had urged the agent to send for soldiers, sprung up, and altogether they concluded to take refuge in the Bad Lands.

Louis Shangreau and Little Bat volunteered to go and persuade the ghost-dancers along White Clay to come in. General Brooke told them to get horses from the agent and go, if they were not afraid. They replied that there was no more danger then than there ever had been; that the Indians had no hostile intent, but were only frightened. They went to Agent Royer and he refused the horses, saying those Indians were all "hostile," and were going to kill everybody, and he did not want them to go and try to bring them in. They went, however, and got Little Wound, who at that time was there, and some others, to come in. On reaching the agency they found the gate guarded by police, with orders from the agent not to let any Indian pass. Little Wound and the rest were very indignant, and "ashamed," and went back saying, they would not go in now even if the agent gave them permission.

The first blood shed in the late Sioux war was by ranchmen on the Cheyenne, who killed a Carlisle boy who, with several other Indians, had gone from the camp in the bad lands to buy tobacco, sugar, etc., at a store near by. They were fired on and he was shot before they reached Dailey's ranch. Still the Indians did not even attempt to avenge this, and no hostile act was committed by them off the reservation and no depredations, though they had abundant opportunity. They did commit very serious depredations on the property of those Indians who had gone into the agency, and for this it would appear, as well as for the troubles which then began to multiply, Dr. Royer more than any other person is responsible, and that through his want of tact and his cowardice.

Had he called the supposed "hostiles" in and left the "friendlies" out to protect their homes, it is likely the trouble would have been sooner over and the loss of life and property much less.

As for his management of the agency, most of those here speak of him as pleasant, gentlemanly in bearing, and full of schemes for the betterment of the Indians, etc., but very nervous and cowardly. He brought a number of new employes with him and offended quite generally by some of the changes made, chiefly at the blacksmith shop. The former blacksmith being a good man and good smith and the new man unable through lameness to do the work. Meanwhile Edgar Firethunder, a Carlisle graduate, who from six or more years experience as apprentice was fully competent to take charge of the shop and did, in fact, do about all the work—the blacksmith not being able to shoe a horse—had his wages cut down from $30 to $25 per month, and the white smith got $75. Young Frank Conroy, who had learned the machinists trade at and near Carlisle, had earned $3.25 per day at the east, and came with highest testimonials from his employers at York, Pa., as blacksmith, etc., was refused employment because the place was to be filled by a white man.

When Miss Goodale recommended a teacher whom she knew to be competent, for Royer's endorsement, he replied that he was sorry but he intended giving that place to a woman whose "husband had been of great service to him." She asked if the person had ever taught or was well qualified, and he replied she had never taught but was intelligent, and he thought she could fill the place well enough, and repeated, "her husband has been of great service to me and I intend she shall have it." She got it. The fact as near as I can get at it is that Royer and Gleason were both political strikers for Pettigrew and Moody. They were both candidates for this agency. It was finally decided that Royer should have the agency and Gleason be the clerk. After a few days' instruction under the then clerk, it was evident to Mr. Gleason and the rest that he had not the ability to fill the clerk's place, and he took the place of farmer, which he still holds, though with hopes of getting the Rosebud agency or some other, as agent.

It is said by Dr. McGillycuddy, on the authority of some official in Washington, that Royer's letters and dispatches to the interior department are the best kind of evidence against himself as to fitness for his place.

* * * * *

I expect to reach Rosebud Saturday, the 7th. The country is full of snow and it is now very difficult to get about much. Will go from there to see Dr. McChesney and thence to Santee and Yankton agencies.

In order to see Gen. Miles and the leaders of the hostile party, with some important scout, I ought to go to Chicago and Camp Sheridan near there. Please write me on receipt of this if you wish me to do so.

I shall not stay long at Rosebud, probably, and think you better address me care Rev. Mr. Wicks, Hope School, Springfield, S. D.

Cordially yours, WM. J. CLEVELAND.

At the examination for clerks and carriers for the Indianapolis post-office held here February 3, of the nine eligibles for clerkship four were from the city and five were from other parts of the state as follows: Eck, Lebanon, Anderson, Zionsville, and Brightwood. This is the competitive system—open to all and the test is fitness and nothing else. Contrast this with the scramble and pressure for places in the police and fire departments where a thousand applicants besiege the office of one member of the board of public safety upon whose favor they believe the appointments depend.

IN the death of Postmaster Wallace, the public service has suffered a loss. When he first became postmaster, there was a serious misunderstanding as to his powers and duties. After that was settled, he took up his duties with the single purpose of performing them in accordance with the law and with his oath of office. His execution of the civil service law has been a model of fairness and justice. Following this execution his office reached a degree of accuracy and capability of accomplishing work far beyond what had ever been known in this city before. His course enhanced the general respect in which he was held.

THE Fassett report says:

"The effect of the law is generally to exclude the absolutely unfit. More than this can not be said. We always come back to the elective officers and the heads of the departments. If the people err in their choice of elective officers, or if the mayor errs in the appointment of heads of departments, the civil service laws are powerless to counteract the error. They are easily circumvented, and wherever a motive exists so to do, they are disregarded in the spirit if not in the letter. In New York City the offices are still, almost without exception, from the highest to the lowest, the prizes of political life and the rewards of party service. The remedy for this, however, lies not with the legislature, but with the people themselves."

There is no excuse for such powerful civil service reform associations as those of New York and Brooklyn permitting such a state of affairs to exist. There is no reason why the civil service statutes should not be enforced in New York as thoroughly as in Indianapolis. That they are thoroughly enforced in this city is due to the repeated and detailed exposure of violations. Why does not the New York association grapple with Tammany Hall? A series of reports showing the facts connected with special cases would in two or three years tire out even Tammany Hall.

THE talk of the young men's republican club, of Massachusetts, has an exceedingly refreshing sound. At its meeting Secretary Tracy found a congenial audience to hear his statement of the greatest measure of reform under this administration. In putting forward its president, Roger Wolcott, to speak its sentiments, the club declared itself opposed to vague and shadowy generalities, and it recognized the fact that public progress is made by bold and outspoken honesty in relation to public affairs. It is a new thing for a great republican club to declare against Dudleyism and Quayism and to recognize civil service reform as the leading issue.

THE league of republican clubs in session in Cincinnati heard a speech from its retiring president, John M. Thurston, in favor of civil service reform. Then it proceeded to ignore this former republican doctrine and put the seal of its condemnation upon it by unanimously electing Headsman Clarkson as its president. Nothing could be more specific, and there is no opportunity for misunderstanding. President Harrison's office-holders from this city, District Attorney Chambers and his assistant, Cockrum, went over to help in this convention of buccaneers, and, meanwhile, the United States court here stopped business and waited for them.

It seems by the Civil Service Reformer that instead of a "dinner" to show appreciation of Gorman, money for a silver service is being raised and that the thirty-five hundred dollars necessary are coming in with painful slowness. This is the most encouraging sign for reform in Maryland apparent in many a day. We give this tribute with the more pleasure from having held the private opinion that Maryland totally eclipsed Indiana in total political depravity; that it was more boss ridden, had a bigger and lower-down band of political henchmen; and a Better Element even more hide bound in party bigotry. And yet it is fair to say that the bulk of civil service reformers regard Indiana as a state given over to spoils, with its population as a class entirely indifferent to any other form of government.

OF the death of Dr. Howard Crosby, the Society for the Prevention of Crime truthfully says:

"Our president counted himself a debtor to every citizen of New York. This he did because he respected every man as his brother committed to his care by the common Father. He met his death in part as preacher, educator, author, honest taxpayer, and voter. Still he counted himself debtor to aid specially the magistrates in two ways; first, encouraging, assisting, and constraining them to execute existing laws; second, in securing better laws.

His life and practice were a steady condemnation of that large class of clergymen who think that to do anything or say anything specific for political improvement is "preaching politics," and therefore unbecoming.

AT a dinner recently given by the Massachusetts Reform Club, Mr. Herbert Welsh, speaking of the Indian service, said:

Under the last administration, out of fifty-eight Indian agents fifty-three were removed from office during the four years. Under this administration, after its two years of power, but one Indian agent appointed by President Cleveland remains. There was, virtually, a clean sweep among the minor positions under the democratic administration; under the republican administration, though I can not speak confidently of all, of many places the same may be said. Under the democratic administration the fact that Mississippi and Tennessee supplied the appointees was the jest of the Indian country; under this administration by the "Home Rule" policy the senators and representatives of the states and territories in which the reservations are situated control appointments. Recently, at one reservation the agent, physician and virtually all the employes were away at one time electioneering for the senator who had given them their places. The affairs of this agency have been in a deplorable condition. At this point, writes a reliable correspondent, from personal observation, "the boys' school is a disgrace to the service."

To this, Mr. S. B. Capen, answered that "President Cleveland was determined to make improvements but he was betrayed by his subordinates." It would seem that sometime we ought to hear the end of such excuses. No president is deceived by his subordinates. President Cleveland had before him the fullest information given by Mr. Welsh, just as it has been given to President Harrison. The way to help on reform is to face the facts and not make excuses where there is no excuse. Mr. Moorfield Storey stated the whole case when he said in the closing speech, "The men who handle the throttle are to be held responsible."

THE executive committee of the National Civil Service Reform League have passed resolutions asking the civil service reform association of Maryland to investigate and report the recent charges of the unwarrantable interference of federal office holders in the primary elections of the republican party lately held in Baltimore.

THE steady persistence of the Civil Service Record has at last goaded Mr. Porter, United States census commissioner, into furnishing specimens of his examination questions, which he stated to be superior to the civil service examinations. These are printed in the April number of the Record side by side with those used by the state of Massachusetts for census clerks for the state census. Since Mr. Porter simply tested such political favorites as were already designated for appointment, his "examination" falls within a class which long ago was proved worthless.

THIS city may, in time, own and operate a gas fuel plant, a water plant, a light plant, a street car plant, and other property of great general necessity and importance. But not one such ownership and management is to be thought of for a moment while places in the city service are filled by the mere arbitrary choice of appointing officers. It is the universal experience that such choice runs along the lines of personal and party favoritism. Every new place that is added only adds to the power of some boss.

PAUL VANDERVOORT, ex-commander of the grand army, professional office holder and political hanger-on, has apparently left the republican party and thus writes about it:

"I saw a party, born amid peril in the nation's hour of agony and baptized with the red blood of heroes who perished for liberty, go back on the golden words of Abraham Lincoln, who said: 'We will care for him who bore the burden of battle, his widow and orphan.' I am going to leave a party which in this state simply represents a streak of rust exuding from the iron bands of 5,000 miles of railway, and has for its foundation the rotten, ravenous, robbing, blackmailing band of cormorants and vultures of the penitentiary ring. I am going to join a party where pious frauds like John Wanamaker can not buy a cabinet office with the largest contribution to the campaign fund."

Vandervoort is the man who was a chief clerk in the railway mail service in 1883, and who was then dismissed by Postmaster-General Gresham for having been absent from his post 265 out of 310 working days. Under Postmaster-General Wanamaker Vandervoort was appointed superintendent of mails at Omaha. While drawing $1,500 a year in that position he has been in Lincoln, some seventy miles away, lobbying in the legislature for various corporations. Wanamaker has certainly been liberal with him, at the public expense, and must now be pondering upon the baseness of ingratitude. He can not say that he was not informed. He was fully informed at the start, and that he should keep Vandervoort in face of the facts made him seem to the public as he now seems to Vandervoort, a "pious fraud."

A New York correspondent writes:

I wish to express to you my hearty concurrence in your opinion that "all other reforms should be subordinated to civil service reform," and my sympathy with your article under that heading in the last number of the CHRONICLE. The politicians will always fight with or for the machine; and after our experience under all administrations, republican and democratic alike, we may as well give up hope of real aid to the civil service reform movement from that quarter. But the citizen and voter is not bound to the machine, and, in proportion to his intelligence, is more or less free from party shackles. If, among the people, we can induce those who believe in civil service reform to subordinate all others to it, our victory will be near, and I hope you will iterate that opinion in each issue of the CHRONICLE.

The question is one between permanent issues and shifting issues. An issue like slavery lasts until slavery is overthrown. In the scale of human progress and good government nothing outweighs it. The spoils system is its twin. There is no doubt that in the latter case, as in the former, parties watch for and seize upon shifting or temporary issues, like taxation or currency, and run campaigns upon them, when all the time the main object of their struggle is to get hold of the offices as spoil. We have examples of this in the silence of the Cleveland democrats as to what will be done with the offices if he is elected in 1892, and in Mr. Cleveland's own silence upon the subject of civil service reform, although he writes much for the public, and in President Harrison, who, after dividing 100,000 offices among his friends in two years, which is more booty than the czar of Russia divides in ten years, is now traveling over the country and never mentioning the management of the federal service, although, under the constitution, this is his greatest and almost his only duty. Civil service reformers will not allow this question to be evaded or tabled by partisan talk that some other issue is the great issue.

"EQUALLY DIVIDED POLITICALLY."

The board of public safety, composed of three commissioners, and having control of the police and fire divisions of the city, is busy making appointments and putting in force its interpretation of the silly provision of the new charter, which says of the police and fire forces, "Provided, That said forces shall be, as nearly as possible, equally divided politically." The result is that in both divisions experienced and efficient men have been dropped to the inevitable detriment of the city service, with the accompanying misfortune to them of being, without cause, deprived of an opportunity of earning support for their families. Of one of these the Indianapolis News, of April 17, said:

The board of public safety saw fit to relieve police officer G. W. McCain of his position. McCain has been a member of the force for years and has made many friends among business men, for he is a man of irreproachable character, and has been of great value in his work, particularly in trying to make something better than they promised out of the newsboys and bootblacks whom he had to look after. In every respect he has been a model police officer.

That "pulls" and "influence" are having their way is shown by the fact that, while such men as McCain are dropped "to equalize the force between parties," fifteen new republicans have been appointed. Turning to the fire department, Commissioner Holt says:

The law says the department must be divided equally as to politics. There are no ifs about it. It is obligatory. When this board took charge of the fire department there were forty-eight more republicans than democrats, and we set about to make them even. We dropped out six republicans and put in six democrats. But still there were thirty-six more republicans than democrats, and that is the shape it is in now. The board determined that it would not cripple the department by making wholesale removals. The finances of the city bothered us a good deal, and we had several meetings on the subject, and, at last, decided that we had better strain the financial question a little, rather than put green firemen in to endanger the property and lives of the citizens. We talked with business men and property-owners, and with one accord they agreed to our plan—increase the fire department by putting on fourteen democrats, that fourteen experienced firemen, who are republicans, might remain—and this we have done. There are yet eleven republicans to be removed, and this will be done as soon as the circumstances will permit.

This is a fine exhibition of municipal government. Out of the devotion of the board to what it has picked out as its first duty, we are paying fourteen green democratic firemen of whom apparently we have not the least business need. If the board can leave for a moment its work of giving places in the fire and police divisions to republicans and democrats, we should like to ask it what "equally" means. If an estate is to be divided equally among heirs it goes in equal parts to all whether they are two or twenty. Now by what right does the board give places only to republicans and democrats? If you ask Commissioner Holt what his politics are, he will say he is a democrat and belongs to the democratic party. Commissioner Catterson will answer in like manner that he is a republican. But to this question Eli Ritter will say "I am a prohibitionist and belong to the prohibition party." Now here is a third political division of the people, to say nothing of other like divisions; and it is such a division as is contemplated by statutes when speaking of political parties. By what right does the board ignore the prohibitionists? By what right does it ignore the national labor party? Will the board say that, politically, men are only divided into republicans and democrats? The supreme court would not say so and the statutes have repeatedly recognized other parties. The supreme court very likely would say that this clause of the law is impossible of execution and unconstitutional and void. It is time for the mayor to interfere and put an end to this humbug. These places should be thrown open to competition and not left to be filled by the favoritism of any board. If the mayor will investigate the manner of choosing firemen and policemen, say in Boston, Buffalo and Brooklyn, and will prepare a set of rules providing for open competition and require this board to put them in force, he will be supported by the people.

STREET CLEANING.

The hand of the great and rich city of New York has for years become paralyzed whenever raised to clean the filth off its streets. Finally, in January last, Mayor Grant wrote to Morris K. Jessup, Thatcher M. Adams, Charles Chandler, David H. King, Jr., and F. V. Green, all prominent citizens of the city, and asked them to find out what was the matter. They gave the subject the greater part of their time for eight weeks, and made a report covering 153 printed pages. They say a large increase in the working force of the street cleaning department is necessary, but they also say, "We recommend this increase provided the entire force of the department is brought within the control of the civil service regulations, as suggested in previous portions of this report, but not otherwise." After setting out the Boston labor system in full, the committee says: "It has been in use in Boston several years, and has effectually abolished the patronage abuse."

Speaking of the present method of hiring men to work upon the streets, the committee says: "They are appointed and removed principally at the whim of persons unconnected with the department, making requests to that effect. They are selected without reference to their ability to do the given work for which they are employed and are liable to be discharged without good business reasons therefor." They quote from a banker who had watched the work on Fifth avenue daily for seven years, and who said: "I don't hesitate to say that, as a general rule, four able bodied men could in the same time, without extra exertion, accomplish the work of any ten men that I watched."

This is Indianapolis over again. Ever since anybody can remember the street cleaning force of this city has been made up of hangers-on of councilmen and other politicians. No one can be found who will say that this force ever pretended to do a day's work. We spend about one thousand dollars a week in this department and have nothing but filthy streets to show for it. If the mayor and board of public works want to render this city a service, let them see that able-bodied men are employed upon the streets and that when there they do a day's work in a day. The only way that this can be done is by the abolition of favoritism and partyism in the selection and to this end the Boston system is the only means. This is simply a system of registration on the plan of first come first served, without regard to politics or color. The requirements are such that unworthy men can not get upon the registers. In taking men from the registers for employment those who have families have a preference and in a few other cases there is a preference. Thus a few simple rules would shut scalawags and dead beats out of the city employ and give the work to honest and industrious men.

THE MONTH'S REFORM.

Civil service reform has taken a great leap forward during the month. The President has closed a very wide back door by revoking the rule which permitted promotion into the classified service without competition after serving two years in the unclassified service.

A beginning has at last been made toward taking the Indian service away from the spoilsmen. The Indian School Service and the agency physicians have been, by order of the President, embraced within the civil service law. The list includes about 700 places, and the move will effectually stop the quartering of all manner of broken down politicians upon the Indians as teachers and doctors. It was a mistake not to follow out the first intention and include the farmers. There is no class of employes where severe tests would give better results, and in no case have the Indians been worse swindled than in the men who have been sent to them as "farmers." That these were left out seems to be due to Secretary Noble. This order does not affect the great mischief making power among the Indians. That lies in the agents and in those officers who attend to the pecuniary affairs of the Indian. So long as these are men holding by a precarious tenure and in the meantime "on the make," just so long we shall hear of wars and rumors of wars. Nevertheless, when we add the new regulations for the navy yard, mentioned elsewhere, the whole makes a very gratifying month's progress.

SECRETARY TRACY AND THE NAVY YARDS.

The thanks of the country are due to Secretary Tracy for having inaugurated a reform of such great importance in the navy yards that it almost marks an epoch in the reform movement. The navy yards have been for many decades the most vicious development of our vicious system of managing the federal service. From Norfolk to San Francisco they have been rendezvous for men whom the Sim Coys of local politics want to quarter upon the government to pay them for past and future services. Secretary Tracy first announced his scheme at a recent meeting of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, and in every line of his announcement he displays a thorough understanding of the evil and a thorough mastery of the way to destroy it. He says:

One last point in naval affairs remains to be considered, the question of the employment of labor at the navy yards. For fifty years this has been the one weak spot in naval administration. Whatever the party in control of the government, it seems hitherto to have been powerless to exclude political influence in the employment of navy yard labor. It is not enough, apparently, that the mechanics and workmen in the government shops should be republicans or democrats; they must wear the collar of the ward bosses who run the local political machine. The practice is a source of demoralization to any party that attempts to use it, destructive to the government service, and debauching to local and national politics. It is an ulcer on the naval administrative system, and I propose to cut it out. My attention has been directed for some time past to the system adopted here in the city of Boston for the selection of laborers employed upon the city work. I have caused an exhaustive study to be made of that system by which you have largely succeeded in eliminating politics from municipal labor, and I believe that, by an extension and modification of it, the same result can be made reasonably certain in the government navy yards.

The details of the system which I propose to adopt are now being prepared, and in a short time will be in full operation. Its essential features, as applied to the navy yards, are: First, the appointment, at each yard, of a registration board to register all applicants for employment in the department of unskilled labor, to be selected as required on the principle of "first come, first served," preference only given to those who have had experience in the class of work for which they apply; to those who have served in the army or navy; to those who have families to support, and where all other considerations are equal, to those possessing superior physical qualifications. Second, the registration of all applicants for positions of skilled labor who can give evidence of experience at their trade, to be certified in the order of their application under the same rules of preference, and their employment on trial for a period of probation after the necessary test of proficiency, to be ultimately graded or discharged according to their merits; and third, the selection of foremen upon competitive examination, so conducted as to bring out their fitness and qualifications for the positions they seek, open to all comers who can show the requisite experience. The boards will consist of officers of the navy engaged in conducting the work of the yard.

I propose, in carrying out this new system, so to regulate it that three ends shall be secured: First, free and open competition; second employment upon grounds of merit, to be determined by non-partisan experts engaged in and responsible for the work, and third, absolute publicity of every detail. And having begun in the way I have indicated, I do not propose to stop until the principle of efficiency and worth is the only test of navy yard employment. I am satisfied that such a system will be in the interest, not only of the work, but of the workingmen; that it can be carried out so that it will remove not only all machine politics from the navy yards, but all suspicion of machine politics; that the economy and efficiency of the work will be promoted, while the community will be sure that a navy yard in its midst, instead of being a focus of local political intrigues, is the place of employment of a body of independent and self-respecting workmen, whose only road to promotion lies in good work, and in whom slackness, indolence or bad habits will surely lead to discharge. [Cheers.]

Whether the present civil service law is the best that could be devised to improve the civil service of the country, I do not know. But this I do know from personal observation in my own department, that the persons appointed under this system are unquestionably more efficient as a whole than those selected under any system of pure patronage; and I know further that no republican charged with the responsibility of administering one of the great executive departments of the government can be true to himself, to the faith of the republican party, or to the people of this great nation, whose servant he is if he fails to employ any and all means within his power to elevate, purify and render more efficient the civil service of the country. [Great applause.]

He has followed this talk with an order vacating the positions of foreman and master mechanic in the Brooklyn navy yard and appointing a board of naval officers to hold a competitive examination, open to all comers throughout the United States, for candidates to fill the vacancies. Of this, the exceptionally well informed Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post, says:

Capt. F. M. Bunce is commandant of the station at New London. He was the first officer put in command of a ship in the new navy—barring the Dolphin. He was chairman of the second board appointed to report a site for a naval station on the Gulf of Mexico, and his whole record is that of a progressive, thorough wide-awake man.

Chief-Engineer David Smith ranks very high in the mechanical and scientific branches of the service. He is an expert on metals generally, and is regarded as the first authority in the United States Navy on the subject of steel.

Commander Charles O'Neill is the present superintendent of the gun-shops at the navy-yard here, having succeeded Folger when the latter was promoted to be chief of the ordinance bureau. He has had exactly the kind of experience which will enable him to judge of the men employed in the yards elsewhere as well as in this city, and the state of mind to which the political hclers here have reduced him by their importunities and threats has made him an enthusiastic reformer.

Commander F. E. Chadwick is in command of the Yorktown. He was for some time naval attaché of the American Legation in London. During that period the information which he furnished the bureau of naval intelligence at the department here gave the bureau its first dignity, and is thought to have done more than any other one thing to establish its success.

Naval Constructor Francis T. Bowles, now in charge of the construction work at the Norfolk yard, is one of the ablest and brightest young officers in the service. He has been in hot water with the bosses ever since he took hold at Norfolk, all because he would not submit to their dictation, but he is a hard fighter, and has come out ahead, as the secretary's present evidence of appreciation shows. Mr. Bowles is a relative of the late Samuel Bowles, of Springfield. He was graduated at the head of his class at Annapolis, and took high honors at Greenwich, Eng., whither he was sent by the government to complete his education.

Lieut. William B. Caberton, the recorder of the examining board, has been for four years past a member of the steel inspection board. He is likely to receive the command of the Miantonomoh as soon as she is put in commission again.

When we compare this board of officers with the Mikes and the Jakes and the Barneys who have for generations named the employes of the Brooklyn navy yard, we begin to get a faint glimmering of how the country has been robbed and swindled, and of how Brooklyn citizenship has been degraded. Other navy yards are to be taken in order. Secretary Whitney once issued a fine sounding order with regard to navy yard employment and then privately sent a messenger to say that it might be disregarded. Secretary Tracy will not do this, and having the authority and knowing the way to overcome this abuse, it is proper that he should pursue his own course. We must urge him, however, in the light of all past reform experience, not to go out of office leaving the continued execution of this reform to the discretion of his successor. To be of any permanent value it must be put beyond the reach of future secretaries with friends to reward, and this can only be done by inducing the President to put the navy yards under the civil service law. No change from Secretary Tracy's plan will be necessary. The boards of naval officers would remain and the system of registering laborers, which is the Boston system, would be the same. These, with open competition, constitute the reform, and by taking measures to perpetuate it, Secretary Tracy would erect an enduring monument to his great service to the country.

ANECDOTES OF A CHRONIC OFFICE HOLDER.

Chester R. Faulkner was a member of the lower house of the late general assembly. He attracted attention on account of his opposition to appropriations which seemed to average people necessary to the ordinary efficiency of the state government. For instance, to the proposition to relieve the supreme court by additional judges or by a new court, Faulkner said:

"Let them judges take down them spring beds and go to work." This referred to certain beds which the out-of-town judges have in their chambers at the capitol. It is not to be inferred that rope beds and feather ticks were to be substituted, but that the judges were to be cut off from all chance of sleeping in their chambers. When the question of salary for the state librarian came up it was proposed to make it $1,500, but Faulkner stood stubbornly for $1,000. Such Spartan virtue led wicked and envious people to look into Faulkner's past to see what meat he had fed on to produce such a development. It seems that under the late administration, Senator Voorhees kept Faulkner steadily under government pay. His first position was that of clerk of the committee on additional appropriations to the library of congress at six dollars a day. This committee had one bill referred to it in seven years. Then he became chief of the records division of the pension office at $2,000 a year. While in this position he asked the superintendent of the railway mail service to transfer a clerk so that he could work and vote in Indiana at an approaching election. Being refused, he wrote an impertinent letter derogatory of the administration, for which Secretary Vilas demanded his resignation. Faulkner refused to resign until he had seen Congressman Voorhees, who appointed him, and the latter forthwith bullied Vilas into backing down.

It is claimed that Faulkner's sole performance of duty in this last position consisted in tapping his bell three times at noon and again at night. The first tap was for the clerks to put away pens, the second, to rise, and the third, to march out. One other duty performed, however, is related of Faulkner. His young men and women clerks were apt to converse in the corridors at noon, and to meet this emergency he prepared and hung up a large placard having upon it the notice, "No Lofeing in the Corduroys." Harrison's administration dispensed with his services and then Voorhees seems to have quartered him upon the senate again, as until some months ago he was on the congressional pay-roll as folder in the senate document room.

THE INDIANAPOLIS SYSTEM.

The system by which the board of public safety gets at the merits of applicants for police appointments is instructive. The men are called in one by one and are solemnly told that they are not compelled to answer the questions, but that it would be best to do so; and further, that any false answer would cause dismissal if found out after appointment. Commissioner Holt has prepared the questions, which are as follows:

- 1. Have you ever had any trouble with any one in the city?
- 2. Were you ever arrested?
- 3. Do you drink whisky?
- 4. Do you get drunk?
- 5. Do you ever do anything that you think would be unbecoming to a policeman?

This test is followed by selection for appointment, and then the appointee goes through some sort of a medical pass examination. There is no athletic examination.

Now against this ridiculous and farcical "examination" we set some actual examination tests which have been used in Boston and Brooklyn for selecting patrolmen. It must be remembered that these examinations are competitive. The board can not make a public show of "examinations" and then in making appointments secretly give rein to favoritism and "pulls." The names are listed according to success in the competition, and the board must take the men accordingly. The information afforded by these examples is commended to the board of public safety and to those framers of the charter who claimed that if there was a modern improvement to be found in municipal government in this country which they had not secured "it must have been discovered within the last three months."

16. Have constables in Boston the same criminal power as police officers?

17. Have licensed private detectives the power to make arrests?

18. Have police officers the right to serve a bastardy warrant? If so, when?

19. How can a Boston officer legally serve a warrant in Boston issued by a court in Worcester or Springfield?

20. Name the offenses that the members of the board of police can make arrests for personally without a warrant?

21. What is a writ of "habeas corpus?"

22. What is the meaning of "nol. pros?"

Physical Examination.

(Blank to be filled out by the applicant.)

I [write your full name] —, hereby declare that the answers to the following inquiries touching my personal and family health, history, habits and antecedents, are true, to the best of my knowledge and belief, and that I am the person described in the following record of examination:

- What is your occupation?

Do you use tobacco? If so, in what manner, and how much do you use in a week?

Do you drink intoxicating liquors? If so, how frequently?

Have you any disease now?

What diseases have you had during the last seven years?

Do you know of any hereditary disease in your family?

If your parents, brothers, or sisters, or any of them, are dead, of what disease did they die?

Have you ever had fits?

Have you ever had any fracture or dislocation?

Have you ever received any injury to the head or spine?

Are you subject to piles?

Have you been vaccinated?

Have you ever had rheumatism?

CERTIFICATE OF EXAMINING SURGEON.

1. Is the respiring murmur clear and distinct over both the lungs?

2. Is the character of the respiration full, easy and regular?

3. Are there any indications of disease of the organs of respiration or their appendages?

4. Is the character of the heart's action uniform, free and steady?

5. Are its sounds and rhythm regular and normal?

6. Are there any indications of disease of this organ or of the blood vessels?

7. Is the sight good?

8. Is the applicant color blind?

THE April number of the Civil Service Record contains two interesting letters regarding the practical effects in Washington of the merit system.

IN the current number of Scribner's Magazine Herbert Welsh has an article on the Indian outbreak in Dakota in which he shows the disastrous results of using the Indian trust for political purposes.

PROGRESS.

—There crops up, once in a while, a modern instance which plays such havoc with the wise saws of the spoilsmen in high places that one can scarcely forbear wondering at their temerity in renewing their attacks on civil service reform.

It will be remembered that, of a whole cabinet of eight members, Postmaster-General John Wanamaker was the only one who, at the very outset of the present administration, began making complaint of the obstacles which the merit system put in the way of the selection of the best sort of subordinates in the executive departments.

It was he whose private secretary sent out to public men and reformers that memorable circular letter inquiring whether the sham had not better cease, and all hands return to the good old custom of free selection.

It was he who raised a storm over the fact that President Cleveland had set a date for extending the civil service rules to the railway mail service, one of the most valuable strongholds of the spoils system, and who declared, through his understrappers and by his own lips, that that was not the way to get the best class of railway mail clerks, and that he was receiving poor material under it.

In the light of all these recollections, it is interesting to observe that, when the postmaster-general bestowed the gold medal and the general prize he had offered as a reward for the highest proficiency attained in this branch of his service, he should have been forced to select for the honor Mr. Charles H. Oler, formerly of Economy, Ind.

Mr. Oler was by calling a district school-teacher and a farm-hand. When the farming season was at its height he worked in the field and took his hire like the other hands. When the season ended and the schools were opened he mounted the pedagogue's desk. He had no powerful relatives or friends to help him to a "fat thing." He had no time for or interest in political work, beyond what belongs to every good citizen. He did not even have the benefit of the aid of a member of congress; for the representative from his district, General Thomas M. Brown, has been physically unable to attend to his duties in Washington for the last two years. But the young man went before the civil service examiners and passed the ordeal on his own merits. His rating was 91 per cent., and he stood twelfth on a list of eighty-four eligibles who passed in the same series of examinations. There was not an iota of political influence used in procuring his appointment; the few who had passed with better averages than he were taken in their order, as vacancies occurred. Finally, in September, 1889, his turn came. When he handed in his papers, he found no more prominent citizens to certify to his character and personal antecedents than a fellow teacher, employed in the public schools of Williamsburg, and a notary public in Economy.

Mr. Oler stands at the head of 7,000 clerks with no second near him. He has broken every record ever known in the department for brilliant work. He has acquired his proficiency, like his office, without assistance from anybody or anything but his own brain and hands. And the postmaster-general who does not believe the merit system "practical" and is quite sure he could do better by appointing the sons and nephews and cousins and brothers of public men, or the "workers" at caucuses and polls, has been compelled to give this unknown, unaided young man every prize within reach, and finally to promote him to a first-class berth in the new ocean mail service. What a commentary on the abuse of the word "practical" in politics!—Washington Dispatch to New York Evening Post, March 27.

—When the sundry civil appropriation bill was considered by the senate last month a provision was inserted authorizing the appointment of architects, draughtsmen, and civil engineers in the office of the supervising architect of the treasury department without regard to the civil service rules and regulations. It was asserted that the supervising architect could not get such men as he wanted through the civil service commission, and the provision was agreed to by both houses.

It does not appear to have been entirely satisfactory to the supervising architect, for since congress adjourned he has appointed three draughtsmen under the certification of the civil service commission, and the latter expects to continue holding examinations for such places.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, March 27.

—A good many persons appear to have the idea that in some way more republicans than democrats are getting into the classified service under the civil service rules and regulations. The civil service commission has no means of knowing the politics of the persons who pass its examinations, but it has recently received a letter from a resident of a southern state which throws a little light on the subject.

The writer says that of the ten clerks last appointed from his state eight are democrats to his personal knowledge. One little fact of this sort offsets a long string of such assertions concerning favoritism in the appointment of classified clerks as have been made by the opponents of the merit system.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 2.

—Congressman Randall was pleased to learn from the list of nominations sent to the senate that his recommendation for postmaster at Sandwich had been approved by the President. He obeyed the popular voice in recommending the reappointment of Postmaster James Shevlin, the popular democratic veteran. The appointment is a violation of Postmaster-General Wanamaker's rule to put none but republicans on guard, but nine-tenths of the patrons of the office were for Mr. Shevlin, the grand army and all the veterans were for him, and the republican town committee endorsed him.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, Jan. 30.

—The republicans of Newton are much elated over the reappointment of Mr. George H. Morgan as postmaster. Mr. Morgan was appointed by President Cleveland and has managed the office to the satisfaction of all of its patrons. Owing to his faithful services the republicans of the city were unanimous for his retention, and would not consider any other candidate. R. H. Gardiner, president of the republican ward and city committee, and Mr. C. Bowditch Coffin, a former president, worked faithfully for Mr. Morgan's reappointment, even writing to the postmaster-general that it would be for the interest of the republican party to reappoint Mr. Morgan. Mr. Coffin gives much credit to ex-Congressman Candler for the reappointment.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, April 9.

CURRENT SPOIL.

—An interesting and instructive object lesson in the methods employed by the Tammany machine to equip the forces of the park police is furnished by the case of Thomas Cole, whose experiences as a candidate for appointment were brought to light yesterday for the first time. Cole is a poor man, earning $2 a day as a car driver on the Fourth Avenue Railroad. His home is at 158 East Eighty-Eighth street. He was promised a position as a park policeman if he would pay for it. This he did, paying $300—all the money he had in the world—to John J. Shelley, a foreman on the park board, living at 176 East Eighty-Eighth street. Shelley's failure to secure the place for his victim led Cole to sue him for the recovery of his money, and the initiatory proceedings in this suit were begun yesterday.

Cole, whose appearance indicates that he is an honest man, was seen by a Times reporter yesterday, and told the following story: "Early in March, 1889, while driving a car on the Fourth Avenue Road, I met John Pursell of 130 East One Hundred and Twenty-third street, who is a mounted policeman stationed in Central Park. He rode with me frequently, and we became more or less confidential. One day he told me that if I had any money he could fix things so that I could get on the force. I told him that I had a little money and would consider any proposition he would make.

"A few days later—I think it was March 3—I met Pursell by appointment at the One Hundred and Tenth street entrance to the park, and was introduced to John J. Shelley, who, Pursell said, was superintendent of the park. 'He can put you on the force for the price,' said Pursell. I then asked Shelley what his price was and he replied, 'Four hundred dollars.' I demurred, on the ground that it was too high, and, after some talk, he agreed to give me an appointment for $350, of which I was to pay $300 in cash and $50 when I got the place. I have since learned that Shelley is not park superintendent, but merely foreman of a gang of workmen in the park. He was very well dressed at the time, and this fact, added to the loss of my job, owing to the strike on the Fourth Avenue Road, and the serious illness of my wife, led me to accept his offer without suspicion."

The afternoon of the day on which this proposition was made saw the unsuspecting Cole at Shelley's house, in East Eighty-Eighth street, money in hand. He asked Shelley to have some witnesses present, but the "superintendent" declined, satisfying Cole's anxieties with a receipt, of which the following is an exact copy:

Rec'd from Thomas Cole the sum of 300 dollars.
JOHN SHELLEY, per George Roe.

Cole says that he immediately asked Shelley who George Roe was, and that Shelly replied: "He is the man who acts for Harry Hart in this transaction. Hart is the alderman from this district, and he is the man to 'fix' this thing. Hart thinks that you are paying me only $200, so when he speaks to you about it, tell him that $200 was all you paid me." This explanation seems to have satisfied Cole, and he handed the $300 to Shelley without further argument.

That very afternoon Shelley indulged in a grand drunk, and Cole, who chanced to meet him in this condition, observed that the one and two dollar bills that he had given him were the bills that he now spent with so lavish a hand. This fact served to arouse his suspicions, and they have been aroused ever since. Cole went to Pursell the next day and confided his fears, but Pursell persuaded him that they were groundless, and the car driver continued to hope against hope.

The records of the civil service board at Cooper Union show that in November, 1889, Cole successfully passed his examination, attaining an average of 83.70. His name was placed on the eligible list and there it remained, the "influence" that he had so dearly purchased having failed to get him the desired appointment. Day after day Cole called at Alderman Hart's cigar store, in Leggett's Hotel, to know whether the alderman had "fixed" matters, but his calls were all in vain.

Pursell, the go-between policeman, appears to have been desirous of fleecing Cole on his own responsibility, for he sent for the car driver one day and announced, "on the quiet," that if Cole would pay him $30 he (Pursell) would hurry the matter up with the civil service board. "I'll touch those people in Cooper Union," said he to Cole, "for I'm very thick with Lee Phillips, the secretary." But Cole declined the bait. His wife had just died, the strike was on, he had no money, and he was generally discouraged.

"You'll have to go to Shelley," he said, "and get some of my money from him. I haven't another cent." John Callaghan, a workman in the park department, was a witness to this conversation, which took place at the One Hundred and Tenth street entrance to the park.

"Having given up hope of getting either the appointment or my money," continued Cole, "I laid off a week recently to threaten Shelley. I called on him nearly every day, threatening to sue him if he did not refund. At first he said he had no money, but finally he got $225 from his wife which he paid back to me. He still owes me $75, however, and for this amount I have determined to sue."

Henry I. Meinhard, of 115 Broadway, is Cole's attorney. A Times reporter called there yesterday and inquired if Cole's story was correct, and if steps had been taken to sue. Mr. Meinhard said that the above story was just as Cole had told it to him, and that he had written to Shelley to demand a return of the $75 to his client.

John J. Shelley was found at his home, in East Eighty-Eighth street. He was too much intoxicated to understand the gravity of the charge against him, but he admitted, incoherently but emphatically, that it was true. He said that Cole gave him some money, but that he had paid it all back.

The conversation that passed between Shelley and Cole led the car driver to think that Alderman Hart was the head and front of the whole transaction, and that Shelley merely acted as his agent. Shelley, in fact, so stated to Cole. But when a Times reporter confronted the alderman with this story last night, Hart's surprise knew no bounds. He denied vigorously that he had received any money or that he was aware of Shelley's having received any. "Cole came to me several times," he said, "to know if I could help him get a place on the park police force, and Shelley also asked me to do what I could for him. Further than this I know nothing whatever about the man. Candidly, I am not surprised at Cole's deal with Shelley, for I know Shelley very well, but if he drags my name into his transaction I'll have him arrested."

The irate alderman insisted that the reporter should accompany him to Shelley's house, where the bogus superintendent, after much shaking, was aroused sufficiently to say that he had kept all the money himself; that Hart had gotten none of it, and knew nothing about it.

The fact remains, however, that a poor man, earning $2 a day, has been fleeced by a responsible employe of the park department, who admits the transaction. This sort of thing has been hinted at several times in connection with the appointment of policemen, and here are the facts which prove that it is done. Doubtless there are many men on and off the force to-day who have been through the same experience, with more or less satisfactory results. Cole's case may lead to the uncovering of others. Shelley probably has backers; the openness and fearlessness of his rascally dealings indicate that he thought he had nothing to fear.—New York Times, April 17.

—A lively battle was fought out last night in Baltimore between the supporters of the Harrison administration and its opponents in the republican ranks. Primary meetings were held to choose delegates to district conventions which elect delegates to the state convention, on April 8. The state convention will choose the delegates to the national convention, which will nominate Mr. Harrison's successor. The importance of the contest roused all the blood of the republican factions. The Harrison faction was led by Postmaster Johnson and other federal office-holders. The anti-Harrison faction was made up mainly of those who wanted federal places and failed to get them. The outs controlled the election officers, appointed by a majority of the judges in each precinct, and thought they had "fixed things." The ins, however, made a splendid fight and carried eleven of the twenty-two wards, and claimed four more.

All sorts of charges of ballot-box stuffing were handed about last evening, and to day the police and the municipal courts had their hands full in arresting and punishing the brawlers. Two of the judges were arrested in one ward on a charge of fighting. Two colored men were fined for fighting in another, and six men were taken into custody for assault and disturbing the peace in still another. One of Mr. Harrison's United States marshals got into a quarrel in another ward and tore the buttons off of the coat and vest of one of the judges. One of the judges in another ward claimed, at the opening of the polls, that there were 200 ballots already in the box, and the judges, in another ward, refused to have the box opened to show whether it was stuffed or not. In ward two a big colored man got into a fight with one of Postmaster Johnson's letter carriers. The carrier told his fellow republican "you negroes are no good." In the fight which followed, the negro bit the carrier on the cheek and mashed his nose.

Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt was in the city, and, with Mr. John C. Rose, of the local civil service examining board, visited several wards in the eastern section, and noted the government employes who were actively engaged in the contest.

Mr. D. Pinkney West says he saw these gentlemen at the polls in the Fifth ward, where two post-office employes and one custom-house employe, who were around the polls, were pointed out as displaying offensive partisanship.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, March 31.

—The removal of Theodore Roosevelt from the civil service commission is among the possibilities of the near future. His presence at the republican primary meetings in Baltimore, Monday evening, to note the activity of the federal officials in securing Harrison delegates, has roused a perfect tempest among the republican politicians. The friends of the administration say that he was there to intimidate office holders and prevent their doing the work they wanted to in the President's behalf. Mr. Roosevelt went to New York to-day, but he was at the quarters of the civil service commission before leaving, and alluded, in a jocular manner, to some of his experiences with the Baltimore toughs. His presence in the primaries was noted, and he received some cheers from those who sympathized with him and a good many hoots from those who did not. His object in visiting the primaries was to observe the conduct of federal officials, and, under the circumstances, there is a degree of force in the suggestion that he was aiding the enemies of the Harrison administration by insisting on the observance of the regulations prohibiting offensive partisanship by office holders. All the office holders were for Harrison, and interference with them, or "intimidation," as Mr. Roosevelt's enemies call it, would subtract just so much from the administration strength.

Mr. Roosevelt is entirely disinterested in the matter, and merely wishes to prevent the prostitution of the public service, but his efforts happen to strike at the friends of the President, just as they did in the prosecution of the Virginia assessment cases when the President was so disgusted because Mr. Roosevelt could find nobody but republicans to complain of for violating the civil service law.

The President appears to favor civil service reform when it works the right way, but he does not believe in carrying it far enough to wound one's friends. It would not be surprising if he listened with considerable sympathy to the angry protests of his supporters in Baltimore.

Ex-Congressman Sydney E. Mudd, who was seated by Mr. Reed's Congress, but was beaten last November by 1,618 majority, was at the White House yesterday, and used some pretty strong language regarding Mr. Roosevelt. It is currently reported that he demanded his removal, and that the President promised to give the matter careful consideration. Meanwhile, Mr. Roosevelt will go right on as though the ax were not suspended above his official head. He will make a report on the condition of things in the civil service at Baltimore, and it will not be very pleasant reading for Mr. Harrison's friends.

The delegate conventions in Baltimore last night were almost as noisy and disgraceful as the primary meeting of Monday. There were bolts in two of the three districts, and the foundation was laid for a split in the state convention.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, April 1.

—The manner in which the Indian service has been used as party spoils by Secretary Noble can be shown in no clearer light than by the presentation of the record of William D. Ryder of this city, whom the secretary, on October 19, 1887, appointed to be chief herder and butcher at the Mescalero Agency in Arizona.

This appointment is the only position of trust that "Billy" Ryder, as he is always known here, has held. Few persons who know him have any knowledge of his source of supplies. Though for years he has kept within the limits of the law in his personal conduct, it has not given him a title to respectability even in the minds of those charitable enough to overlook the fact that he is an ex-convict, whose career up to the period of his enforced regularity of habits was in keeping with his views and conduct to-day. Though he has been active in politics, and enlisted in a variety of local political movements, no party manager has ever had the hardihood even to suggest placing him in any public position here, where he is known.

William D. Ryder has a record in the St. Louis criminal court. At various times a total of four indictments, charging felonious assaults, have been found against him by regularly empaneled grand juries. His most aggravated offences were two attacks upon John Smith. The men fell out on account of some bar-room brawl. On October 1, 1874, they met in the rotunda of the Southern Hotel. In the fight which ensued Ryder used a dirk knife seven inches long, with which he stabbed his opponent in the groin, left side and left arm. Smith emptied his revolver at Ryder without effect. Their second meeting was on February 22, 1875, on Fourth street. Ryder this time slashed open Smith's clothing with a knife. For this offence a warrant charging him with assault with intent to kill was sworn out. The case went before the grand jury of March, 1875, which returned against Ryder two indictments, and against Smith one. The record of the first action against Ryder, as found in the office of the clerk of the criminal court, is as follows:

Case No. 25—March Term—St. Louis Criminal Court—The State of Missouri v. Gen. William D. Ryder, for assault to kill. R. S. McDonald, attorney for defendant.

The back of the folder giving the record of the court proceedings in the action is as follows:

Recognizance in court—$1,500—R. S. McDonald as security—first day—March 11, 1875.

Continued for defendant on affidavit—May 13, 1875.

Continued for defendant because of absence of witnesses—July 8, 1875.

Recognizance forfeited—capias scire facias issued and continued—September 15, 1875.

Forfeiture set aside—recognizance in court—$1,500. R. S. McDonald as security—September 15, 1875.

Waives reading of indictment—pleads not guilty—September 16, 1875.

Trial proceeds—convicted and punishment assessed at two years in penitentiary—September 18, 1875.

Motion for new trial filed—September 18, 1875.

Motion continued for defendant—October 23, 1875.

Motion taken under advisement—December 4, 1875.

Motion overruled and sentenced according to verdict to two years in the penitentiary—December 7, 1875.

Appeal granted—December 7, 1875.

Supersedeas refused—execution of sentence suspended until 18th day of December, 1875—December 8, 1875.

On this action Ryder was imprisoned in the Missouri penitentiary. Good-behavior allowance secured his release from the institution after serving eighteen months of his two-year term. Upon his conviction on the first charge the second action against Ryder in connection with his troubles with Smith was continued generally, and his indictment is No. 52, March term, 1875. The case against Smith was also dismissed.

The record also shows two other indictments for assault with intent to kill which have been found against him. Both of these were for the same assault, one being found defective and withdrawn in order that the second might be properly returned. These charge that on December 31, 1875, "William D. Ryder did make a felonious assault upon John Brown, using a chair, with which he inflicted on Brown's head several severe wounds." These indictments are numbered 6 and 31 of the January term, 1876. When the defendant was committed to the penitentiary for the Smith assault, action No. 31 was continued generally.

During the term of September, 1871, Ryder was charged with a petit violation of a city ordinance. Indictment 87, of that term, fails to record any disposition whatever of the action.

Ryder's character as a government officer was not changed. In a little over two months he was removed, because, as is stated on the department books in Washington, he was a turbulent mischief-maker, with whom nobody at the agency could get along. This was the kind of a man sent by the government to set an example to half-civilized Indians. The significance of the case consists in the fact that the appointment was made from Noble's own city, and that the man's character had long been notorious there.—St. Louis Correspondence to New York Evening Post, April 13.

—It is understood at the navy department that Secretary Tracy will hold Naval Constructor Feaster responsible for poor workmanship on the Alert, at the Mare Island Navy Yard. There is good reason to believe that the naval constructor is being held responsible for the work of incompetent subordinates, who owe their places to the ward bosses of San Francisco rather than to their qualifications as workmen.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 7.

—Henry Ehlert, prominent in local political circles, has been reported mysteriously missing, and many people are whistling for money he owes them, ranging in sums from $10 to $500, and aggregating several thousands. Inquiries for him have developed that he is now, or was a few days ago, in Washington, D. C., and is the central figure in a movement to have Postmaster Harlow, of this city, removed from his position.

Ehlert is a sharp politician, has long been recognized as a man with a "pull," and for a long time has held positions, generally in the United States marshal's office or similar places where detective talent was required. About six weeks ago complaints began to be made against Harlow, and they continued and assumed quite a serious character, but they were disproved. It now develops that Harlow's course in running his office on business principles has displeased the politicians, and a regular plot, involving well known politicians, and several clerks in the post-office, was formed. The clerks furnished information from inside the office, and Ehlert did the outside work, politicians of more prominence directing the game, but remaining in the background.—St. Louis Dispatch to New York Times, April 16.

—"Boss" Filley is coming to be a political quantity that even Harrison must consider. Missouri people fancy they see a purpose manifest to send him to Japan. Filley was asked to go abroad as far as that once before, but he thrust his tongue in his cheek and said: "No, thank you."

Now he is occasionally tickled. To-day Eugene F. Weigel of St. Louis, a worker in Filley's political vineyard, was appointed a special land inspector by Secretary Noble, who had some time ago secured for him a place under Census Commissioner Porter. As this business had stopped, Mr. Filley has sought something more for him, and this is the result.

The interest to Missourians in this is not as to whether Weigel is a fit man or not. It is that it indicates the intention of the President to use Filley as his agent to capture the Missouri delegation for Harrison in 1892. Noble must, of course, be let in, or he would not willingly let Filley get any patronage. Filley seems to have forgotten the Schuarte contest, and willing to "let bygones be bygones."—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, March 20.

THE annual business meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association will be held at the Denison Hotel, Indianapolis, June 6, 1891, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

THERE are some people quite near the President, who are in the habit of saying to him, and to others, that those in Indiana who have for some years been earnestly working to advance the adoption of the merit system, do not have the sympathy of the people. They say in effect that the people want the offices used to pay for personal and party service, and that they like to see the recipients of the offices bend every energy to help the fortunes of the leaders to whom they are indebted; and they even go so far as to say that it would be a popular thing to repeal the civil service law. The demonstration in this city at the Roosevelt dinner was a crushing blow to these assertions. Mr. Roosevelt is the uncompromising and outspoken enemy of the use of public office in any manner as spoil. Indiana has some strong advocates of the merit system, but none in any manner more so than he is. We call the attention of the President to the names of those, many of them his neighbors, who joined in this demonstration of approval of Mr. Roosevelt and of the cause of civil service reform.

THE dinner ought also to silence the quite general talk that the state of Indiana in the matter of spoils is worse than the rest of the country, and that its people are almost hopelessly besotted. In order to dispel this illusion, not only in the mind of the President, but of others not familiar with Indiana, we mention with considerable particularity, some of those who took part:

John H. Holliday, editor of the Indianapolis News; Morris Ross, Hilton U. Brown, Wm. Fortune and Meredith Nicholson, of the News staff; Samuel E. Morss, editor of the Indianapolis Sentinel; Wm. A. Woods, judge of the United States court; Byron K. Elliott, judge of the supreme court; James B. Black, chief justice of the appellate court; Edgar A. Brown, judge of the circuit court; W. E. Niblack, ex-judge of the supreme court; Livingston Howland, ex-judge of the circuit court; Rufus Magee, President Cleveland's minister to Sweden; William P. Fishback, master in chancery, United States court; Noble C. Butler, clerk of the United States courts; John L. Griffiths, supreme court reporter; Jacob P. Dunn, state librarian; George T. Porter, son of the present minister to Italy; John R. Wilson, clerk of Marion county; E. B. Martindale, world's fair commissioner; Oliver T. Morton, son of Indiana's war governor; J. E. McCullough, member of the general assembly; V. T. Mallott, president of the Indiana national bank; H. H. Hanna, president of the Atlas engine works; C. W. Fairbanks, general solicitor Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton railway company; Otto Gresham, son of Judge Walter Q. Gresham, Wm. Henderson, a life-long democrat and a leading citizen in the prosecution of the Coy tally-sheet forgers, John A. Butler, teller of the Capital National Bank, and E. P. Thompson, acting postmaster at Indianapolis.

THE Scholar in Politics was represented by John M. Coulter, president-elect of the State University; J. J. Mills, president of Earlham College; A. L. Mason, dean of the De Pauw University law school; T. L. Sewall, principal of the Girls' Classical school, and W. W. Grant, principal of the Indianapolis high school.

The church was represented by Rev. N. A. Hyde, Rev. H. A. Cleveland, Rev. Joseph A. Milburn, Rev. George E. Swan, Rev. R. V. Hunter, and Rev. Joseph S. Jenckes.

The medical profession was represented by Doctors E. F. Hodges, W. B. Fletcher, J. N. Hurty, J. L. Thompson, Theodore S. Potter, W. N. Wishard and O. S. Runnells.

The legal profession was represented by John T. Dye, William A. Ketcham, Addison C. Harris, John Coburn, Edward Daniels, Albert Baker, Alpheus H. Snow, Harry J. Milligan, Chester Bradford, Nathan Morris, Alfred F. Potts, J. M. Winters, W. F. Elliott, M. G. McLain, W. A. Van Buren, Charles Martindale, Frank H. Blackledge, Allan W. Hendricks, Albert J. Beveridge, Evans Woollen, William H. Dye, H. D. Pierce and R. B. Oglesbee.

THERE were also Herman Lieber and William Haueisen, representative and leading Germans; Theodore E. Griffith, I. S. Gordon, H. W. Bennett, D. C. Griffith, W. J. Holliday, wholesale merchants; John C.

Dean, George Merritt and William L. Elder, manufacturers, and others of equal standing in the community.

CAN the President look at these names in connection with the occasion and be in doubt as to their significance? Their significance, Mr. President, is that the people like Theodore Roosevelt and they like the cause he represents. They like him because he fights a manly battle against the pirates and buccaneers of his own party. They like him because he believes in keeping promises, and they like him because he knows how to strike a hard and telling blow on the right side and is not afraid to do it. They like his cause—the cause of civil service reform—because it means fair play and economy and a higher tone of public morals, and because it means the disappearance of the Quays and the Dudleys and of all those like Mahone and Headsman Clarkson.

THE soberness and pertinacity with which spoilsmen urge exploded arguments is one of the daily amusements. For some time now we have been hearing of a man who says he was once a civil service reformer, but, in simple ignorance of the way the world is passing him, has for years been steadily citing Trollope, as the one all-sufficient argument in opposition to the merit system. Anthony Trollope was opposed to the merit system of his own country because he had made a valuable public official, and yet he could never have got into the service by an examination; therefore the system of examinations was bad. This argument is a shade less foolish than Boss Quay's and Boss Gorman's dread of an office holding aristocracy, and it is about as easily disposed of. Young Trollope, who had been zealously sowing wild oats, was put by favoritism into the public service because that was the least expensive field for his operations for his family and because of the hope that the responsibility of public office might sober him. It was a toss-up whether his opportunity would turn him into an officer like young Raum or reform him. Under these circumstances, Trollope was hardly a disinterested critic of a system which destroyed the practice of giving places in the English service to the younger sons of the aristocracy and opened them to competition, in which the sons of working men stood an equal chance. It would seem that the opinions of the long line of English statesmen from Macaulay to Gladstone, backed by the entire body of the English people, should weigh something.

THE CHRONICLE mentioned last month the removal of McCain, an excellent policeman with years of efficient service and a good character back of him, to make room for new republicans. Since then the board has had to dismiss one of the new republicans for going into the residence of a prominent citizen and insulting the inmates. The board had better adopt the competitive system and avoid the constant charge of exercising the worst kind of favoritism.

THE tax situation here is becoming somewhat strained and it will become more so. It is beyond doubt that this city will have to pay higher taxes, and no one can reasonably complain of some increase. But the temper of the people is mistaken if it is thought that for every dollar of their money they will not demand value received. The memory of man does not run to the contrary when the city has not had a crowd of nominal laborers whiling away the time upon the streets. The street-cleaning department has been a place where the street commissioner's relatives and friends hired out their one-horse wagons, and the henchmen of councilmen and political bosses rendered nominal services for real pay. If the new city government is worth anything, it will put an end to this species of piracy. There is only one final and effectual method, and that is the Boston labor system, which excludes politics from the choice of laborers. Street-cleaning by contract is a temporary expedient which, like a stone-yard for tramps, the Boys will constantly clamor to have done away with. It may here be remarked that the board of public safety is deliberately wasting money in its unlawful division of the places in the fire department. It has hired fourteen democrats without the slightest pretense that the city needed the men; or as the president, Sterling R. Holt, puts it, it decided to "increase the fire department by putting on fourteen democrats that fourteen experienced firemen, who are republicans, might remain."

PERHAPS the most striking reason why all other reforms should be subordinated to civil service reform is the solidarity of spoilsmen. When it comes to any attack to prevent their plunder of the public, they know no party. Some instances of this are given in another part of this paper. A further illustration is the following from the April Civil Service Reformer:

Whatever party name spoilsmen may find it advantageous to assume, they are always ready to come together for parcelling out offices when a good trade is more profitable than a fight, as we saw in the recent debate in the senate, when Mr. Gorman defended Mr. Wanamaker in his evasions of the civil service law, and united with his republican opponent, Mr. Plumb, in looting the office of the supervising architect. And whatever set of spoilsmen happen to be in power in any given state will always resist any measure tending toward a just and fair expression of the people's will at the elections. Thus we find Mr. Boutelle, and if the Bangor correspondent of the New York Times is to be believed, Mr. Blaine and Mr. Reed also, in Maine, in 1891, like Mr. Gorman, in Maryland, in 1890, vigorously opposing the Australian ballot system. Mr. Boutelle fought the law in his Bangor Whig, because it would injure republican supremacy, just as Mr. Gorman denounced it as "a scheme to send the democratic party to the rear." And the Maine "ring influence," quite in the tone of the Gorman orators and papers, mutatis mutandis, sought to influence the republican majority to vote against the bill by pointing out that the democratic minority was going to vote solidly for it.

THE republicans in the city council joined in with Sim Coy and his gang and elected a Coy democrat president of the council, under the new charter, over the regular democratic candidate who is sufficiently vouched for by saying that he is an anti-Coy democrat. The republican machine here secured the pardon of Coy out of prison on the ground that he was too poor to pay his fine, and he at once put upon the market notes amounting to hundreds of dollars secured by mortgage. The Indianapolis Journal has taken to eulogizing him in its columns. Why did not the republicans elect Coy president of the council and be open and above-board? To choose one of his naming is the same as choosing him. The democratic party is doing its best to get rid of Coy, and possibly the republican party is going to take him up. The majority of the democrats are trying to give the city a good government, and if they do not succeed it will be because the republicans prevent it by uniting with the Coy gang.

THE Civil Service Commission has unearthed another Raum peccadillo. This particular Raum is the son of the pension commissioner for whom his father created the place of appointment clerk in the pension department, and who is charged with having sold a place and with stealing $72. The commission called the case to the attention of the secretary of the interior, the secretary of the treasury and the attorney general. Young Raum was found so guilty that he was allowed to resign with thirty days' pay. Attorney-General Miller, although requested by the commission to give an opinion whether this Raum's offenses were punishable by law, with a zeal akin to his zeal in the case of the Mahone blackmailers, declined to do so unless requested by the President. He has referred the papers laid before him by the commission to the government prosecutor for the District of Columbia, and, judging again by the Mahone-blackmail standard, this prosecutor will put the papers where they will never trouble any Raum.

How much more Raumism can the President stand?

THE various labor organizations are the staunchest supporters of the merit system in Buffalo. The Buffalo Sunday Truth, March 29, contains the resolutions of Carpenters Union, No. 9, over the recent appointment by the civil service board of one of their members to a place in the city fire department. The resolutions say:

Qualified carpenters will find their aspirations for positions on the various city offices sooner or later realized by applying through the medium of the civil service than through politics.

Politics has a nod and a shake for the workingman during the season of incubation, but the delusion and deception leaves the seeker after political offices in a weak and helpless condition after he has spent his time for empty and sterile promises.

It is not so with the civil service: it is slow but quality and merit win without loss of time or money. It is the only sure way that the workingman can obtain a position on any of the city departments.

MORE QUAYISM.

The people of Pennsylvania want a ballot reform law like that of Indiana, and with that view a bill has been introduced into Quay's legislature. That body made the bill over until if passed it will be an effective agent of ballot thieves. One of the most active men in thus ruining a great reform measure is President Harrison's collector of internal revenue, Martin. In order that the make-up of this federal office holder may be known, a good deal of space is given elsewhere to an account of him from the New York World, which was published over six months ago and has never been denied. Making all the allowances necessary for a somewhat dramatic style, Martin is, under the circumstances, left with a very black character. The people of Pennsylvania have once shown that they can throw Quayism, even when backed by the Administration, headed by Wanamaker. Apparently they will have to do it again, and throw it hard enough to break its bones. What it is to be in the grip of Quay is shown by the fact that apparently no Philadelphia paper dares to tell the truth about him or any of his Men. We quote from the private letter of a correspondent whose information and veracity are beyond question:

I ask your kind attention to the enclosed clipping from the New York World of October 20th, which gives what I believe, in the main, to be a perfectly reliable sketch of the career of one of our prominent and most influential politicians, David Martin; and also the circumstances attending his appointment to the position of collector of internal revenue. The citizens' municipal association was about to protest against David Martin's appointment to his present post, when the news came that his appointment was an accomplished fact. I regret that the gentlemen who had this matter in charge were deterred from at least making his career known to the public. David Martin and Charles Porter are very near to Mr. Quay, and have been instrumental in procuring the amendments to our Baker ballot reform bill, now pending in the senate, which changed it from a measure in the interest of an honest ballot to one calculated to aid the ballot thieves. That a man of Martin's record and past associations could have come to the position of political influence which he now occupies is a sad commentary upon the moral standards of American political life; but this is a fact which we have to confront. These men are now doing all in their power to prevent ballot reform, and I now feel convinced that so long as they remain in power the politics of Pennsylvania can not be brought into a healthy state. The condition of things is exasperating to the highest degree. A number of our newspapers are fighting hard to push the bill through, but I have never known any of them to expose Martin's career or attack him personally on the grounds of his public record, nor do they attack Quay.

THE ROOSEVELT DINNER.

A surprising and sure indication of public feeling in Indiana was shown on the evening of May 16. Early that week it was learned that Theodore Roosevelt would pass through Indianapolis on the 16th, and the suggestion that he be given some indication of the esteem in which both himself and the cause which he represents are held was responded to, not only from this city, but from all parts of the state, with a spontaneity that ought to settle the question how the leading men of Indiana stand upon the matters involved. The following joined in tendering a dinner to Mr. Roosevelt at the Propylaeum. Nearly one hundred were present:

Noble C. Butler.	Frank H. Blackledge.
Wm. D. Foulke.	W. E. Niblack.
Lucius B. Swift.	Harry J. Milligan.
Oliver T. Morton.	Arthur B. Grover.
John L. Griffiths.	A. L. Mason.
William Fortune.	James B. Black.
Alfred F. Potts.	John C. Dean.
John E. Bradshaw.	W. W. Grant.
Geo. T. Porter.	Livingston Howland.
E. F. Hodges.	John Coburn.
John A. Butler.	W. R. Holloway.
W. P. Fishback.	Charles Martindale.
A. C. Harris.	Hilton U. Brown.

Among the regrets were the following:

[From George I. Reed, Kansas City.]

I join my Indiana friends in honoring their guest, the distinguished advocate of civil service reform.

[From Rev. E. C. Bogemann, of St. Charles Borromeo's, Bloomington.]

I regret very much to be compelled to forego the pleasure of honoring one of the foremost leaders of so worthy a cause—civil service reform.

[From D. N. Foster, Fort Wayne.]

Mr. Roosevelt has proven a signal success in the very difficult position he fills, and I should be greatly pleased to show my appreciation of the manner in which he has discharged his official duties by my presence with you at the coming banquet.

[From George B. Cardwill, New Albany.]

It goes without saying, that I have very great admiration for Mr. Roosevelt, and I envy the gentlemen who will have the pleasure of dining with him.

[From Charles H. Aldrich, Chicago.]

It would afford me deep pleasure to unite with you and your associates in this tribute to Mr. Roosevelt, whose splendid services to the cause of civil service and municipal reform entitle him to the gratitude of every true American citizen.

[From Calvin Fletcher, Spencer.]

Mr. Roosevelt is one of the few men whom I would go far to honor.

[From John H. Jacobs, Fort Wayne.]

I very much regret that the condition of my health is such as to prevent the acceptance of the invitation you so kindly send me. That the dinner may be a very enjoyable one, and that it may greatly encourage all the participants to renewed efforts toward the consummation of our hopes is my earnest desire.

[From C. R. Boyer, Williamsport.]

I am in receipt of an invitation to join in a dinner to be given to the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt at the Propylaeum, in your city, on Saturday evening. My advanced years make it inexpedient for me to roost from home, while the night train does not stop at our place; but I do not wish to be remiss, when measures in support of the good cause are in course of prosecution. I would like, therefore, to tax your courtesy to put the enclosed five dollars where it will do the most good.

[From Henry M. Williams, Ft. Wayne.]

I shall hope for the success of the entertainment in honor of Mr. Roosevelt, a most valiant fighter in the cause. Please use this draft for five dollars, enclosed, for a plate for some one who will help on the cause, or otherwise as you see fit.

THE SPEECHES.

Mr. Noble C. Butler presided, and at the close of the dinner introduced Mr. Roosevelt as follows:

GENTLEMEN: We have not met here as members of the republican and democratic parties to wrangle over the political issues which divide us. If there is any one thing on which the two parties are thoroughly agreed it is on the importance and necessity of reform in the civil service. Any wholly unprejudiced person, exempt from local and temporary prepossessions, like Macaulay's itinerant New Zealander or Goldsmith's philosophic Chinaman, for instance, who might naturally seek in the platforms of our parties for a disclosure of their sentiments and reject other testimony as secondary and impertinent, would find in them the most ample and indisputable proof of my statement. An examination of their platforms for the last decade or two shows how deeply they have been impressed. They have actually vied with one another in an emphatic condemnation of the practices which ought to be reformed, and they have repeatedly, with zeal and enthusiasm, pledged themselves to the particular reformation of them which has been slowly but successfully installed in the governments of some of our cities and states, and in the national government. It is true that some of our statesmen of one party or the other, in executive sessions or committee of the whole, have teased the civil service commission of the United States with playful threats of withholding the appropriations on which its existence depends, but on being called before the country, in a vote of the yeas and nays, they have pulled themselves together with commendable alacrity, and resolutely voted for a continuance of the appropriations; and, at the very next state or national convention of their party, have pointed with pride at the record and result of their votes.

As all of us here belong to one or the other of the two parties, and our confessions of faith are in their platforms, it plainly and inevitably follows that we are all civil service reformers. Any impeachment of that syllogism must be at the expense of our sincerity or partisan fealty. A denial of its conclusion would amount to a charge that we are all hypocrites, or it might fasten upon us the dreadful stigma of being "weak-kneed" or "invertebrate," or something else that is quite short of a "good democrat," or a "good republican," and which is simply too horrible to contemplate.

If my argument is so broad that it takes in the whole country, and by so doing fails to recognize the existence of any difference of opinion, here or elsewhere, it may require some modification, even at the loss of a beautiful vision of political harmony. But whether we are all technically civil service reformers or not, we ought, as good citizens, to sympathize with purposes which have as their end the selection for minor posts under the national, state and municipal governments, of persons who are qualified to fill them. There should be no difference of opinion about the end we seek, whatever may be thought of the means. And, so far as the means are concerned, we are trying to do just what our brethren over the way are doing in the administration of their charities and corrections; we are endeavoring to substitute a scientific method for political empiricism. As good citizens we are all agreed that only those who are qualified for official position should hold them, but we ought further to agree that there should be some precise and definite method for ascertaining and testing the qualifications of those who seek them.

Among those whose intentions are good and unselfish the differences concerning methods will disappear with the progress of enlightenment, although they may be given up slowly and even reluctantly. The wife of Martin Luther looked back with regret upon old beliefs after the Reformation had made them impossible for her; and on the verge of Canaan the Israelites yearned for the flesh-pots of Egypt. Men may yet think for awhile that the old way is the best simply on account of its age; that correct views of the tariff are a better equipment for a letter carrier than a knowledge of reading and writing or the geography of his city and state; or that an Indianapolis policeman ought to be examined with reference to the state of his mind concerning what is known as the southern question instead of the municipal ordinances which he is to conserve and enforce. But these are notions which properly belong to the palaeozoic age of politics—they are survivals of it. Notwithstanding these notions, and in spite of them, the spirit of civil service reform is abroad in the land, and, like that of old John Brown, is marching on. It is but a little while since it invaded the Indian service, it is breaking into the navy yards, and it prevails in the Indianapolis post-office. And it is not done yet.

We have heard a good deal about the scholar in politics, and the phrase like that of the christian statesman, has been a little soiled with misuse. As Doll Tearsheet says, they are all most excellent good words, but they have been ill-sorted. At times I have my doubts whether scholarship has much to do with politics or much influence upon it. Nevertheless we admire and respect genuine scholarship, and we know that if politics does not heed what scholarship has to say about social, political and economic truths, it will be so much the worse for politics. But there is something I like even better in politics than scholarship, and that is manliness. And when we have a combination of the two qualities in any man or set of men, it seems to me that all of us, who wish well for politics, and for the country whose most vital interests are described by that term, ought to grapple him and them to our souls with hooks of steel.

I have in my mind some men of that sort in both hemispheres, and among them, easily the first, the grand old man of England, rises before it. And it should be a cause of patriotic pride that we have men of that sort in our own country and the number of them is increasing; that we have men who discuss public questions in the reviews as well as on the rostrum, intelligently and instructively, with fairness and candor; who have written thoughtful and discriminating biographies of our public men; whose contributions to our historical literature are worthy of a place by the side of those of Francis Parkman; and who take with them into the primaries and political conventions the courage of their opinions and teaching, and actively and effectively maintain them.

It is my privilege to know at least one of these rare men, whose "Winning of the West" has not ended with the delightful volumes which bear that title. He is not one of those writers who are content to sit in their studies, or their sanctums, and survey the political arena with a field glass, graciously bestowing their valuable opinions upon the actors in it at long range; but he has gone down into it and fought with beasts at Ephesus—and other places. He is as practical a politician as any, with the important qualification of the term which is given it by the fact that he stands for an idea and not for spoils. For aught I know, and I speak now after the manner of the unregenerate, he has as many and as distinguished scalpils at his belt as any warrior of Tammany or member of the Slick Six, for he does not fight as one who beateth the air. The gentleman of whom I have been speaking, and for whom you have been impatiently waiting, I now have the honor and the pleasure of introducing to you in the person of the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, of the United States civil service commission.

began by a discussion of the merit system in the federal service and of the character of the examinations, and took occasion to answer the mountain-in-the-moon critics. After passing around specimen examination questions and answers, he then said:

"Hitherto I have spoken from a non-partisan stand-point; now, I intend to say a few words as a republican in a response to a recent attack on the reform system by one who also claims to be a republican. Ex-assistent Postmaster-General Clarkson, in a recent article in the North American Review, has obligingly furnished an instance of that species of attack on the law which consists in a loose diatribe, equally compounded of rambling declamation and misstatement, and, as he therein throws down the gauntlet to the civil service commission, it gives me much pleasure to take it up.

"Mr. Clarkson says that the 'civil service commission is more unfriendly and more opposed to the republican party under Harrison than it was under Cleveland.' Being interpreted, this Bunsby-like utterance is merely Mr. Clarkson's way of saying that the commission is rigidly enforcing the law. Mr. Clarkson is laboring under a confusion of ideas. He mistakes himself and those who sympathize with his views for the republican party; a mistake akin to that chronicled by Æsop in his little fable of the frog and the ox. Now, the civil service commission most undoubtedly is hostile to the individuals who share the theories expressed in Mr. Clarkson's article; the commission can not both do its duty and retain their good will any more than a policeman can do his duty and retain the good will of the law-breakers. But the commission is not hostile to the republican party. On the contrary, it is busily engaged in keeping one of the promises which the republican party made in the convention of 1888, a promise which Mr. Clarkson and his friends now wish to break.

"Mr. Clarkson might just as well say that Secretary Tracy is hostile to the republican party because he has introduced the principle of civil service reform into the navy yards, or he might go farther yet and say that President Harrison is more hostile to the republicans than ex-President Cleveland was because he has extended the classified service to include the Indian department.

"There are some points in Mr. Clarkson's article with which I agree, and there are certain of his objects with which I sympathize. But he is not setting to work in the right way to attain these objects. He is against mugwumpery. Very good; but does he not see that to have a responsible republican politician advocate such views as appear in his article is playing right into the mugwump's hands, and is justifying his existence? Moreover, it is just as foolish for Mr. Clarkson to say that the democratic party has 'purchased' the mugwump newspapers, as it would be to say that the democratic party has 'purchased' Mr. Clarkson to write his article, which is much better fitted to damage the republican party than any conceivable mugwump editorial. Mr. Clarkson says he wishes to get the young men of courage and conviction to join the republican party; does he not realize that in writing such (stuff) he is doing his best to keep them out of the party? Mr. Clarkson believes in the practical politician. So do I; but when, as he has recently done, Mr. Clarkson comes into Massachusetts of all places in the world to advocate the spoils system and an inflated currency, he is acting as if he were an impractical politician of the most comic variety. He is doing his best to help the democrats keep control of the state. Nor, be it remembered, did he succeed, in spite of the patronage at his command, in keeping Iowa in line.

"Much of Mr. Clarkson's article consists of the solemn statement of truisms which nobody denies and of assaults upon positions which no sane being holds; much of the remainder, whatever relevance it may have to some not very clearly defined idea of his own, certainly has none whatever to civil service reform. When he does deal with this subject he fails to advance one new fact or put forward a single theory which has not been a hundred times refuted; he merely parades the usual dreary Falstaffian army of exploded and foolish untruths. He represents civil service reformers as maintaining 'that office-holding does not concern the people.' On the contrary, we maintain that it does concern the people; whereas Mr. Clarkson and his friends insist that it only concerns the oligarchy of political place-hunters. He apparently thinks that the founders of the government believed in the spoils system; whereas a glance at any good school history would have taught him that it was forty years after the adoption of the constitution before this brutal and degrading practice was openly avowed and defended in our national politics. He expresses a desire for 'practical' examinations; but of course, if he knows anything of our examinations at all, he must know that they are eminently practical already, and admirably fitted to test the qualifications of the candidates; whereas, nothing could be more impractical than to examine a would-be clerk or letter carrier as to the strength of his political backing, or the extent of his influence with prominent party leaders. He advocates 'pass' examinations, which, as every one who has looked into the subject knows, are simple shams, serving no useful purpose whatever, especially if conducted by the heads of departments, as Mr. Clarkson advises.

"He speaks of the commission as 'absolutely unknown to the constitution.' What he means by this is obscure—probably he himself is not quite certain about it. If he will read through the constitution he will find that it does not contain a catalogue of offices; and, of course, it no more mentions the civil service commission than it does the first assistant postmaster-general. If he means that the law providing for the commission is unconstitutional, why does he not test the matter in the court? He says he would retain faithful public servants, but he knows perfectly well that this can only be done under the civil service law which he condemns, and that he himself, while assistant postmaster-general, administered and was obliged to administer the patronage of the fourth-class offices—as all his predecessors did before him—on a purely spoils basis, turning out the faithful and unfaithful alike, if their places were sought by influential politicians. He also expresses a desire that there should be a separation of the appointing power from the legislative power. This is exactly what the civil service law provides and what Mr. Clarkson and his friends strenuously oppose. Surely he can not keep a serious face and deny that during his own term of office he treated the fourth-class offices as simply the property of the congressman, good or bad, in whose district they were situated. If this is not mingling the appointing and legislative power nothing can be. Mr. Clarkson is certainly not happy in his arguments. Mr. Clarkson loudly proclaims that he is a straightout republican. He says: 'I believe that when Benjamin Harrison was elected President of the United States, on a platform of republican principles, he was elected to carry out those principles.' Exactly; and one of those principles was the continuation and the extension of the reform of the civil service, begun under republican auspices. President Harrison's civil service commission is actively carrying out this principle, this pledge of the party platform, while Mr. Clarkson and his followers are striving—with entire lack of success, by the way—to prevent its being done.

"The fact that the majority of the people want one president elected rather than another no more means that all the clerks and letter carriers should be turned out than having Grant instead of McClellan at the head of the army of the Potomac implied the dismissal of all the privates who served under the latter.

"Finally Mr. Clarkson makes an astounding confession, though it is a confession which logically follows from his principles and practices. He says that he and his friends 'believe in republican officers under a republican administration. * * * If this conclusion is not true * * * all political parties in America ought to disband.' In other words these gentlemen, who so loudly vaunt their republicanism, in reality care nothing for republicanism at all save in so far as it means offices for themselves and their friends. They wish the republican party to disband unless they are to be paid for supporting it. This seems a harsh way of putting their views, but it is perfectly just.

"There is a certain difference between being bribed with an office and being bribed with money—exactly as there is a difference between the savagery of an Ashantee and the savagery of a Hottentot—but the difference is one of degree only.

"I think there is no need of a more biting commentary on the spoils system than that furnished by Mr. Clarkson himself when he avows such a doctrine as this."

MR. MORTON'S REMARKS:

It can not be repeated too often that the application of the merit system to the civil service of this country is much more than a mere administrative reform. Whether a letter is expeditiously carried, or whether the civil service generally is efficient, is a matter indeed of large convenience and even of importance, but it is not vital. It does not affect the character of the people, nor threaten the stability of our institutions. The evil is political and lies much deeper. The merit system substitutes open and manly competition for beggary and sycophancy. It takes a man from his knees and bids him stand erect. It teaches him independence. If he obtains an appointment at an examination, or a promotion, it is by virtue of his merit and his record, and not because he has done some shady political work.

But this is not all. The spoils system is bribery organized upon a gigantic scale. I once heard a candidate upon a presidential ticket promise his supporters, in the event of his election, at least one-half the offices under the government, which, I protest, is the greatest bribe ever offered to the voters of this country. But you will say that bribery is multiform—that this is only one of a set of corrupt influences which endanger the national life. Unfortunately this is true. Jobbery in federal office is but a part of a system of bribery which has its roots deep in the past, and which has spread like a destroying vine over the whole country. The senate of the United States is fast becoming a rich man's club. Agents of corporations swarm the national and state capitols. Moneyed combinations contribute large sums to debase elections, and employers coerce the votes of the employees. Everywhere the special interest is arrayed against the common weal.

To many—to me at any rate—civil service reform means much more than a technical and verbal definition of it will allow. It declares war against this whole iniquity—against jobbery in all office, whether federal, state or municipal—whether legislative or administrative. It stands for an unfettered, uncorrupted and independent public opinion.

But all things can not be done at once. To take 200,000 offices out of politics is a good beginning and is a great gain. To offer office as a reward is a most insidious form of bribery. It not only influences the man who obtains it, but it affects a score of others who do not. Many of these men who will work to obtain an office will not accept money in lieu thereof. They have not reached that point of degradation. By abolishing the patronage system you will not only remove the temptation which perverts their energies, but you will also strike down the one man power. A system which gives to the president of the United States control of 200,000 offices whose income is equal to that of 200,000 farms is a foe to democratic government. It belongs to a dead and bygone age. It is a relic of feudalism, of the days of the over-lord and of king-craft. The president holding this power is an uncrowned king. It is true that you may dethrone him at the end of four years, if you can, but you may depend upon it that if he is a spoilsman he will wield the great army of the civil service in his defense. His office-holders will pack the primaries and convention, and if possible secure his renomination, and a part of the eighty millions of dollars which are paid by the government every year to its employees will, in the presidential year, be diverted to influencing the will of the people.

Now, sir, this is a government of, by and for the people, and they have the right to pass judgment upon an administration free from official coercion. The president of the United States is no more justified in using the civil service as a personal engine than he is in using the army of the United States, which is but another branch of the executive department. There is no difference in principle. The spoils system is an anomaly, a monstrosity and an anachronism. It belongs to the oriental despotisms of the old world. It has no proper place in the republics of the Western Hemisphere.

MR. ROSS'S REMARKS:

Until this moment I had been confirmed in the truth of the old belief that to assure a well-ordered affair of this kind, both in perfection of detail and completeness altogether, there should be a "Butler" at the head.

At this point I had made a mental note that there was to be "laughter" and "applause," and then on the waves of merriment, I should ride in with the "thoughts that breathe" and the "words that burn." I had also made a mental note that in case the laugh did not come in—although I labored very hard on that pun and supposed it would go at this time of night—I should call it "Balbec," as Mark Twain did his horse, because it was such a magnificent ruin, and on the debris take my stand and proceed to say that it seemed to me peculiarly fitting that these friends should give this testimonial of their personal regard to this guest, because in him, springing from his influence, has been realized more fully than ever that cause which they have loved so long and so well. It is because Theodore Roosevelt has been at the head of the civil service commission, that civil service reform is to-day a fact, as it never has been before. The name "civil service reform" is one that I have never liked. It has seemed to me always inadequate. At best it is the name of a proposition or a proposal. There should be instead a name that defines a thing, a name with a positive instead of a negative meaning to it. As for example, the "merit system." And I believe that those who have this cause at heart can give special aid to it by beginning to speak of it as the "merit system."

They who have been in the thick of the fight, perhaps do not realize how much every little aid is needed to strengthen this cause. Names have been held to mean too little, but back of the man whose blood is up and who is fighting well this battle is a large host of friends who yet are in an apologetic stage. They all have belief in this cause, yet they stand by old parties and approach them as to this subject in a way as much as to say, "this is a little fad of mine, a little weakness in which you must indulge me. I am a good party man—good this, that and the other, but I have this little idiosyncrasy of civil service reform, and you must not take exception to it."

There is that apologetic state of mind, whether felt or fully realized or not, among a great mass of earnest and honest friends of this cause. Anything that would aid the better requirements of their conviction, or would tend to give them the courage of their opinions, would be a vast help to the cause. And to this end, though it might not appear to some, taking pains to call civil service reform the merit system would be a great positive strength. There is always attached to the word "reform" an assumption of superiority that not infrequently offends good people, and to drop it, and in its stead substitute not merely a proposal but the fact as in the "merit system," would add greatly to general effectiveness.

* * * Indiana herself is going to give account for herself. In her new city government the principle of the merit system is already lodged; the principle of business administration, and its results are to be far-reaching. In the state, while there is nothing done that can be called a harvest, there is to the experienced eye well-tilled and carefully planted fields which promise surely a most abundant harvest, and at no long time in the future Indiana will show herself in deed as well as in sympathy with this cause.

AMONG other speakers was Mr. Jacob P. Dunn, who said: "Civil service reform will win because it is right." Mr. W. P. Fishback said: "I admire Mr. Roosevelt for two things, his sand and his sense." Mr. Rufus Magee said: "I favor civil service reform and the absence and divorce of the spoils system from politics. Merit is always entitled to recognition regardless of the party label it wears. The country wants the best talent to be had, and it can only be secured through the civil service law. During my eight years' service in the general assembly of Indiana two things give me the greatest satisfaction—my efforts in behalf of the new charter of this city and my attempt to secure the passage of the bill introduced by me to put the benevolent institutions of the state under the merit system."

In speaking of the dinner, the Indianapolis Sentinel of the next day says that it "closed after having proved one of the most brilliant ever held in this city, and one at which the wit and strong points of the speakers were received with the utmost appreciation and enthusiastic applause."

The Indianapolis Journal of May 18 says:

The banquet to Hon. Theodore Roosevelt on Saturday night was a deserved compliment to a very bright man and one of the ablest advocates of civil service reform in the country. Mr. Roosevelt has won distinction in other ways, but at present he is best known as chairman of the civil service commission. His selection for that position was a happy thought of the President's, and has been fully vindicated by the faithfulness, intelligence and impartiality with which he has stood for the enforcement of the civil service law. He is a life long republican, and has proved his devotion to the party in many ways. He is doing it now by his zealous advocacy of a principle which was embodied in the platform on which President Harrison was elected, and to the support of which the party is fully committed. There are still opponents of civil service reform to be found in both parties, but their number is decreasing, and it is to be hoped the time is not far distant when there will be found no advocates of a return to the spoils system.

ANNALS OF QUAYISM.

Three men sat in the Cabinet room in the White House one bright morning in the year of our Lord 1889. One was the President of the United States. The second was Matthew Stanley Quay, senator from Pennsylvania and chairman of the republican national committee. The third was James McManes, the sturdy and wealthy Scotch-Irishman, whose sterling qualities had won for him the respect and confidence of all the residents of the Quaker City.

The President raised his eyes inquiringly to Senator Quay. Obviously he did not know the object of the consultation. Neither did the silent senator. He had been requested by his companion to introduce him to President Harrison and had fulfilled his part. In turn he looked towards Mr. McManes.

Meanwhile the old Scotsman's eyes had been fastened upon the impassive countenance of Benjamin

Harrison. When the time came for him to speak he leaned forward in his chair and spoke the few words which he deemed it his solemn duty to utter with all the earnestness at his command.

"I have come here, Mr. President," he said, slowly, "to protest against the appointment of David Martin to one of the most important federal offices in this country. He is a disreputable rascal, and his appointment as collector of internal revenue would be an insult to every respectable citizen of Pennsylvania."

The old man half rose from his chair as he continued. His language took on the tinge of the rich North Country accent of his youth and the muscles of his fine face quivered from the indignation burning within his breast. Hastily he sketched Martin's early career. He denounced him as a ruffian at the polls and a manipulator of ballot-boxes. He declared that he was a dispenser of corruption funds contributed by the liquor interests. He held him up, with all the scorn born of contempt, as a willing tool of that element in the social life of Philadelphia which defies law, order and decency. He closed with the remark that no President could afford to appoint such a man to a position of honor and trust.

When he had done the President moved uneasily in his chair and then glanced appealingly at Senator Quay, whose astonishment, though apparent, was not sufficient to loose his silent tongue. The silence was broken by Benjamin Harrison.

"They say," he observed in measured tones, "that the charges against Mr. Martin are not true."

This was more than the honest Scotsman could bear. With all the fierce impetuosity of Roderick Dhu he burst forth in resentment of what seemed to him a reflection upon his veracity.

"Mr. President," he cried, "I have lived long in Philadelphia. I am well known there. You can not find in that whole city a single responsible person who will say that I ever uttered an untruth. There sits Senator Quay. He knows me. I ask you, Senator Quay, if I am not respected in Philadelphia as a man of my word."

"Mr. McManes's word is above question," quietly observed the one addressed.

"Then, Mr. President," continued Mr. McManes, "I reiterate all I have said concerning David Martin. Senator Quay informs you that my veracity is above question. I say to you again, sir, that the appointment of David Martin would be a disgrace to your administration and an insult to every honest citizen of Pennsylvania. That is all I have to say."

Again Benjamin Harrison turned to Matthew S. Quay. This time he secured a response.

"The two senators from Pennsylvania desire this appointment, Mr. President," was all he said.

Mr. McManes made no rejoinder. He bowed to the President of the United States and left the room.

It had already been noised about in this city that there was a possibility of Martin's appointment. Great was the excitement. The ward heelers and the old time disorderly gangs who followed Martin and did his bidding were overjoyed. So the "growler" was worked deeply in the slums to the success of "our Dave." But respectable Philadelphia was shocked. The Citizens' Municipal League, which is the survival of the old Committee of One Hundred, which cleaned out the thieves and rascals connected with the city government, was concerned, but could not act directly. A memorial to the President was drawn, however, and signed by Joel J. Bailey, the chairman of the league, and by other leading members. The statement set forth that David Martin was a wholly unfit person to be placed in the collector's office, and that the appointment of one of the criminal class as collector of revenue was an insult to respectability and decency. The President was given authorities for the charges made, and legal evidence in support of them was presented. The protestants declared that they had no candidate for the position. All they asked was that a respectable man be appointed.

The messenger bearing this protest was on his way to the postoffice when he read on a bulletin board the statement that David Martin had been appointed collector of internal revenue.

Now, who is David Martin?

In his boyhood he lived in the northeastern part of Philadelphia, near a locality known as "Louse Harbor." He was a sloop and garbage gatherer and an active member of Taylor Hose Company prior to the abolishment of the volunteer fire department.

Those who knew Martin at that time say he was a characteristic tough. Taylor Hose Company was a disorderly organization and Martin acquired an influence as a leader early in life. He soon became a director of repeaters in the old nineteenth ward. His gang of immediate followers was employed by corrupt and disreputable politicians to intimidate voters and procure the nomination of men who were a disgrace to the republican party. At general elections Martin directed operations and drove citizens from the polls in order that repeaters might vote. It was not unusual for him to personally assault voters without provocation.

At the Gray senatorial election, Martin had charge of the thugs and repeaters in the portion of the district where it was afterwards proven that gigantic frauds were perpetrated. In June of the same year he took the ballot-box of the fourth division nineteenth ward to the station-house of that ward, and there the return was changed and the election officers' names were forged. As he could not read or write he did not personally forge the names, but he aided and abetted the criminal act. This fact was sworn to and published in Philadelphia newspapers at the time.

At the election for the adoption of the new constitution of Pennsylvania, the corrupt office-holders opposed the change because a portion of the opportunities for committing fraud and forgery were cut off thereby. Martin was employed as usual and had charge of the repeaters of his district. He was one of the managers that made up the false returns, whereby the nineteenth ward was to give 6,000 majority against the new constitution. The conspiracy to perpetrate the fraud was cooked in a room on Cumberland street. The returns were taken by a policeman to a house on Trenton avenue, above York. There they were falsified to suit the purpose of Martin and his fellow criminals and sent to the station-house.

The news from the state indicated that the new constitution had received an overwhelming majority. Mayor Stokely refused to receive the false returns, and used the language published in the papers at the time, that he "would not be put in a hole." The nineteenth ward really gave about three thousand majority in favor of the adoption.

In all the frauds perpetrated at elections during the past twenty years in North Philadelphia, Martin has been one of the prime movers. The committee of one hundred convicted some of his men, and sent them to prison. Martin appeared in court to sympathize with and cheer them.

One of Martin's cronies was John Ruhl. The twain got up a prize fight in the nineteenth ward, which some of the politicians of the city government attended. During the fight a raid was made by the police. Martin and Ruhl were taken to the station-house. The former's influence set him free and he returned with his gang to the scene of the fight, and the subsequent debauchery is still a theme of discussion in the neighborhood. Ruhl was afterwards sent to the Eastern penitentiary for swindling. Martin stood by him until he was taken.

Among the repeaters convicted by the committee of one hundred were William Maneely and William Guldey. Their sworn statements are interesting. Here they are:

"William Maneely makes affidavit and swears he lived in the seventeenth ward last February [1882], that he was arrested and convicted after the spring election and went to prison for six months for repeater at said election. He said that he was then and had been for some time in the employ of parties of the nineteenth and thirty-first wards to head a gang of repeaters whose business it was to get in as many fraudulent votes as they could, by voting on other people's names, going from poll to poll and putting in fraudulent votes in any way we could get them in. That last February he was so employed by Alex. Crawford, Porter Rittenhouse, 503 Diamond street; that Rittenhouse gave him a due bill for work done on election day as aforesaid; that said Rittenhouse signed said due bill, which was drawn on David Martin, who was to pay the same, and said Martin is the man who has heretofore paid witness for work of this character at elections. The practice was that for every fraudulent vote we put in we got a bluecheck which was to represent $1, and after the election, or as soon as the votes were in we could go and get $1 apiece for so many blue checks as we held; that said checks were cashed by Dave Martin.

"Witness says that there is every probability that the same game will be played at the coming election and that the same parties will be wanting to employ him in work of a like character, or in some new dodge to get their work in, and he says he is willing to give this committee aid and assistance in exposing such business; that he has been a soldier and wants to lead a straight life, and that he will do all he can to expose the fraud at the coming election.

"PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 13, 1882."

"William Guldey, alias Golden, swears that he resides at No. 1420 Frankford road, seventeenth ward; says that he was tried and convicted, together with William Maneely for fraud on the ballot at the election of February, 1882, and that he served his time in prison, from which he has lately been released; says that Porter Rittenhouse employed him last spring to act as a repeater, and he agreed that witness should be paid $2.50 for each and every fraudulent vote that he put in; that on election day, as soon as the work was done, witness received from Rittenhouse an order on David Martin for payment for said work in the shape of the following order:

" 'Mr. David Martin, please pay to bearer for four votes.

(Signed) P. R.

"And witness said Rittenhouse wrote said order in his presence, and that he has never received any money or other consideration on said order; that he presented said order to David Martin, who said that Rittenhouse should have paid it, and he (Martin) refused to pay it. Witness says his understanding was he was to receive from Rittenhouse the names of persons that he was to personate or repeat on, and that on election day Rittenhouse, who was working in his own division, would hand witness a scrap of paper containing the name of the person he was to personate or repeat on, and then witness would go to the poll and put in the vote accordingly, and that he and Maneely each cast two fraudulent votes in this way, and under the agreement were entitled to pay for the same at the rate of $2.50 per vote; that this business has been followed by witness for five or six years, and that during that time he has received payment for such work from David Martin; that he received money for casting fraudulent votes from David Martin at the spring election two years ago, 1880; that he received money from A. Albright for like work about five years ago; that David Martin has paid witness on several occasions for this kind of work."

James McManes says that a member of congress in Pennsylvania informed him that Martin approached a city member of congress and demanded $1,000 or he would incite a revolt against him at the polls. The member gave a check for the amount and it was returned from the bank afterwards, cancelled and bearing Martin's name on the back.

As a specimen of Martin's methods the story of James Rems, of Norris, near Third street, is of interest. Rems, who is a respectable shoemaker, was engaged in putting up posters for a candidate objectionable to Martin. The latter approached and told him that he did not permit any one to place advertisements of other candidates than his own in the ward. Rems persisted and Martin fell upon him and brutally beat him. A bill of indictment for criminal assault was found by the grand jury, but Martin's "pull" sufficed to bury the case in the district attorney's office.

A prominent citizen of this city informed the correspondent of the World that he witnessed one of the typical assaults for which Martin was distinguished. At an election a group of men, including several butchers, were collected near the corner of Amber and Drear streets. Martin was out with a gang of toughs at his heels intimidating voters. One of the favorite tricks of Martin was to arm heelers with short, sharp awls, so that they might prod a voter until he would abandon the attempt to vote his ballot. Martin approached the group and ascertained that those composing it were going to vote against his candidate. He gave a signal, and one of the gang pushed a young butcher towards Martin. The latter uttered a fearful oath and struck out from the shoulder. The man rolled in the gutter. Then the gang of thugs rushed on the remainder and forced some of them through a fence, which was demolished. The recalcitrant voters did not cast their ballots that day.

John M. Carson, the well-known correspondent of the Public Ledger at Washington, wrote an article for the Morning Post concerning Martin, of which the following is an extract, describing the frauds perpetrated at an election of common councilmen in the nineteenth ward:

"John B. Curtis, who is a telegraph operator at the nineteenth ward police station, tells under oath the story of the fourth division. 'I am an operator at the eighteenth district station-house. I was there on the night of the election. I saw David Martin bring the ballot box of the fourth division there. I saw the box was open and the returns lying upon the table; they (Lieut. Crawford and Martin) were writing upon the returns. Lieut. Crawford told me the box contained the returns of the fourth division. He said the change was made to beat Theodore Walton, as it would look bad for Ferreira to run behind. I went into the room to get the returns to telegraph to the central station. A number of other divisions were fixed up in the same way. In the twenty-first division the original papers were not taken into account. Papers were manufactured fixing such majorities as were required by the ring, and the names of the election officers were forged thereto.'"

The headquarters of Martin, when not in the collector's office of the custom-house, are in a building located at the corner of Sixth street and Germantown avenue. It is four stories high and was formerly used as a carriage manufactory by Boyer Bros. Martin thought that he might be able to raise money from manufacturers the easier by calling this place the "Home of the Anti-Cobden club."

The nominal membership of the Anti-Cobden Club is very large, 1,500 or more. In addition to the "heelers" and repeaters of its boss, there are many respectable mechanics and small tradesmen among the members, who were attracted by the bait of political recognition held out to them. The commingling of the good and the bad in the Anti-Cobden Club has made that club unique in some respects.

On the second floor there is a long bar, and on Sundays three bartenders are busily employed dispensing "hard stuff" and beer to the gang. In a private room Martin presides in an autocratic manner, and here he perfects his plans and plots to carry out the mandates of Statesman Quay. Already the story comes that a great scheme has been concocted to bribe a heavy contingent of democratic voters on the 4th of November. Since, by virtue of the indorsement of John Wanamaker and the two senators, and the refusal of President Harrison to heed the protest of James McManes and other citizens of high standing, Martin became collector, he has abandoned the executive work of directing repeaters and leading his gang of toughs, but he still furnishes the brains for the guidance of his henchmen. They will be ready for business on election day.

Money will be a great factor in the Quay-Delamater canvass on November 4. But who, after reading this plain, straightforward story of the acts of David Martin with the knowledge that one of the best federal offices in the state has been his reward, can say that fraud will not be a greater.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York World, October 20, 1890.

SOLIDARITY OF SPOILSMEN.

—Census Superintendent Porter seems to be preparing for the investigation into his administration, which, it is taken for granted, will be ordered by the house of representatives next winter. This, at least, is the opinion of some of the republican employes of the census office, who are grumbling a good deal over the favors shown to democrats. They assert that democratic representatives find it easier now to secure appointments and promotions for their henchmen than do republican congressmen.

They attribute this to Mr. Porter's desire to have friends on the majority side of the next house, who will have a proper sense of favors received when they get ready to investigate the census office.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 4.

—Congress having adjourned, and the necessary appropriations for the maintenance of a large number of employes in the government printing office having ceased at the same time, the public printer has found it necessary to discharge a large proportion of the people who have found employment there. It is assumed that in making the discharges the public printer has been controlled by the influences that have been at work under this administration, and has, as a good political printer, made the discharges according to some carefully conceived political plan.

But whatever it was, it was not satisfactory to a number of politicians, among whom are named Attorney-General Miller, Private Secretary Halford, Marshal Ransdell, and First Controller Matthews. The Ohio Republican Association, of which Secretary Foster has been elected a member, is noisy in expressing its dissatisfaction at the way the discharges have been made. That society had a meeting last week, and besides electing Mr. Foster and Solicitor-General Taft to membership, it elected Sixth Auditor T. B. Coulter as president and several other office-holders to other offices in the society.

Then the association had a hot time over a proposition to name a committee of five to investigate the cause of the dismissal of Ohio republicans from the printing office. Mr. T. A. Child, president of the association, and also chief clerk of the census office, appointed to act with him in finding out why republicans from Ohio were put out, while Ohio democrats were kept in, Messrs. Coulter, Hart, McGrew, and Lowry, all government employes, who are straightway to undertake to find out why Ohio may not be permitted to regulate all the appointments and discharges in the service.

Soon Census Superintendent Porter, having finished up the work which he is now crowding forward with increased force, will find it necessary to cut down. It will go hard with the employes from other states if Mr. Childs undertakes to do his duty as a member of the Ohio state association. It will be a nice business to make the discharges from the census office. A great many democrats have been accommodated with appointments there, as Mr. Cockrell and Mr. Gorman and others on the under side could tell if they were called upon to do so. While Mr. Porter desires to have republican friends, he must have democratic friends, too, and in order to get them he has sometimes intimated to democrats that he could find places for good people if they would recommend them.

Mr. Childs ought to have a list of the proteges of democratic senators and members of the house.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 17.

—There was a very sad meeting of the Business Men's Republican Association held last evening. Their president resigned because he could not stand the strain upon his nervous system caused by the constant appeals of the boys for "places" and "plums." He begged them to put a "practical politician" in his place, a man who could go around and hunt up the "plums" which the boys want. "I'm not fit for it," he said, "and I can't do it because it's repulsive to me. I'd rather try to dig dollars out of cobble-stones than ask favors of politicians." Then one of the boys laid bare the facts of the situation by saying:

"The government has spent $170,000,000 extra, and there ain't a man here who got a cent of it. If the democrats spend thousands to our hundreds, why, that's the party for us to belong to. Our president says he's going to leave us. If that's so, and we are going to adjourn sine die, let somebody say so right out, so that we can look for shelter elsewhere."—New York Evening Post, March 20.

—For several years more or less earnest efforts have been made to get new quarters for the government printing office. The present building is not large enough. It is so old and rickety as to be in an almost dangerous condition, and its interior arrangements are such as constantly to menace the health of the employes.

It looked last year as if there would really be a change for the better some time, for congress authorized a commission to select a site for a new building. This commission picked out a large lot of ground near the present printing office, and steps were taken to secure it for the government. No sooner, however, had the selection been made known than a great hue and cry against the site was raised by certain persons, who found a champion in Senator Gorman. That senator was so persistent in his attack upon the site selected that he succeeded in having the whole matter suspended until the next congress meets, so that another year is lost.

Some of the persons interested in government printing office affairs think they have found the secret of the opposition to the site selected by the commission. They have discovered that ex-Senator Mahone, the discredited boss of the republican party in Virginia, is the owner of a one-half interest in a lot of ground near the city limits, at North Capitol street, in about the most inaccessible part of Washington. This property has been offered to the government for a printing office site for $250,000, and its owners have been making very earnest efforts to induce the commission to report in its favor. If they can kill off the site now selected and force their land upon the government, it will put $125,000 into Mahone's pocket.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 3.

—Supervising Architect R. B. Eastman, of Brooklyn, who has been mixed up in some of the scandals growing out of the maladministration of affairs at the St. Johnland county farm, is said to be slated for removal. He owed his appointment, about five years ago, to a deal between the democrats and republicans in the Kings county board of supervisors.—New York Times, May 11.

—A few days ago John E. Brodsky, the republican assemblyman from the eighth district, who was elected last fall by the aid of Tammany votes, introduced in the legislature a bill whose evident object is to further embarrass the administration of public affairs in the annexed district by Louis J. Heintz, the commissioner of street improvements, who was elected to that office over the Tammany candidate put forward by Fire Commissioner Purroy. Mr. Brodsky says he introduced the bill by request, but when asked by whose request, he answers smilingly, "That's telling," and he tells no more.

John H. V. Ronner, deputy-commissioner of street improvements in the annexed district, when questioned last night regarding the bill, said it was one of the bills introduced lately at the instigation of Tammany Hall to annoy Mr. Heintz, and to oppose which Mr. Heintz had gone to Albany last week. It was introduced without the knowledge of Mr. Heintz. Its purpose, said Mr. Ronner, was apparent. Tammany had lost in the annexed district the control of patronage which the election of its candidate for commissioner of street improvements would have given it, and it was now determined to destroy Mr. Heintz's power if possible, and to lose no chance of casting unfavorable reflection upon him. The bill, Mr. Ronner continued, was entirely uncalled for. It was and would continue to be the practice of the commissioner to award contracts to the lowest responsible bidder. "But," he asked, "why should that official be denied a discretion which other heads of departments possessed, the exercise of which is often necessary in the interests of the city?"

The animus of the bill is still more plainly seen in the clause which would give the Tammany board of estimate and apportionment the right which Mr. Heintz should have, to designate the paper in which bids should be advertised for. Some people who are well acquainted with municipal politics are surprised that Tammany Hall should so openly reveal its hand in attempting to steal so petty a bit of patronage as the advertising of contracts to be awarded by Mr. Heintz may afford.—New York Evening Post, March 24.

"AN EFFECTIVE DELEGATE."

Marine D. Tackett, of Greensburgh, Ind., was to-day appointed a special agent to allot lands in severalty to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians. He is an ex-Union soldier, who carries an armless sleeve as evidence of his bravery and military service. He was an effective delegate to the republican convention at Chicago in 1888. His official duties will be performed in Arizona, and his pay will be $15 a day. The work will last probably two or three months.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, April 11.

"For my own part I could heartily wish that all honest men would enter into an association for the support of one another against the endeavors of those whom they ought to look upon as their common enemies, whatever side they may belong to. Were there such an honest body of neutral forces, we should never see the worst of men in great figures of life, because they are useful to a party; nor the best unregarded, because they are above practicing those methods which would be grateful to their faction. We should then single every criminal out of the herd and hunt him down, however formidable and overgrown he might appear.

 * * In short, we should not any longer regard our fellow-citizens as whigs or Tories, but should make the man of merit our friend and the villain our enemy."—Addison's Spectator.*

The Boston Advertiser of April 28, says:

A paper called the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is published at Indianapolis, Ind. It is a somewhat curious circumstance that the current number has copious extracts from but three papers in the United States, and each of these is notoriously bitter and unfair in its opposition to the republican party. As these excerpts fill a large part of the CHRONICLE the claim of the editors to any real independence in the cause of civil service reform must rest entirely on the editorials, which appear to have been written in an impartial vein.

The CHRONICLE takes the facts bearing upon its object wherever it can find them. It does not care which side is hurt. A few papers have of late years learned that the true way to improve the transaction of the public business is to carefully investigate cases of the use of public offices as mere plunder and publish the facts. There is nothing that worries a boss more than to bring home to him in public print that he appointed a lot of Jakes and Mikes to be weighers and gaugers and clerks because they hustled and tricked for him at a certain primary. There is no doubt a remunerative field for such investigation, even in Boston, and if the Advertiser will make it, and will tell its interesting discoveries to the public, it shall have a liberal space in this paper.

THE fire-alarm telegraph of the city has a superintendent in George Halderman, a republican, who had an assistant named George White, and a sub-assistant named Findling. The new board dismissed White and Findling, and their combined monthly salaries, less twenty dollars, were given to ex-alderman James Riley, a democrat, who was appointed as Halderman's assistant. Riley's friends claimed that he was sooner or later to have Halderman's place. Now if President Holt's board intended to seize this place as party spoil, this is the exact course it would have pursued. So far as the duties of his position are concerned Riley is an ignoramus, and it is ridiculous to say that the fire service is benefited by turning out a trained assistant and putting in an ignoramus at an increased salary. Halderman thinks he sees the point and refuses to accept Riley as an assistant, or to teach him the business, and at the last accounts Riley was sitting around the fire headquarters doing nothing and drawing sixty dollars a month. Open competition for the places in the fire department would destroy the board's usefulness in humbugging the people in this manner. Why does not the mayor require it?

MR. CHARLES B. WILBY, of Cincinnati, recently delivered an address before the Unity Church Club of that city upon the transaction of city business. He referred to the efforts of many good citizens of Cincinnati to secure the passage of a new charter which they expected would remedy all of the existing evils. Mr. Wilby has a clear sight in this respect and boldly takes the ground that no form of a city charter which leaves the spoils system in operation will give a satisfactory city government. This will prove true of the City of Indianapolis under its new charter.

President Harrison has promoted the assistant postmaster, Mr. E. P. Thompson, to be postmaster of this city. The new postmaster in his turn has filled the assistant's place by promoting the head of the money-order department, and the latter place by promoting the head of the registry department, and the latter place by promoting the assistant in that department, and the latter place by promoting a clerk from the classified service, whose place is filled from the top of the eligible list. Truly, merit and business principles have come to their own, and the President should take note that on every hand there is nothing but approbation expressed. So generally is it understood that this office is given over to the merit system that there was no "pressure" nor even an application for one of these vacancies.

THE President is under suspicion of making terms with Quay on the supposition that Quay can control the Pennsylvania delegation in the presidential nominating convention. This is a very humiliating position for the President of the United States to occupy. But aside from the immorality of such a prostitution of a public trust, the President should be very wary. Quay in most respects is not unlike Gorman and Voorhees to whose vicious tastes President Cleveland pretty steadily catered. Yet ingratitude comes easy to them. Here is Senator Voorhees:

"Where do you expect to find a Presidential candidate, senator?"

"He ought to be developed here in the West. If we must go East, I favor Senator Gorman, a man of superb sense and equipment. If Palmer were younger we could go to Illinois. Then there is A. E. Stevenson, of Illinois, ex-congressman, ex-assistant postmaster-general, whom, were he better known, would be of avail. Right here in Indiana we have Gray, a man of availability and aptitude."

Headsman Clarkson writes from Paris, France, to the chairman of the young men's republican club of Des Moines offering some suggestions for a plan of campaign. After the important admission that "the country is evenly balanced between political parties just now," he finally says:

We should utilize also the friendship of republican women in these clubs. Young men can carry on the discussions or debates; young women can aid in the entertainments with songs or recitals.

We would respectfully urge this modification. Instead of the "songs and recitals," let the young women, imitating another time of the work of the guillotine, come and knit, and listen to stories of Clarkson's guillotine. Let them knit on in dry-eyed mercilessness as they hear how competent and faithful public servants, young and old, with families dependent upon them, in the nineteenth century, have been driven from work for opinion's sake. Let these republican maidens learn how the Christian President of a great country has allowed senators to farm out the Indian service to henchmen in the face of protests that the men were unfit. Let it be explained with candor what manner of man Quay is, and why he still grows fat and impudent on the patronage of his state. Let it be carefully impressed on these young women that the modern plan in this country of getting a re-nomination and re-election to the presidency by the seizure of the civil service is safe, democratic, and patriotic, while the method occasionally tried in France and elsewhere of retaining power by means of the military service is a menace to liberty.

THE board of naval officers designated by Secretary Tracy have held examinations for the places of foremen and master mechanics in the Brooklyn navy yard. There were ninety three applicants, and fifty-nine appeared for examination. The result of the examination was that with three exceptions the present incumbent stood the highest on the list. John O'Rourke, as master boilermaker, supersedes the present incumbent. He held the place under the Cleveland administration, and was turned out by a partisan foreman under this administration to make a place for the man that he now, by virtue of a competitive examination, supplants. The board states that,

"It has in its judgment specified the candidates 'best qualified' for the positions, it is of the opinion that the men named for master shipwright, master joiner, master shipfitter, (outside work), master boilermaker, and master sparmaker do not reach that standard of excellence which is desirable or which the best interests of the government demand. This unsatisfactory state of affairs may be largely due to the want of a more general knowledge on the part of the public as to the requirements of the positions or to the inadequate rate of pay for some of the more important"

A part of the examination was oral, and a part written. A sample of the technical questions asked candidates for the position of foreman in the constructive department is:

Sketch a reverberatory furnace.
Describe the making and fitting of a spar hand.
How do you test the quality of a bar of iron?
Describe the tools used in dressing and tempering.
How would you make a manacle shackle for a large ship?
Describe the arrangement of what you consider an efficient smithy for general work—angle and beam work.

The Civil Service Record puts it well:

These are not hard questions. The men who can not write intelligibly and correct answers are not fit to be intrusted with the work. Many applicants came forward, and apparently were men of good qualities. The questions cited might prove difficult to the old-fashioned style of navy-yard striker, who could answer the following with perfect readiness:

Do you know your congressmen?
Do you know him well enough to have a pull on him?
Describe the manner of stuffing a caucus.
Should a ship be repaired in such a manner as to keep her at sea at election time?
Is a ship that can keep at sea at election time really seaworthy?

COMMISSIONER ROOSEVELT is a member of the twenty-first district republican association of the city of New York. The association threatened to pass resolutions charging evils and abuses in the civil service system of the New York custom-house. Thereupon Mr. Roosevelt invited the association to appoint a committee to go into into the custom-house to investigate the enforcement of the civil service law and rules, and this was done, and Mr. Roosevelt met the committee in the custom-house and proceeded with great earnestness to teach them what the merit system is — a system of which they knew very little. He started out as follows:

"I wish to state that I courted this investigation, because I wish every act of the civil service commission to be as public as it can possibly be made. We want publicity. We fear nobody but the contemptible, specious slanderer, who makes charges without producing the slightest scintilla of evidence to substantiate them. I also wish to state publicly now that no member of this committee is as much interested as I am in finding out if this local civil service board or any member of it has done anything crooked or displayed any favoritism on one hand or antagonism on the other.

Following this in several sessions he took the investigating committee over the old and familiar objections that the examinations are not practical; that they were unfair, and further that certain persons, favorites of this district association, could not pass, or having passed failed to get appointments, and so on. The committee labored industriously to make good the theory of its association, but if it is fair, it will have to report that it failed. The charges probably originated in a blind anger because 'the boys' found difficulty in quartering themselves upon the people, and they hoped to put the merit system to rout. The prompt opportunity given them to make their charges good, and the publicity which they were called upon to endure in trying to do it seriously embarrassed them. Their failure was only equalled by their astonishment when they were told by Mr. Roosevelt, whom they had hoped to scare, that so far as he was concerned politics would cut no figure in the competitive system.

THE student of the tendencies of the times has reason for discouragement in Indiana on one point. Let him look over the dispatches stating the commencement subjects of the high schools of the state and if they are an indication, as they are, there is a serious want of interest in all living questions connected with our government. The currency, the tariff, immigration, the lives and works of prominent men, and above all, in the opinion of this paper, the many phases of the spoils system should have been seen on these programmes. Boys and girls from fifteen upwards should have a vivid interest in these and similar questions. They should be entitled to the utmost freedom of opinion only curtailed by the requirement of courtesy of expression, and they should be taught that candor and honesty, and a desire for all the facts are essentials for every man or woman who desires intellectual and moral growth. What is the reason that all such questions are shunned?

We think there is no doubt but that the answer will have to be because teachers fear that any freedom of expression will endanger their positions because of the bigotry and savagery of party spirit. There is just now in this city an enthusiasm among the school children for the American flag, and it floats from many school-houses. That is very well, but if we are to have a spirit of patriotism inculcated, the flag alone is not enough. The young and the old in Indiana and elsewhere must permit freedom of opinion and freedom of its expression. Washington's words on the baneful effects of the spirit of party might well be inscribed on every flag:

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another.

There is an opinion that parties, in free countries, are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true; and in government of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in government purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warning, it should consume.

Mr. Gorman seems to be still in the saddle. Senator Voorhees has nominated him for the presidency, and the money has been raised, the silver service bought and presented amidst the wildest enthusiasm of Mr. Gorman's clubs. Mr. Gorman apparently listened with gravity to the mayor's address for which, unfortunately, there is space only for the following specimen:

"The pleasing duty has been imposed upon me," said the mayor, "of being the instrument of a very large number of your fellow-citizens to present to you a token of their grateful appreciation of the great services you have rendered to the nation and to your state. In doing so, I feel, sir, that I am taking an humble part upon an occasion which will be, and which is worthy of being historical.

"In the tented field, in the forum, in the senate, it has always happened that when the essential rights of man have been assailed and have been in peril, providence has raised up a champion for their defense and maintenance."

The report also states that a feature of the testimonial, which was not ready to be presented with the service, is the book containing the names of the subscribers. This is being prepared under the direct supervision of Mr. Douglas H. Thomas. It is estimated that the book will cost about $500, and it will be a high model of the book-binders' art. The names will be inscribed alphabetically in English illuminated script letters. The whole silver service will be illustrated in one large picture, which will probably be made the frontispiece. Each separate piece will also be illustrated. The whole will be bound in crimson and gold, with a suitable inscription on the outer cover. It will take several months to finish this book, and on its completion it will be presented to Senator Gorman without ceremony.

The Maryland civil service reform association should be allowed to "edit" this memorial volume. Surely the names of Eugene Higgins, I. Freeman Raisin and Wallace Owings, with a handsome subscription from each, will be among the first. A biographical sketch will always be of interest. Something like this:

"He appointed Eugene Higgins patronage clerk of the treasury. Higgins altered election poll and registration books, in 1879, and he reversed an election in 1875, by getting possession of the ballot boxes after the polls were closed, burning ballots of one party and substituting those of the other. He is skilled in every phase of political manipulation. Gorman kept him in the treasury nearly three years, and then transferred him to other fields of usefulness. He appointed Morris A. Thomas, Indian agent. Thomas was a dishonest business man, a fraudulent bankrupt, a ballot-box stuffer, and, as an election judge, had received illegal votes. But the plainest proof of these facts by eye witnesses weighed nothing against Congressman Gorman's indication that the appointment be made, and Thomas is now employing his leisure between campaigns as a care taker of Indians.

I. Freeman Raisin was appointed naval officer. Raisin was, before the war, an officer of a political club of Baltimore "thugs and outlaws" and is now a leader of the criminal classes, a notorious lobbyist, a skilled ballot-stuffer and ballot-burner. At one period it was his custom to send for any one who had a measure before the city council, and notify him of the price at which it could get through. If paid, it went through; otherwise, not. One man was put into the government printing office when under indictment for a brutal assault. He had during his career been indicted four times and arrested nine times. Another was put into the Baltimore custom-house when under indictment, for which he may be brought to trial any day, for fraudently striking 223 names from the registration list.

Wallace Owings was made a ganger. In 1886 he was in court as a prosecuting witness against a man charged with having assaulted him. The prisoner was brought in and stood with his back to Owings, and the latter, in this safe position, attempted to murder him by shooting; the wound was not fatal. For this he was indicted, but never tried. George Trust was made a clerk in the office of the collector of internal revenue. In 1879, a negro named Robinson had just come to Baltimore with his wife and child. While walking along the street a man asked him his politics. Before he could reply, the questioner shot him dead. The murderer was the present clerk, George Trust. He had never seen the man before, and was absolutely without provocation. An indictment, trial, and sentence to prison for four years and seven months followed; the defense being insanity, produced by intemperate habits. His appointment caused a storm, which he watched awhile, and then, in a mock-innocent letter, in which he alludes to his murder as an 'unfortunate occurrence,' resigned.

And by all means let the simple statement be added from John K. Cowen's history of the Gorman regime in Maryland, that "murder, pure and simple, is recognized as a political service to be rewarded in state, national and municipal affairs."

THE Civil Service Record, with the June number, completes its tenth year. It states that—

These ten years cover the most critical and important part of the history of civil service reform; and, in order to give a complete view of its history, the management has had a full index prepared, covering the whole ten volumes.

The work has been done by Mr. Evarts B. Greene, a Harvard graduate of 1890, and now pursuing a post-graduate course at Cambridge in history and political economy. He has had some suggestions as to preparing this from Albert Bushnell Hart, Ph. D., assistant professor in history. The work has been thoroughly done, not by compiling the old indices, but by going over every number of the Record afresh.

This index, with the title page, will be printed with the July number.

Any college that attempts to teach history in the modern spirit can find nothing to take the place of the volume covering these years. Any person who wants to keep informed of the current and ever changing phases of spoils politics can not afford to be without the Civil Service Record, and we make free to add the Civil Service Reformer and the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE; and yet it is a constant experience to meet friends of the merit system more than ordinarily enthusiastic who regret "the want of the facts put in a plain way" that have been illustrated in all of these papers more than a hundred times each year.

HARRISON'S RENOMINATION.

The Indianapolis News of June 22 has performed a public service in securing an interview from "a well-known resident of this city" who was present at a recent meeting held here of opponents of the renomination of President Harrison. The interview, most of which is printed elsewhere, is a curious illustration of the hold the feudal idea has upon a large class of politicians. This man occupied a column of the News and is evidently a representative of the gathering in question. He is earnestly opposed to the renomination of Harrison, but his reasons are not grounded upon the least desire to elevate the tone of public affairs or to improve the management of public business. On the other hand his reasons are of the baser sort. The sum of it is that the right workers have not been paid with offices. There are good reasons why President Harrison should not be renominated but these opponents evidently do not care to lay hold of them or to have them made prominent; nor would they care to see any other President carry out the principles upon which these objections are founded.

Just grounds for opposition to the renomination of the President are such as giving offices largely to his relatives, which is comparatively a minor but an inexcusable offense. He has refused to dismiss unworthy public officers like Raum. He is responsible for the failure to prosecute the Mahone blackmailers to conviction. He has combined with Mahone and Quay. He has removed officers like Corse, Pearson, Graves and Burt to the detriment of the public service and with a view to helping his party machine. He re-debauched the Indian service. He has used and has permitted to be used the public service to the extent of more than 100,000 places to pay personal or party debts, beginning with the appointment of Wanamaker. He has done some things in the way of permitting the enforcement of the civil service law and extending the merit system which ought to be put into the other side of the scale, notwithstanding the fact that he has rewarded fellows like Grosvenor who did all they could to break down the law. His merits do not meet what the country had a right to expect. It is not a question whether he has done as well as or better than President Cleveland. Upon that point we think he need not fear comparison. But the standard of criticism is and ought to be higher. President Harrison is to be judged by what his party and himself promised when he was elected and by what he could reasonably have accomplished. These promises have been as a whole flagrantly disregarded. The question in a nut-shell is whether the people ought to be asked to sanction by re-election the acts of a President who has confessedly used more than 100,000 places in the public service with salaries attached which are paid by the whole people and with duties to be performed which are owed to the whole people, to pay for personal or party services, or in other words to feed an insatiable partisan machine. Is not this exercise of autocratic power so unparalleled in the governments of the world and so stupendous and dangerous that it overshadows and dwarfs all other acts?

RAUM.

It is not at all likely that Pension Commissioner Raum will be asked to resign, or that he will tender his resignation voluntarily. Enough inquiry has been made by the secretary of the interior, and others directly interested in the administration of the pension office, to ascertain that Commissioner Raum was in no way responsible for any of the shortcomings of his son, and that he made no effort whatever to shield him when he was finally charged with peculation in office. No one has found anything in the official work of Commissioner Raum to include him in any way in the charges which have been made against any employe of the pension office. It has not been found that a single penny has been ever turned in a dishonest direction by Commissioner Raum, or that anything done or left undone by him can be distorted into a connection with the shortcoming of any employe of the bureau. He has been diligent, honest and capable. The highest possible confidence has been placed in Gen. Raum's integrity, and the recent vicious and ferocious outcry made against the commissioner is regarded in official circles, as well as by private citizens who have been watching the management of the office from the outside, as due directly to a growing prejudice in democratic and mugwump quarters against pensions. It may be that much of this talk comes from the fact that the pension laws have been liberally construed and the payments for pensions largely increased, but no one has yet charged General Raum with anything done which was dishonest. Neither have his private business affairs been connected by any one, in point of fact, with any of his official connections. Undoubtedly the same fight would be continued against any other man who could become commissioner of pensions, and it has been concluded that as we are entering upon a period of general assault against pension business it can be resisted as well under the present administration of the office as it could be under the direction of any other man. In other words the attack upon General Raum is regarded as an attack upon the pension system, since investigation has convinced the President that General Raum is guilty of no misconduct in his official position.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 4.

Such a dispatch as the above will under all the circumstances be taken as an official statement. It means that the President has determined to pursue the plan followed by President Grant with officials "under fire" and that the attempt is to be made to direct attention from Raum by the bogus alarm of an attack on the pension system. It is well then to review some facts connected with the Raum family, and thus determine what the President's idea of a public officer is.

Raum created a new division known as the appointment division, and put his son Green B. Raum, Jr., at the head of it, with the title of assistant chief clerk. How the President should have been affected by this has been stated by Thomas Jefferson. "The public will never be made to believe that the appointment of a relative is made on the ground of merit alone, uninfluenced by family views; nor can they ever see with approbation offices, the disposal of which they entrust to their Presidents for public purposes, divided out as family property." After Raum had created a place for his son, he removed from the room a woman clerk who had been making some fifteen dollars a month in notary fees, and the Journal correspondent showed how the flow of fees was turned to Raum, Jr. "When visitors to the office have inquired for a notary they have usually been sent to him, and he is doing a considerable portion of the business that the woman did formerly." Another son, after his father became commissioner of pensions, went into partnership in the pension claim business, and the firm circulars, scattered to attract business, stated the fact that one partner was the son of the commissioner of pensions. The President and every one else knows that this would give the impression, and was intended to give the impression, that claims presented by John Raum would have 'advantages.' The most powerful claim agent in Washington, employing hundreds of clerks, and controlling the most widely circulated pension paper, indorsed a note for the commissioner of pensions a few days before the commissioner made an important ruling of advantage to this attorney. The New York Times justly said of the President's responsibility:

He is bound to see that the work of the pension bureau is trusted only to clean hands, and that there shall be no taint of suspicion upon the integrity, the purity, the fidelity and disinterestedness of the officials in charge of it. He knows by his own personal observation what any one can readily infer, that this work demands peculiarly scrupulous agents, that it is liable to great abuse, that abuses have in the past been rank in the bureau, and that anything short of the most thorough reform is an outrage upon the soldiers and a disgraceful betrayal of trust.

He knows especially that the body of pension agents and attorneys that have grown up about the bureau, and, for that matter, in the bureau itself, are as greedy and corrupt as any body of men in the country except the tariff lobby. He knows their power, their wealth, their elaborate organization, their system skillfully developed by years of experience and study, by which they rob the soldier-pensioners on the one hand and the tax-payers on the other. He knows that the law intended that their services, or those of any intermediary whatever, should be unnecessary, and that it was meant that any deserving claimant for a pension in any part of the country should get all the information necessary and all the aid required to file his claim and get it proved and promptly and regularly paid without expense to himself. And yet it has come about that this is practically impossible, that the pensioners are obliged to employ outside agents at their own cost, and that very frequently these agents connive at fraud on the government, while in other cases they bleed the veterans.

Raum has been under investigation on another serious charge, and upon which the report of the committee can not be taken as conclusive. It is not necessary to rely upon any disputed facts. Raum was months ago so enveloped in suspicious acts that to retain him in office was an act of impropriety. So long ago as last winter it was shown that young Green Raum kept two horses and that a messenger in the pension office cared for them. When asked on the witness stand what compensation he gave he declined, saying it was none of Mr. Cooper's business, and according to Congressman Cooper

"The evidence disclosed that he had an old soldier removed from the force of laborers and secured the appointment in his place of a colored man who was the keeper of a gambling house, under indictment at the time of his appointment for keeping an unlicensed and disorderly house."

Young Raum still kept his place, and the other day was allowed to resign with thirty days' pay, because he had sold an office and stolen $72. It is stated that "a regular bureau for the auctioning off of appointments has been maintained in the pension office for months. People would be appointed to place outside the civil service rules, usually paying $600 a year, provided they made the appointment profitable to Mr. Raum's ring. It has been no uncommon thing of late to see advertisements in the daily papers here offering definite sums to any one who would obtain places for the advertisers—usually the sum of $100 or $200. Outsiders have wondered if such advertisements ever produced any results. Young Green B. Raum might shed some light on the subject. It is said that the investigation has disclosed that he and his confederates sold original appointments, that they sold promotions to those in the office and that they even sold the privilege of selection under the civil service rules. Selling promotions was comparatively easy, for that matter was largely under control of the thrifty appointment clerk, Raum. One of young Raum's confederates was getting $1,000 a year when Raum entered the pension bureau. He is now getting $1,800 and two of his sisters have been promoted twice. One of the methods pursued was having clerks who had entered the service for pay take the examinations for promotions by proxy."

The particular case requiring Raum's resignation with thirty days' pay was the case of a South Carolinian named Smith advertised to pay $200 for a place in Washington paying $50 a month. He was soon approached by a negro who offered to obtain it for him. The negro, who was formerly a servant in the Raum family, introduced the South Carolinian to Green B. Raum, Jr., and it was not long before he received his commission and paid the negro the $200. Later on the new clerk desired promotion into the classified service, but he doubted his capacity to pass the civil service examinations. Another clerk, J. L. Johnson, took the examination under the name of the South Carolinian and the promotion was soon accomplished under these fraudulent papers.

The climax to this career of the Raum family is that the administration evidently intends that young Raum shall not be punished. Attorney General Miller declined the request of the civil service commission for an opinion whether Raum's offenses were punishable by law unless "requested" by the President. The President apparently has not "requested" the opinion, and at last the public is given this Journal dispatch.

RECENT MEETINGS OF ASSOCIATIONS.

The civil service reform association, of Buffalo, held its annual meeting June 12. It met in a community converted to the merit system. The life of this association puts to shame the helplessness of crowds of good people who shake their heads and say, "Things always have been so, and always will be." There was no more unpromising ground than Buffalo when this association began its work ten years ago. It knew what the spoils system was and it proceeded to give practical effect to its conviction that there was a remedy. After the national and state civil service laws were passed this association knew when those laws were being enforced and when they were being tricked, and it did not hesitate to contend with the enemy in public meetings, in the public prints, in the courts and elsewhere. The lasting and final triumph came in repeated decisions of the court of appeals of New York. At last completely defeated, the city government of Buffalo took up the civil service law and outdid itself in zeal of execution. The committee reported to the meeting that "there is scarcely an office in the city, except those which are exempt by statute from the civil service law, to which appointment is not made by competitive examination only." As is always the case, the only ones who had to be defeated were the machine politicians who made a living out of politics. The people of Buffalo were in favor of the merit system as soon as they understood it, and the fight with the party machines accomplished the schooling process.

Fifty-three new members were admitted. The association thanked Secretary Tracy for his proposed application of the merit system to the navy-yards. We quote two resolutions:

1. That in the judgment of this association, the caution which at first limited the operation of the law for the reform of the civil service to federal offices having not less than fifty employees, is no longer justifiable. The reform has passed the season of experiment, and stands fully approved before the people. Its success justifies and demands its extension to the great body of the official places in the gift of the federal government.

2. That this association cordially approves and earnestly urges the passage of the bill introduced by Congressman H. C. Lodge, of Massachusetts, for the selection of fourth-class postmasters on the basis of merit.

The civil service reform association of Pennsylvania held its tenth annual meeting in Philadelphia April 8. The report of the executive committee submitted to the meeting shows a decided disposition in the association to "tackle" the lion in the den—the head of an office who puts himself above the law. Controller Thompson of Philadelphia, having been reported to have taken such a stand, a committee of the association asked him about it, but he declined to state his intentions. He then began dismissing employes without cause, and when the committee again addressed him, he declined to give reasons for his actions, and denied the right of citizens to interrogate him. This is a fortunate answer; it will not lessen the pugnacity of the association. Similar remarks in Indiana have caused the remarker and his party a great deal of trouble.

The executive committee says that the merit system does not stir the mass of the community as did slavery and seamen's rights. It should be remembered that, particularly in the case of slavery, it took many years to rouse the conscience of the people. It may take a higher civilization to justly abhor the spoils system, but the time is not far off when, if the civil service reformers do their duty, the appointment of a political freebooter like Martin to be a public officer over the citizens of Philadelphia will rouse the people of that city more than Garrison ever roused the city of Boston upon the subject of slavery.

The committee reported a more faithful observance of the federal law, and as we remember the late Postmaster Harrity, there was room for it. At a dinner in the evening Herbert Welsh delivered an address, in which he said:

During the past democratic administration, out of a force of fifty-eight Indian agents, fifty three were removed, and there was virtually a clean sweep of the whole Indian service, including the school force, with the consequent failure of Mr. Cleveland's earnest desire to promote the welfare of the Indian. Under the present administration, the carnival of spoils in the Indian service has been as riotous as under the last, and owing to a combination of circumstances far more calamitous, for a serious outbreak has occurred which, it is true, had its origin in other causes, but which undoubtedly was precipitated by the spoils system.

The report of the executive committee to the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association, which met recently, speaking of the Civil Service Record, of which it is with the Boston Association a joint publisher, says:

The average number of pages during the year has been $10\frac{1}{2}$ and the average monthly edition 4350.

The Record is sent as follows:—

2621 copies to the following civil service reform associations:

Boston.....	439
Philadelphia.....	350
New York.....	333
Buffalo, N. Y.....	195
Milwaukee, Wis.....	109
Missouri.....	220
Brookline.....	115
Cambridge.....	164
Newton.....	314
Malden.....	53
Geneva, N. Y.....	36
New Haven, Ct.....	40
Lawrence, Kansas.....	12
Brooklyn, N. Y.....	250

To 1117 young men's christian association throughout the country, these being distributed in every state in the union and the District of Columbia.

A monthly average of 170 copies has been sent to paying individual subscribers in Alabama, California, Connecticut, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia and Utah Territory and the District of Columbia.

Eighty-nine copies to sundry persons, libraries, societies, etc., in Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Wisconsin, and the District of Columbia.

Ninety-five copies to newspapers (exchange list) in Alabama, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, Wisconsin and the District of Columbia.

Ninety-eight are sent to the leaders of the reform movement in Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

Copies of the Record are also sent to the President of the United States and to each member of his cabinet.

The New York Civil Service Reform Association held its annual meeting May 20. The report of its executive committee commends the Brooklyn civil service commission, but speaks with a more than doubtful tone of the state commission, and the New York city commission. The last two commissions are Delphian, and under them the law shows those curious results which we used to witness in Indiana. Why does not the New York association take up the gauntlet thus impudently thrown down? Why does it not measure strength with Hill and the commissions? There could be but one result to such a struggle, and that would be a victory for the association. Such a movement was proposed at the meeting but it seemed to be discouraged by the chairman of the executive committee, Mr. Everett P. Wheeler. The chairman of the new committee on civil service examinations, Mr. C. W. Watson, is a good man to step into the breach, or to make one and then step into it.

The Missouri Civil Service Reform Association held its tenth annual meeting at St. Louis May 28. It heard a report of its executive committee and elected officers. The late Judge Breckenridge was formerly president of the association.

The Indiana Civil Service Reform Association held a meeting in this city June 6 for the purpose of electing officers. William D. Foulke, of Richmond, was elected president. The appointment of the executive committee has not yet been completed. The association has several times doubled its membership in the last two years, and is composed of several hundred influential men from all parts of the state. It has no annual dues, and each work undertaken is cared for by a special subscription. It is time that a large number of people throughout the state who have never taken any interest or made any sacrifices in the war against the spoils system should begin to do both.

THE MINISTER AS A CITIZEN.

We wish some earnest enemy of the spoils system would cause to be printed and sent to every clergymen of every denomination in Indiana the recent address of of Congressmen George Fred Williams, of Massachusetts to the clergy. It is all so apt and spirited that it is hard to determine what to take and what to leave:

"What is it which deadens the priestly function when the immoralities of public life are exposed to view?" Our public business and its moral standards and methods belong to every citizen; nay, more, as they take the stamp of public approval they pass current among men as our authorized coin. Yet while public men are striving upward, seeking to bring more honesty, more decency, some touch of Godliness into the affairs of the republic, it can not be denied that to the pulpit they look, generally in vain, for protection or encouragement.

It is true there have been notable exceptions; and ministers of this faith have furnished many of them; they make it easy for me now to thank them for their work, and to beg that it be honored and emulated.

It has been given to the church to keep the spiritual interests of men, and the field of moral instruction has been yielded to it quite as fully as that of religious teaching. I ask you by what right you abandon the great field of public morals; why are you silent in the face of public wrongs and scandals? Where are your words for the champions of political honesty?

What wonder that the power of the church wanes, if it stands silent and listless as the devil takes possession of the public business. Let me suggest that the ministry owes it intervention in the moral struggles of politics, first to the politician, second to the cause of morality itself, and third to his country.

You owe it to the politician who is making any effort to hold up the standards of political honesty. He needs your help even for himself; because there is no calling in life which so discourages ideals and makes high motives so dangerous as politics.

Men risk their reputations when they enter politics; therefore men with reputations are apt to keep out of it. I fear clergymen avoid it less because it threatens their reputations than because their pulpits are in danger. I agree that there is common consent among the political sinners, that they should not be referred to from the pulpit, but that consent should not settle your duty.

But surely the church has jurisdiction, sin is its peculiar business, and the ministers are pure men who can not be frightened with recriminations. I ask in all earnestness "if public wrong, immorality, dishonesty is not the business of the clergy, whose business is it?"

The politician is the thing to be reformed; he will reform as public opinion demands, and you are responsible for the moral sentiment of the community. Indeed, ministers of the gospel should stand in the front ranks of attack upon public wrongs. You need not mix in politics; but politics is not wrong and wrong is not politics. It is because public sins are most powerful that it is your first duty to attack them. In private sin men shrink and are ashamed, because they are alone; public sin becomes bold and defiant because many are joined in it. The offenders stand together, they defend together; they may be enough to call themselves of the public; they may even constitute the public; they may sit in your front pews and menace you.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord.

—Editor O. E. Mohler, of the Fort Wayne Gazette, is in the city. The Gazette is the most outspoken anti-Harrison republican organ in the state. Mr. Mohler says that there are no Harrison republicans in Allen county outside of the federal office-holding ring. Gresham would get 99 per cent. of the republican vote if the nomination was decided by popular election.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 3.

"No candidate who can not carry his state undivided can expect to be nominated. It is an established fact that Harrison can never again carry our whole delegation. If the Bruce Carrs and Sam Kerchevals and other administration imps come here again to influence our district convention, they will be uncontestedly kicked out. Hereafter, if the first district of Indiana prefers Blaine, or Gresham, or Alger, or anybody else to Harrison, its choice must be respected.

"There are a few—and very few—newspapers in this state that care much for Harrison. Some of them have post-offices and things tied to their tails to hold them steady in the harness; one has a consulship at Palermo, the headquarters of the Mafia. The 'court organ' draws $35,000 or $40,000 a year from the treasury, and therefore can afford to ignore the anti-Harrison meeting of last Thursday. But the independent republican papers that have no favors to ask will get their work in, you bet."—Evansville Journal, June, 1891.

—The following Columbus telegram to the Cincinnati Post, an independent newspaper with republican sympathies, will be of interest:

"Supporters of the national administration, including scores of the fourth-class postmasters throughout the state, have received hints, which, although coming indirectly, are none the less regarded as authoritative, to the effect that the civil service rules prohibiting their active participation in political preliminaries will not be rigidly enforced if they are delegates to the convention."—Indianapolis Sentinel, May 21.

—No political conference held in this city for years has attracted so much attention or excited the same interest as the "anti-Harrison movement" recently inaugurated in this city. Since it adjourned the men who composed it have talked comparatively little: but tongues are wagging everywhere over the affair. There has been more talk abroad than here in Indiana, where the President's friends are alert. The News called upon a well-known resident of this city, who was present, for an interview. It will be seen that he represents the hostile element that betrays Harrison a poor politician, and unpopular in his contact with republicans who are not his personal friends.

"What objection is urged against the President?"

"Well, I will name a few. General Harrison was no sooner elected than he seemed to feel that he elected himself—and that he was under obligations to no one, with the possible exception of Mr. Wanamaker, who raised $400,000 to assist in footing the bills. Before his cabinet was formed he snubbed

Mr. Blaine, who offered to visit this city to consult about the cabinet. Before he had been President a month he offended every member of the national republican committee.

"During the canvass he said to a delegation of republicans from La Fayette, that he recognized the fact that most of the republicans in their county had another convention preference; that he had always believed convention preferences should be free in the republican party, and that no prejudice should follow any republican on account of that preference. As party men we will judge men by his past convention conduct. Now, did he follow that course? Not much. Where is a republican who favored the nomination of General Gresham at Chicago that has received an appointment at his hands?"

"Were not Major Calkins and General Shackelford given appointments?"

"I am glad you mentioned those men. The President always apologizes for Calkins's appointment as judge of the district court of Washington territory by saying he did not know that Major Calkins was a resident of Washington territory until he received an almost unanimous request from the bar of that territory asking for Calkins' appointment, and that he could do nothing else, but when the territory was admitted as a state a few months later, and it became necessary to make a new appointment, and when the appointment would have been of some value, the President refused to appoint him. If it was a proper appointment in the first instance it was infinitely more so when the territory became a state. The little judgeship he gave General Shackelford in the Indian territory is too insignificant to mention. These are the only Gresham men who have received recognition from the President. He seems to have changed his mind after he made that little speech to the La Fayette delegation. He is known to have interfered and prevented his cabinet and even bureau officers from appointing men whom they desired to appoint, who favored General Gresham at Chicago. No, sir; the President has shown himself to be selfish and vindictive.

"The republicans of the Evansville and La Fayette districts were known to prefer the nomination of General Gresham at Chicago, and for that reason they have been ignored, and neither district has received recognition, while Mr. Cheadle, congressman from the latter district, was snubbed and almost insulted by the President when he insisted upon being allowed to control the patronage in his district. While President Harrison was a member of the senate he was a staunch advocate of what is known as senatorial etiquette, viz.: allowing the senators to name all appointments in the state at large, as well as in districts represented by democrats. This he denied to Mr. Cheadle, while according it to representatives Steele, Owen and Brown.

"In Illinois he denied the senators and representatives the right to control anything, but made many important appointments over their protest—all because the republicans of that state were for Gresham at Chicago. The President did not recollect that Chicago contributed $94,000 to aid in his election, and that much of that amount was solicited by his son Russell and his law partner, the present attorney-general of the United States. He was determined to get even. In Ohio he permitted Senator Sherman to control all the patronage he claimed.

"The gentlemen who attended that meeting will call another at no distant day, and will not apply to any one for permission to do so. They are the slaves of no man, or clique of office holders.

"We do not underestimate the influence of public patronage in the hands of men who are now and have been using the same since March 4, 1890, to perpetuate themselves in power. For instance, note the appointment of Charley Foster, of Ohio, as secretary of the treasury. That state is red hot for Blaine. Charley Foster was given the most powerful department in the government, so far as patronage is concerned to enable him to capture the state for Harrison in the next national convention.

"What was the character of Colonel Conger's speech?"

"Well, some portions were semi-confidential and therefore will not be repeated; but it related to the President's want of experience as a political leader, knowledge and judgment of politics as well as of men; the use he is now making of public patronage to perpetuate himself and associates in power; his efforts to give one faction in Ohio an advantage over another. He thought the President did much to bring about the defeat of the republicans in Ohio at the last gubernatorial election. He doubted seriously whether Harrison could carry Ohio if renominated.

"General McNulta attributed the recent and present demoralization in Illinois politics to President Harrison's treatment of the leading republicans of that state, including its senators and members of congress. He has ignored their wishes and appointed men to office whom no one wanted, or men who did little or nothing for the party, because that state and its newspaper men almost unanimously supported Gresham at Chicago. He firmly believed that should Harrison be renominated he will fail to carry Illinois. The recent victory for the democrats in that state has greatly weakened the republican party and the mass of the party is so indifferent to Harrison that they would not work as they would for another candidate. A resolution was adopted by a rising vote declaring that all present were opposed to the renomination of President Harrison, and moving for the appointment of a committee to call another meeting, at which a permanent organization will be effected. It will be an open movement, with nothing to conceal. We propose to see whether public office is a public trust or a private snap."—Indianapolis News, June 22.

—The republican state central committee of Iowa has begun to assess the office-holders in that state at an earlier date than usual. A circular issued by Chairman Mack and addressed to a railway postal clerk, says: "Last fall our committee called upon you as a republican for a contribution to our campaign fund. As our books show you either responded only in part or not at all to our request. These contributions were expected to carry the party through the whole year. Owing to the failure of our friends to respond, we are in need of some funds now to straighten up some matters left from the fall's work, and to do some very necessary work before our state convention meets."—New York Evening Post, May 25.

—The reconciliation between Mahone and ex-Congressman Langston, whom the former has fought so bitterly, has caused a little flutter in republican circles. This reconciliation is accepted to mean that Mahone has returned to politics and is harmonizing the working factions for the Presidential contest.

Mahone is preparing to secure a delegation from this state to the national republican convention which will favor his candidate. The reconciliation between Mahone and Langston was no doubt effected for practical purposes. The chairman of the republican committee, who votes as vigorously as he fights, has made relentless war upon the colored ex-congressman, and, it is believed, has spent money lib-

FEUDALISM.

The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—[Blackstone.]

erally to defeat him in his congressional fight in the fourth district. Langston passed through here on his way to Petersburg this afternoon. Here is what he said to a reporter about Mahone:

"I have no doubt that Mr. Mahone would now do anything to advance my personal or official interests which he and my friends might deem advisable and judicious in connection with the advancement of the republican party, the general interest of colored Americans, and the highest welfare of our citizens generally. In Mr. Mahone's integrity as a republican, in his intelligence as a Virginia gentleman of high character, and in his sagacity as an American statesman, interested in both sections of our country and our common welfare, I have full confidence."—Richmond Dispatch to New York Times, March 26.

—The Young Republican Club, of Philadelphia, celebrated its tenth anniversary last night with a dinner. Among the speakers was Collector Cooper. In the course of his remarks he said:

"The recent results in revolutionized Rhode Island, in ever doubtful New York, in gerrymandered Michigan, and even in the Kansas and Nebraska alliance, all go to show a bright Presidential promise which has not been shaken by the declaration of some club man in Boston, whose name I have forgotten, that the chairman of the republican national committee was responsible for the loss of Massachusetts. It was lost last fall, partially, upon a purely personal issue, as was Pennsylvania, partially, upon a like issue; but for any club man, however obscure, to attribute the loss of Massachusetts to the republican national chairman at a time when he exercised no control, whereas the state was carried handsomely for Harrison in 1888 when he had control, passes the standard of logic." * * *

The members of the club were so disorderly during the speeches that City Solicitor Warwick, the last speaker, said to them that "the insolence, not to say the inebrity," of some of the disturbers might be pardoned but could not be forgotten.—Philadelphia Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, April 11.

—United States Senator Quay arrived in the city early yesterday afternoon en route from Washington to his home in Beaver. Among his visitors at the Continental Hotel was Congressman Harmer, whose district comprises Germantown. He called on the senator in the interest of Mr. Brooks. Col. Quay, it is understood, in his conference with President Harrison on Monday, when he handed in Collector Martin's resignation, not only discussed the question in connection with the appointment of a successor, but also pressed the candidacy of Second Comptroller of the Treasury Col. B. Frank Gilkeson, of Bucks county, for appointment to the bench of the court of claims, to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Judge Schofield.

The local politicians who called on Senator Quay at the hotel yesterday afternoon and last evening, afterwards expressed themselves satisfied that Brooks would get the internal revenue collectorship and Gilkeson the judgeship of the court of claims. One of them, an up-town leader, said:

"There has been a great deal published about reported differences between Senator Quay and President Harrison. There is not a word of truth in any of the stories. Senator Quay's interview with the President on Monday was one of the most satisfactory he ever had."

"Will Col. Gilkeson be appointed to the bench of the court of claims?"

"It looks that way," said the politician guardedly.

"And Representative Brooks to the internal revenue collectorship?"

"It looks that way; I guess it's about settled that Brooks will be the new collector."

The question which is giving some slight uneasiness to the minds of the party workers closely identified with the revenue office at the present time, is whether or not there will be any changes in the subordinate places in the department. The gaugers and deputies are all at sea as to what is in store for them after Collector Martin goes out on the 1st of July, although if William H. Brooks is to be his successor, it is not believed there will be any changes, unless for cause. Mr. Brooks is conservative, and he is besides on good terms with some of the party leaders who were opposed to Mr. Martin's appointment to the collectorship originally, notably James McManes. The latter, who has never had much to do with helping elect republican tickets since the present collector of internal revenue was put into office, it is said may feel prompted by the change in officials to come out and once more take an active hand in the party campaigns.—Philadelphia Press, June 9.

—The President has appointed William H. Brooks, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania, vice David Martin, resigned.—Washington Dispatch, June 18.

—"Boss" Quay is on a familiar footing again at the White House. If the President shares any of Mr. Roger Wolcott's scruples about the prominence of Quay in the party management, he evidently feels compelled to stifle them in view of the necessity of getting a Harrison delegation from Pennsylvania. Quay had quite a slate of federal appointments to present to-day, and he was with the President for a long time. He wants his creature, Second Comptroller Gilkeson, made a judge in the court of claims in place of Judge Schofield, who is about to retire. This will leave a vacancy in the second comptroller's office which Mr. Quay also expects to fill. He was accompanied to the White House by collector Martin of Philadelphia, who handed in his resignation. Quay had a candidate for this place also. The resignation was only made known to-day, so that Quay was easily able to forestall other claimants.

Speaking of general politics, he laughs at the other Pennsylvania republicans who are seeking his place in the senate, and intimates that he has little fear of them. He feels that with the federal patronage at his back he can snap his fingers in the faces of his enemies in the republican party. The power he wields at the White House is well explained by a fellow republican who remarked to-day: "If the President knows which side his bread is buttered on he won't turn down Senator Quay. If he does, he won't get one of the sixty-two delegates of Pennsylvania in the next national convention."—Boston Post, June 9.

—Senator Sherman has been recently mortified by one of the appointments made by President Harrison in the south. Just before Mr. Harrison started on his "swing around" trip he indorsed on the back of an application for the appointment of Emil A. Weber to be postmaster at Donaldsonville, La., the words, "Let this commission be made out." Postmaster General Wanamaker's assistant, Mr. Whitfield, of Ohio, had the appointment made out, and Mr. Weber is in office awaiting the confirmation of the senate.

It seems that the appointment was made by the President upon the request of Collector Warmoth, to meet the emergency created by the transfer of the Donaldsonville postmaster to the office of melter in the mint. One day recently Mr. Sherman visited Mr. Whitfield, and expressed astonishment that Weber should have been appointed to any office by the administration.

But Mr. Whitfield, it appeared, had forgotten the history of Weber. He did not remember that it was Weber who had been a witness in 1877 in the Louisiana election controversy, and that he had been brought to Washington to testify that his brother had received a letter from Sherman promising that he should be paid $500 for counting certain election returns in a certain way, and after he had reached Washington his chief complaint was that he had received $300 instead of $500. The letter referred to by the witness had been found by him in a trunk belonging to his brother, who had been killed, and he had destroyed it.

Mr. Sherman had a very poor opinion of his truthfulness, and he had a lively remembrance of the annoyance that Weber's testimony had given him at the time it was brought out. What Mr. Warmoth's idea was in bringing forward this discredited politician is not yet known, but it is known that Weber has the office, and it is assumed that when the delegates to the national convention come to be selected, Sherman's annoyer, Weber, will be somewhere in the crowd, prepared to shout for Harrison until the Blaine men are ready to take possession of the Louisiana delegation along with all the other delegations that have been set up carefully for the man who is seeking popularity at the expense of his secretary of state.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, April 22.

—The appointment of an inspector in charge of mails, to succeed E. G. Rathbone, who resigned to accept the appointment of fourth assistant postmaster-general, will probably go to New York. Inspector Wheeler, of that state, has been strongly indorsed by Hon. Thomas C. Platt, and Senator Hiscock, and it is believed he will be appointed in a few days.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 14.

—The notorious Frederick S. Gibbs, by following his usual methods, managed to win in the special republican primary in the thirteenth assembly district last night. The total number of votes cast was 836, and of these the Gibbs ticket obtained 468 and the Cowie-Sprague ticket 360, giving the Gibbs crowd 100 majority. Charles T. Polhemus announced that the Cowie faction would make another protest. Gibbs made a speech inviting the Cowie people to join with him, but they know too much about him.

It was the hottest fought primary ever held in that hotbed of republican dissension, and it was held on the hottest night of the year. This mid-June primary was made necessary by the same old row between the Gibbs and Cowie-Sprague factions. At the last regular primary, held in January, Gibbs' dishonest tactics carried his ticket through, but the county committee rejected his delegation, ordered a purging of the roll, a re-enrollment and a new primary. This latter was held yesterday in Grand Opera House Hall, the old battle ground. The special committee, of which ex-Alderman James W. Hawes is chairman, had the matter in charge. The polls and the wrangling both opened at 3 o'clock and closed at 9 o'clock. When the latter hour was reached about 500 people were still in line anxious to deposit their ballots. The scene at the close was one of intense excitement.

Many characteristic incidents occurred. Thomas Larkin, a republican of a dozen years standing in the district, was challenged by William H. Reed, of the Cowie forces. His only answer was to reach over and pull Mr. Reed's nose.

Mr. Charles T. Polhemus, a Cowie man, was mak-

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his fief or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the fief connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster.—[Blackstone.

ing an objection when Chairman Howes said: "Well, why didn't you have the primary called for all day? We wanted it so."

"It wouldn't have made any difference," said Mr. Polhemus, "they are all democrats here."

Soon after this a Gibbs man threw a billet of wood at Mr. Polhemus. It struck him behind the ear, but he was not badly injured.—New York Times, June 16.

—The republicans of the thirteenth assembly district who support James A. Cowie will attack the faction led by ex-Senator Gibbs at to-night's meeting of the republican county committee, by impugning the validity of the nominal Gibbs triumph at the recent primary election. The following memorial will be submitted on behalf of the Cowie men:

We charge that said frauds and irregularities consisted in:

(1.) Filling the lines of voters approaching the polls at said primary election with large numbers of well-known democrats in affiliation with democratic organizations, who presented Gibbs tickets, and, when challenged, openly and flagrantly swore themselves in, and were permitted to vote as republicans, to the exclusion of at least a hundred well known republicans who were kept waiting in the line from two to three hours, and were finally excluded from the privilege of voting by reason of the lapse of time and closing of the polls; that upwards of one hundred republicans desirous of voting the Henry L. Sprague ticket were thus excluded from the privilege of exercising their rights as republicans.

(2.) That large numbers of persons were improperly forced into the lines of voters, displacing those already in line, who were thereby deprived of their rights and privileges of voting.

(3.) That a large number of improper persons were injected into the room through the side doors and windows of rooms adjoining the room in which the primary was being held, and were shoved into the line and improperly allowed to vote.

(4.) That many persons, well-known democrats, were improperly allowed to vote by the committee against the challenge and protest of the watchers representing the Henry L. Sprague ticket, by the committee claiming that they must accept the votes of any and all persons who would take the required oath as republican electors.

(5.) That out of upwards of eight hundred names of non-residents, democrats, deceased persons, and dummies, removed from the roll by your committee as a preliminary step to said primary, nearly two thirds of said parties' names were subsequently allowed to be re-enrolled upon the list of enrolled republican voters for the thirteenth assembly district; and that a request that written affidavits should be required from said persons, signed by them at the time of presentation of their ballots for voting, in order to subsequently identify the fraudulent democratic voters who were allowed to participate in said primary, was denied, and your committee disclaimed any right so to do, and no such precaution was allowed to be taken.

(6.) That the side doors leading out of Grand Opera-house Hall into the Gibbs headquarters were, against the protest of the undersigned, allowed to be opened and remained open, and access to and from said side rooms to be had, during the entire time of holding said primary election.

(7) The undersigned respectfully call your attention to the fact that the object of sending a committee into the thirteenth assembly district, to correct the vile practices and flagrant abuses that have disrupted and divided the organization of the republican party, has entirely failed to accomplish the purpose intended; and that instead of healing the existing differences, that portion of the republican organization whose candidates are sustained by a large majority of the republican electors at the polls on election day are entirely excluded from any participation in the management of their own local political affairs—New York Evening Post, June 18.

—Curious things developed at last night's meeting of the republican county committee held in Grand Opera House Hall. To all intents and purposes the notorious political charlatan, Frederick S. Gibbs, was taken back into full fellowship in the county committee. Nominally, Gibbs has no standing in the republican party, but last night he sat with his new delegation to the county committee when it was welcomed back.—N. Y. Times, June 19.

—Neither political party has been fortunate in its selection of subordinate officers of the House of Representatives. The new postmaster, a man named Hathaway, is now in trouble in his turn. He is charged with putting a man on the roll to do nothing at $100 per month, and discharging a hard-working man from Wisconsin to make room for him. He explains the matter in what he seems to think a wholly innocent way, but the explanation throws a rather ghastly light on the way the offices are dealt out in the two houses of Congress. He says, according to an interview in the Sunday Gazette:

The facts are these: After I had been elected postmaster of the House a number of the members came to me and said that Wisconsin had too many men in the post-office, and that I ought to make some changes. Representative Quackenbush of New York urged the appointment of Mr. O'Brien. I told Mr. Quackenbush that I would like to oblige him and that I would see what I could do for O'Brien. Toward the latter part of March I informed the Wisconsin man that I was going to appoint O'Brien, and as there were five men charged to the state of Wisconsin I would have to let one of them go and that they could fix the matter up among themselves. It was then suggested that the man to go should receive $200 in lieu of the vacation which I had learned the men are entitled to during the summer.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, June 22.

—The custom-house at Portland, Maine, is likely to receive the early attention of the treasury officials in their efforts to keep the force within the scanty appropriations, and several inspectors and examiners are likely to receive notice that their services are no longer required. The Portland custom-house is one of the most expensive in the country in proportion to the amount of business done. The remarkable expenditures at the Portland custom-house are due to the great influence which the Maine delegation has wielded in congress. The surveyor and deputy, the assistant appraiser and one of the deputy collectors might well be abolished, and treasury agents have often recommended it, but the friends of "Tom" Reed or of Senators Hale and Fry have never cared to be legislated out of office in that way. While the salaries of other custom-houses are fixed at the pleasure of the secretary of the treasury, in proportion to the work done, the Portland officials have intrenched themselves behind the statute requirements, which their friends in congress have been shrewd enough to work into the appropriation bills.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, May 20.

—This evening's Star says: "Mr. S. D. Miller, the son of the attorney-general, has been appointed to the position lately vacated by Mr. Tolman, chief of the division of requisitions and accounts of the war department, and has been designated as private secretary by Secretary Proctor, to fill the position which has remained vacant since Mr. Partridge was appointed solicitor of the state department, in June, 1890.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, April 27.

—George Vest, son of United States Senator George G. Vest, escaped from St. Vincent's Insane Asylum, and the police were called upon to find him, which they did this evening. The notification given the police of his escape was the first information anybody except his relatives had that the young man had been sent to an asylum.

Young Vest is thirty years old, and has lived a life that has caused his father a great deal of trouble. He has been dissipated and reckless, but not criminal, in financial matters. During the Cleveland administration his father secured him a position in the diplomatic service, but he had to resign it. He was placed in St. Vincent's Asylum about three weeks ago, and it was given out that he had gone to his brother's ranch in Montana.

Friday evening he escaped from the attendants, scaled the walls, and came to the city. He roamed about for three days, but did no damage to himself or anybody else. He is not insane but in a sad condition from dissipation.—St. Louis Dispatch to New York Times, April 19.

ELSEWHERE is reproduced from the Boston Herald an article on physical examinations of firemen and policemen, as conducted in Boston. The article is copied in the hope that our new city government may compare this business method of testing applicants with our own ridiculous practice.

THE next examination of those desiring places in the Indianapolis post-office will be held in this city in August. The territory from which applicants may come is not limited. The character of the local examining board insures impartial treatment. The practice here is to take the highest on the list for a vacancy. It is to be hoped that competitors will come forward without thought of their politics.

THE tax situation in this city is more strained than ever, and it is not likely to "ease up" of itself as the months go by and tax-paying time approaches next year. Those who hold out that, by reason of a lower rate, only about the same amount of taxes will have to be paid, are mistaken. Taxes will be heavily increased. We pay about a thousand dollars a week for cleaning and repairing streets. Political managers may think that this department can be run as spoil and that the people will be contented. This also is a mistake. So long as this system continues the people will believe that they pay for something they do not get. Higher taxes will intensify this belief and will deepen the feeling against the piratical practice. A street-cleaning department run on the spoils system is one of the many ways in which Tammany Hall plunders New York, and furnishes a warning to all cities. Now and then a street commissioner may be better than the average, and may temporarily secure efficiency; but the system remains and is a constant menace to honest government, and, as a rule, it amply justifies its bad character by its works. There is only one way to deal with this higher-taxed people. Every dollar of the money must be expended so as to bring its full value. And it will not be sufficient for the people to be told that it is bringing its full value; the expenditures must be under such a system that they can see it for themselves. In the street department the only such system is the Boston labor system.

"Section 45 provides that the mayor shall call together the heads of the departments at least once a month. 'Records shall be kept of such meetings, and rules and regulations shall be adopted thereat for the administration of the affairs of the city departments, which regulations shall prescribe a common and systematic method of ascertaining the comparative fitness of applicants for office, position and promotion, and of selecting, appointing and promoting those found to be best fitted, without regard to political opinions or services.' This places the whole city government on a civil service basis, and prohibits any appointments to subordinate positions to be made except after an examination as to fitness, 'without regard to political opinions or services.'"

As the Journal remarks, the board of public safety, including the police and fire divisions, is excepted from the above provisions. But with regard to the balance of the city service it is difficult to see how the new city government can escape this plain requirement of the law. This includes the labor service, and we heartily commend to the mayor and the heads of the departments, assembled as above required, the Boston labor system as being "a common and systematic method * * * of selecting, appointing and promoting" laborers in the city service. And the police and fire divisions, at the will of the mayor, can be put under the merit system. He has but to notify the board of public safety to do it or make way for those who will. Does the new city government intend to continue the rule of favoritism in appointments?

THE CHRONICLE last month gave the facts of the curious action of the board of public safety regarding the superintendency of the fire alarm telegraph system. It dismissed two competent assistants of the superintendent, and gave nearly their united salaries to ex-Alderman James Riley. Then Riley's friends gave out that when he learned the business he was to succeed the superintendent, Holderman. The board is reported to have disclaimed any purpose of relieving Holderman, but he was to coach Riley, and then they were to alternate in the superintendency every other month, a queer looking innovation. Holderman firmly declined this method of relief. The publicity given to the matter possibly suggested to somebody the political inexpediency of the arrangement, for Mr. Riley later resigned, and stated to a reporter of the Indianapolis

News, June 30th: "I accepted this place with the understanding that after the end of my first month's service, or as soon as I should become familiar with the telegraphic circuits, I would be installed as superintendent of that service, and that I would be assisted to reach that position by Mr. Holderman, who at present is superintendent." This explanation differs from the one given out by the board of public works but it squares with appearances.

ACCORDING to the Delphi Journal, the democrats of Carroll county in this state are outstripping the republicans in the competitive examinations for the federal service. And from the tone of the Brookville American it would seem that the democrats are showing the same superiority in Franklin county. This not only goes to show that the law is impartially administered, but it is a staggering blow at the time-honored supposition that the stupidity and ignorance of the country is to be found among the democrats, and especially among Indiana democrats. Of these two republican papers, perhaps the Delphi Journal takes it most to heart. It says:

"Yet this is the situation here in Delphi. And it is galling. It is an outrage on the republicans who work in the trenches, and would it be remarkable if it led to disaster? Politics is largely a personal matter, and the politician who does not know this to be true knows nothing."

The times are getting to be bad for "personal" politics. With our new ballot law, vote selling at from five to fifty dollars each, and boodle-handling, with from fifty to one hundred per cent. commission sticking to the pocket of the handler, seem to be pretty effectually dead industries. And, in time, the whole crowd now living by "personal" buccaneering upon the public will find their streams of profit dried up, to their great discomfort but to the abounding augmentation of the common weal.

THE Indianapolis News has been questioning negroes here as to the feeling of their race toward President Harrison. Dr. S. A. Elbert thought that fifty per cent. of the colored people of the state were opposed to Harrison, and said, when asked if three good offices given to colored men would not change the sentiment, "Well, that might have some effect, but the feeling is strong." Editor E. H. Cooper, of the Free- man when asked the ground of opposition said:

"He has appointed to office those who were not interested in his candidacy nor the party. Any policy that follows out to the letter the civil service regulations is bound to bring on unpopularity. The civil service law, in its operation here, it is true, has helped the colored race, as there are more colored people in the post-office than heretofore. Many of these in office were not Harrison republicans, and while the law makes places for them, at the same time Harrison does nothing for representative colored men who were actively for him in the convention and the campaign."

Rev. John H. Clay said: "The source of disaffection is that Harrison has disregarded the colored people of his own state, who are deserving of representation." Frank B. Allen, of the Freeman, said: "Indiana negroes have not been treated justly. No positions of importance have been given them, at least no positions commensurate with the importance of the colored vote of this state." Rev. G. A. Sissel, said: "The colored voters have not received offices in any sort of proportion to their services." Alfred Banks, said: "The offices received have been no credit to the race." Rev. James A. Davis, said: "We of the west have received really nothing."

The best that can be said of this is that these colored men do not take a more sordid view of citizenship, have no keener feeling that "support" ought to be paid for in offices, do not hold stronger views that politics are merely "personal" matters, and are not on any lower plane than the white critics of President Harrison, whose sayings the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE gave last month. And the remark may be repeated that there are powerful and manly reasons why Harrison should not be renominated, but the fact that certain men have not been quartered upon the people is not one of them.

SOME time ago the despatches from Washington stated to the country that Dan Ransdell, marshal of the District of Columbia, would go on a trip to Europe. Then by the same medium it was told that the state department had given him a passport; then that the government had given him a circular letter commending him to all United States officers abroad; then that he had sailed and would leave his children to be educated in Europe. Thus the American aristocracy of office-holders thrives and enjoys itself. Ransdell had grown rich out of office-holding, as a result of machine management, before President Harrison gave him his present place as a reward for personal service. True to his political ideas, he gave one place in the marshal's office to his brother-in-law, Leonard, whose last office had been the collectorship of customs at Indianapolis. He gave another place to his brother, Ed.

Ransdell, who had pleaded guilty in the United States court here to the charge of robbing the mails, and had been pardoned by President Hayes, not because he deserved to be pardoned, but because of the political influence Dan Ransdell was able to bring to bear. Doubtless Leonard and Ed. Ransdell will take a trip to Europe later. In the meantime, the re-elevation of this crowd into the line of public vision is a good vote-maker in Indiana.

THE death of Joseph E. McDonald removes a respected and prominent man from Indiana. He was not a great man any more than was the late Mr. Hendricks. As public men both busied themselves only with current public business. With both, but more with Mr. Hendricks, the problem usually was what treatment of a present public question will best conduce to the present success of the party. A great man not only treats current affairs with ability and honesty, but he looks into the future and recognizes those great measures which, when adopted, mark an epoch in his country's history. To bring about such a change is his great work. Thus Cavour patiently built up the kingdom of Italy, and Bismark the German empire, and Gladstone works for Irish home-rule. When a question pertaining to the routine of all governments came up, like revenue or coinage, Mr. McDonald always had decided opinions about it; Mr. Hendricks less so. Neither ever recognized the greatness of the slavery question. In 1844 Mr. McDonald advocated tariff reform, which was followed by the tariff-reform message of President Polk, and this by the tariff-reform act of 1846. Then and afterwards, with Mr. Hendricks, he completely failed to comprehend the heroic relief his country needed—the abolition of slavery. In 1888, the tariff pendulum had swung back farther than ever, and both, following Mr. Cleveland's message, which was very like President Polk's, were advocating a tariff-reform measure similar to that of 1846. They gave Mr. Cleveland no support in what he attempted to do against the spoils system. Here again both utterly failed to comprehend the great measure of relief their country needed, and still needs—the destruction of the practice of using public office to pay personal or party debts which now pervades every hamlet, town and city throughout the United States wherever there is a public office, great or small.

EX-GOVERNOR ISAAC P. GRAY is mentioned as a presidential candidate. If he lived anywhere but in the necessary state of Indiana, such mention might not be noticed. Still, in his kind of politics he is "no fool." He was formerly a republican, and as such has a "soldier record."

For some inscrutable reason he turned democrat at a time when his new party had no opinions or principles to speak of and when its attitude was chiefly denunciatory. He jostled the old party mortgagees, Hendricks, McDonald and Voorhees, very unpleasantly. Sometimes he played fantastic tricks, as when with a baker he defeated Mr. McDonald seeking to be a delegate to the democratic national convention of 1888. He now has a good grip on his party machine in Indiana, and will control the delegates. The boys will be interested in knowing that notwithstanding Mr. Cleveland's well known attitude and principles relating to the civil service, declared on so many occasions, yet at a jubilee meeting held here November 11, 1884, a few days after the latter's election, Mr. Gray said, according to the Sentinel of the next morning:

"One of the peculiar phases of the campaign just past, and, I think, the most peculiar that I have ever seen in any canvass I have ever been engaged in, is that our republican friends put forth an argument to the people that if the democratic party obtained control of the government, it would turn the republican office-holders out. Of course we will; there is no doubt about it. This has been a contest between parties. There have always been political parties in this country, ever since the formation of the government, and I presume there always will be. The republican party, in its long twenty-four years' lease of power, has filled the offices exclusively with republicans. That was right. When the democratic party obtains control of the government, which will be on the fourth of March next, then we will expect the offices, as rapidly as can be done with safety to the proper administration of governmental affairs, to be filled with democrats."

THE Indianapolis Journal's Washington correspondent says in that paper, July 23: "Colonel Dudley has, however, repeatedly assured his friends that he is done with politics, and that he only desires the indorsement of his political activity by his election as a delegate-at-large from Indiana to the next convention." A party machine is usually slow in giving one of its members the cold shoulder, but it would be a bold thing, indeed, for the Indiana republican machine to make this unpunished scoundrel a delegate-at-large.

WASHINGTON, June 20.

Prof. Francis M. Nipher:

What are your politics?

J. Rusk, Secretary of Agriculture.

Prof. Nipher telegraphed in reply:

Replying to your telegram as requested, I respectfully state that I am not a politician, and do not intend to engage in politics.

There seems to be no doubt but that the information was sought by Secretary Rusk with a view of giving it weight in determining his choice of a new head of the weather bureau. It will come to be one of the curiosities of our political history that a secretary's mind could be so constructed as to prompt such an inquiry in relation to the duties of an office which can not be made to relate to politics without detriment to the public service. There have always been men who could tell more of themselves in a sentence than they or any one else could in a volume. Flannagan, of Texas, is one; Secretary Rusk is another.

By inference a stigma is put upon the actual appointee, Professor Mark W. Harrington, which we do not believe is justified. He is thoroughly equipped educationally and scientifically. He will have to show, however, that he is not a partisan tool of those above him. He will have to do this, not in a mild and obscure way, but by openly running his department on the merit system, and giving out that applicants of all shades of politics will stand an equal chance. Nothing short of this will clear the public mind of suspicion.

THE present boss of Tammany Hall is the well-known Croker, while the boss of the Brooklyn democracy is the equally well-known McLaughlin. The Brooklyn bridge patronage (composed of divers major and minor public trusts) had been distributed by Boss McLaughlin, but under the rules of modern buccaneering, Boss Croker got it away from him. Now Boss Croker desires to have Roswell P. Flower made the party candidate for governor. But Boss McLaughlin says that unless the captured patronage is returned to him, he will prevent Flower's nomination. Thus the matter stands, and it is a clear and happy illustration of how enterprising men may come to dictate officers great and small to 4,000,000 of people and also may fall out in the process and lead on the boys in a glorious fight of faction against faction over the division of spoils captured from a cowardly commonwealth.

EX-HEADSMAN CLARKSON, president of the national league of republican clubs, has got back from Europe, and had a dinner, at ten dollars a plate, given him at Manhattan Beach, New York, by the big boss, Tom Platt, and several little bosses and some office-holders, United States Marshal John W. Jacobus, Internal Revenue Collector Kerwin, Chief Inspector of Immigrants John E. Milholland, Assistant Appraiser Dennis Burke, Postmaster Van Cott, Internal Revenue Collector Walker and the President's son, Russell B. Harrison. Boss Platt, under whose command the President has dealt out New York spoil, aptly introduced Clarkson as follows:

"We have met, my friends, to do honor and welcome home a distinguished American citizen, one whom we not only respect, but love; we love him for the heads he has cut off, and we love him because the mugwump hates him."

COLLECTOR BEARD at Boston explains that the reason why the thirteen employes dismissed by him to reduce the force happened to be democrats, was because he chose from those appointed by Collector Saltonstall. He says that these can more easily find new employment than those who are older and have been longer in one line of service. Even Massachusetts, slow as she is to dispute a man's word, will hardly accept this explanation without winking. In the plain-spoken west it will be truthfully put down as the explanation of a smart republican politician who was determined to serve his party first, and therefore took the course by which he could hit the most democrats. And it will further be truthfully said that in so doing Collector Beard squarely violated his oath, which requires him to faithfully perform the duties of his trust, and one of those duties is, when reducing his force, to dismiss, not a class of men because they were appointed at a particular time, but the men who are of the least efficiency in the public service, no matter when they were appointed.

THE FUNDAMENTAL FALLACY.

Referring to the statement of the anti-Quay organization of Pennsylvania, that the fundamental fallacy of the Quay theory of politics is that "public offices are spoils, the lawful property of the politicians who capture them and by whom they are dispensed in turn to their underlings as the prizes of war," some tariff-reform papers argue that the protective tariff system is the real fundamental fallacy, and they so advise the Pennsylvania reformers. The Quayism of Tammany Hall and of Gorman and Raisin run neck and neck with the Quayism of Pennsylvania. The tariff-reform administration of President Cleveland looted more than 100,000 federal offices, as has the present protective tariff administration. There is no doubt but that thousands of Pennsylvania republicans want to keep down opposition to Quayism for fear that protection will suffer, just as thousands of Maryland democrats in 1888 voted to support Gorman lest tariff-reform should suffer. The protectionist office-holder of Pennsylvania robbed the public treasury; so did the tariff-reform office-holder of Maryland. The spoil of office is the one great prize which parties fight for in a campaign. With absolute free trade, we should have Quayism as powerful, as insolent, as extended, and as thoroughly gifted with the nine lives of a cat as now. It is a flourishing relic of monarchy and has always existed where there have been offices to be given out to reward allegiance; and this has been true without any regard to trade or commerce or legislation. And in our modern struggle, protective republicans of Pennsylvania have not shrunk from their duty, but on the other hand have given valuable lessons to such states as Maryland and New York; and this is written in the individual belief that the protective principle is wrong.

PENNSYLVANIA.

For never land long lease of empire won,
Whose sons sate silent when base deeds were done.
—Lowell.

What is the matter with Pennsylvania and with the newspapers of Philadelphia? This is the exclamation of the country, which can not reconcile the present condition of Pennsylvania with the sterling character her people have borne for more than a hundred years. Has that character become debased? Have the people become so generally debauched that they can not raise their heads above the flood of public corruption and crime that now rolls over them? The answer to these questions will depend upon the way in which these people deal with the matters now before them. It is not necessary to enlarge upon Quayism. No pirate ever ruled his ship more absolutely than Quay rules the party machine in his state. No marauding feudal chief ever had his tribute-paying neighbors in more cowardly subjection than Quay apparently has the people of Pennsylvania to-day. He was branded a gigantic thief, and waited many months, seemingly afraid to deny. In the campaign which followed during this unmistakable confession of guilt, not a single Philadelphia paper dared to attack him. A few republicans, the usual "coach-load," publicly declined to wear that kind of a collar, and throughout the state they proclaimed the doctrine of anti-bossism and honesty in public affairs. They turned 80,000 republican majority into a minority of 17,000, and won the most astonishing victory that has ever been gained by any set of men in the war against bossism. After this trial of his own choosing, and after this conviction before the people of his state, Quay offered his denial. Even then the country would have permitted him to join the issue if he had called the evidence which he alone could call. He refused to call Wayne MacVeagh and Senator Cameron, whose word would instantly fix his guilt or innocence. He still remains chairman of the national republican committee and boss of Pennsylvania.

In the meantime his chief henchman, John Wanamaker, is affording another illustration of Quayism. A successful shopkeeper, he undertook the work of collecting a campaign fund for Quay, and did collect and turn over, by common report, $400,000. He made an improper suggestion that one of the great railroads should contribute a large sum to this fund, but he failed to get the money. It is more than probable that for his success in raising this fund he was made postmaster-general. A great robbery of public money has taken place in Philadelphia, and this in inextricable connection with the Keystone national bank, an institution originally a nursing of Wanamaker's, and which has failed. To this business Mr. Wanamaker is tied by cords from which a due respect for the public imperatively demands that he loose himself; he has not so far done so. For instance, he said he never owned any stock in the bank, but that he once held 2,515 shares given him by the president, Lucas, upon which to raise money to carry on a deal in Reading stock in which, at his suggestion, he and Lucas were jointly engaged. Lucas died, and the succeeding president, Marsh, in December, 1890, told Wanamaker that this stock was fraudulently issued. The latter tells what followed later:

"Granville B. Haines and Lawyer Huey, with Marsh, came to Washington and saw me with reference to some settlement of the claim I had against the stock. I said that up to that time no person except Marsh had called the legality of the stock into question. Now that the vice-president of the bank and Mrs. Lucas' lawyer added their testimony, I felt obliged to say that they must either settle with me or I could not, in justice to myself, allow the controller of the currency to longer remain in ignorance of the fact that it was claimed that there had been an illegal issue of stock."

He then was and had been a cabinet-officer. It was the duty of the administration of which he is a member to watch this and all other national banks. He knew that a fraudulent issue of stock rendered a bank unfit to be trusted in any particular. Yet for months he kept from Controller Lacey the fact that such an issue was charged against the Keystone bank. Moreover, he, in effect, offered to continue the concealment if they would "settle" with him. At last, on March 19, 1891, Lacey found it out from Marsh and then closed the bank. In the meantime, depositors had, for months, been let to hand their money over to a bank that was not worth its office furniture. In the meantime, also, Wanamaker's firm, which had $400,000 on deposit in November, drew out until it had about nothing in this bank when it was closed, March 19.

These facts are taken from a considerable list of the same kind and serve for illustration. The city councils of Philadelphia appointed a committee "to make a thorough investigation." Quayism again gets in its work. No cross-examiner appears. Whatever Wanamaker and the other actors in this financial tragedy care to tell, they tell. In the middle of the play thus made a farce, the Philadelphia papers, having previous to the general wreck paid forty per cent. commission to the wreckers for public advertising without ever calling the attention of the people to the patent rascality of the transaction, are true to Quayism still. The Ledger says June 9, 1891:

"All the other hints, innuendoes, insinuations, and accusations fade away in the same manner before the clear and open light of Mr. Wanamaker's testimony; they dissolve into thin air, mere baseless gossip and slander—and 'leave not a rack behind.'"

With public opinion thus warped and smothered by Quayism, it was to be expected that individual effort would again be disposed to try its strength. We have therefore the address published in another column. This is the hardest public duty a citizen has to do, and it is especially hard where, as in Pennsylvania, the dry-rot of Quayism has penetrated far and wide into all classes and conditions of men. In the long run, a small number of fearless men, who are free from taint of having profited by the spoils methods of many decades of bossism, will because they are right, impress the right upon the minds of the people of this great state, and they will therefore triumph.

POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN.

The Competitive Physical Tests Applied in Boston.

[From the Boston Herald, June 21, 1891.]

Would you, kind reader, a "peeler" be? Would you become a fireman bold? Do you desire to become a member of either of these great protective departments? Then you must understand at the very outset that it is a rather difficult examination which the civil service commissioners impose upon all applicants. This, too, before they can even be entered upon the lists of eligibles from which names may be certified for appointment. To get upon those lists, it is only fair to assume, no person on earth but yourself can or will aid you.

The fact is proverbial that "the policeman's lot is not a happy one." That was made known by the "Pirates of Penzance" years ago. Yet the truth remains as great to-day as it was then. Still, there are many young men who seem anxious for appointment to the force in order that they may be enabled to share its sorrows and emoluments. Concerning the life of a policeman, there are very many interesting things. And this is equally true of the firemen's occupation.

But none is any more entertaining than the course of mental and physical "sprouts" through which the candidate has to go before he can become part of either department. It is in these anti-official struggles that the candidate is often left by the wayside, when he must succumb to the inevitable before he has even caught sight of the "promised land" of the blue and the brass, the helmet and the baton, or the right to run with the machine, which he is seeking with all his might.

ers may be unpopular in certain directions and among certain classes of the community, who either do not or will not understand it, and consider it in a spirit of fairness. Their examinations may be considered by some citizens to be tiresome and aggravating, and covered with red tape, yet it is plainly apparent that there is no class of public servants who have been so benefited by it as the police and firemen of this city. There can be no question that the stringent regulations imposed by the civil service board have done a great deal to relieve the force of much of any odium which may have existed in former years.

Dr. A. H. Brown, who was long the medical director of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union Gymnasium, has been for several years in charge of the official physical examination which, under the auspices of the board of civil service commissioners, are made of applicants for places in either of the two great departments of Boston's protective service—the fire and police. He holds a similar position in connection with the civil service examining board of New York City. Although yet quite a young man—being under thirty—Dr. Brown has, by his energy and ability, succeeded in securing a place in the confidence of the city fathers in both these great cities, which makes his future certain.

The object of these examinations is, of course, easily apparent, being to secure men of exceptionally fine physique to be the guardians of Boston's streets and homes. The men selected for the fire and police departments, under the present rules, are fine fellows, of more than average intelligence, sound as a dollar, and of remarkably fine physique.

A visit was made recently by the writer to the gymnasium in police station 16, at the Back Bay, while Dr. Brown was conducting examinations.

It will scarcely be a difficult matter to persuade any one that physical strength, good development and a fair amount of agility are essential for good, practical police and firemen. It is not only necessary that a policeman should have good hearing and eyesight, so as to hear and see a thief, but also that he should be able to run fast enough to catch him, and should be strong enough to hold him after he has caught him. He should be able to have more than an average chance in a tussle; he should not be lacking in the muscles necessary to make a good horseman, his grip should be good, he should be able to climb out on a roof if necessary, and he should have good endurance in all the physical work required of him.

For these purposes it is necessary that a policeman should have a fair height, which is fixed at no less than 5 feet 8 inches; that his chest should be in proper proportion to his stature; that his girth of waist should be neither too large nor too small for his height; that the capacity and strength of his lungs, the strength of his back, legs, upper and forearms, abdominal muscles, etc., should all be up to a certain standard. It is obvious that it would not be advisable to have long, thin men, or men too short and stout.

Having run the intellectual gauntlet successfully, the candidate was punched, thumped and twisted by the regular examining physician, made to give his family history, and name the causes of death of all his departed brothers, and his "sisters, and his cousins and his aunts," in the determined search for any hereditary taint.

All these ordeals has the young man gone through, and now he has come to station 16. Here we see him, fairly trembling as his eye takes in the curious and awful instruments which are about to be used by Examiner Brown, in finally testing his fitness for a place.

"Now, then, young man," said Dr. Brown, "take off your coat and vest." This the candidate obeyed with considerable apparent trepidation, and submitted to some punching and pounding, and looked half scared while the examiner made a record of his respiration and temperature.

Then the young man is directed to try his hand at climbing a rope, sailor fashion, being first kindly admonished by the examiner not to get nervous, but to take time and do his best.

The young fellow seized the thick rope and went hand over hand to the ceiling, and came down again with the same movement, occupying only a very few seconds in the exercise.

As he stepped back his pulse and respiration were again taken. Then he was conducted to a long ladder suspended horizontally about eight feet above the floor, and told to jump and catch a round, and take himself hand over hand to the farther end and return, which he did nimbly. Respiration was again noted.

The candidate was then directed to climb an inclined ladder, going up on the under side, round by round, while his feet hung motionless. Respiration taken, and carefully compared.

The idea of these tests is to judge of the wind and staying powers as well as the nerve of the applicant for an appointment.

The young man was then required to run several laps around the gymnasium, and required to lift above his head, first with the right and then with the left hand, the dumb-bells, increasing in weight until he put up 75 pounds.

Then came the test for strength of muscles of the abdomen, the candidate being directed to lie upon his back on a mattress, insert his feet under a toepiece, and taking a heavy dumb-bell in his hands, the bell resting above the shoulders and under the head (that is, at the back of the neck), rise to a sitting posture.

The tests consist of two distinct parts, one for development and the other for strength. For the development tests the men are measured for their height by standing barefooted on a platform so arranged that an electric bell rings only when their heels are resting firmly on the line from which the height is taken. They are then weighed without clothing, the minimum required weight being, in the fire department, 130 pounds for a man of five feet six inches, and in due proportion for greater height. Measures are then taken for the girth of the waist and of the chest, first empty and then inflated; for the depth of the chest and of the abdomen, and for the girths of the right and left thighs, calves, upper arms and forearms. The candidate also receives a mark for "muscular condition." This is put under development, but depends somewhat on the general proportion and strength, and also on the action of the heart and lungs and the look of the skin and muscles.

The tests for strength are all recorded under a separate head, and they consist in blowing into one of the ordinary receivers to measure the cubical capacity of the lungs.

The young man having shown above the average physical endurance and muscular power, was directed to disrobe. The candidate stripped to the buff, displaying a skin in splendid condition, and was placed in the scales, which he tipped at 130 pounds, and was then conducted under the measuring bar, where his height recorded just a little above the requirement. The candidate was close to the limit of the requirements in both weight and height, no man being taken in the fire department who weighs less than 130 pounds and is less than five feet six inches (sixty-six inches) in height.

The requirements are less in this direction in the fire department than on the police force, men in the latter department being required to weigh at least 140 pounds and measure five feet eight inches. Thus it will be seen that the young man could not have entered the police force, being not only too light but also too short. The idea worked upon by Dr. Brown and the civil service commissioners is that a policeman should have good legs and good wind, so as to come in a good second, at least, in a race with a criminal; whereas a fireman being required to do more or less climbing, should be lighter, with a well-developed chest and strong arms. A good grip is another essential to a good fireman.

The candidate was given an ingenious apparatus, composed of a French dynamometer fitted with handles, as in Fig. 1. He was directed to pull upon these handles, with the machine resting over his chest, then with first the left, and then the right arm extended. The strength of the pull was registered in kilos, by a hand revolving on a dial.

Next the dynamometer was removed from the handles and placed in the candidate's hand, and he was required to grip it, as in Fig. 2. With the right hand he gripped the equivalent of 65 pounds, and with the left 58 pounds.

A larger dynamometer, upon a somewhat different principle, and the candidate being required to stand upon a raised platform, was made to lift up with his knees straight. This tested the muscles of the back. Next he was directed to lift with the legs at liberty and the knees bent, to test the strength of the thighs.

A spirometer, which looked like a steam gauge with a rubber hose attached, was produced, and the now perspiring candidate was requested to blow sharply and quickly into it, as in Fig 3. This was done to test the strength of the expiratory muscles. After this the capacity of his lungs was measured by registering the pressure he put upon a lung testing machine of formidable proportions, like that in Fig. 4, which Mr. Brown called a water spirometer. This latter machine was, apparently, regarded by the young man with positive dread, as he saw the top rise in response to the herculean effort of his lungs. As the top rose, and the hand travelled slowly around the dial, his eyes stuck out with astonishment. He looked as though he feared that after a big blow she would burst. An examination of the lungs and heart with the proper appliances finished the information sought concerning the applicant's internal economy.

Then came an exhaustive series of measurements, all, saving the height already mentioned, being taken by centimeters. The tape measured the length of the body, while sitting, to the knee, and in every possible direction. The girth of the head, neck and chest, waist, hips, etc., were taken, and then, with a curious and handy device like a pair of gigantic dividers, the depth of chest and abdomen and breadth of head, shoulders, etc.

The many and curious measurements were all very interesting, for it must be understood that Medical Examiner Brown's critical examination of applicants is based upon long experience, and is reduced to an average in every case. Thus, so many inches in stature, so many centimeters girth, breadth of chest, etc., so many pounds grip, and so many pounds lung power, added together and divided by the averaging figures gives a quotient that represents to a fraction the physical condition of the man.

In this respect, at least, it is believed that "figures will not lie." A man may be a veritable Hercules to all outward appearances, and yet upon this close and critical examination may fail to get the per cent. of marking that is requisite to pass him.

A man's mental qualifications and physical average are put together to fix his relative standing among the eligibles. The young man's markings are all written down in a big book, and they are all curious and remarkably thorough.

After having resumed his attire, the candidate was submitted to a rigid cross-examination, that went into a more minute inquiry than even a life insurance examiner, or a census enumerator would. He was required to answer all the following questions: Place of residence, name, class, department to enter, occupation, where born, nationality of father and mother, and of his father's father and mother, and mother's father and mother, occupation of father, what his father died of, which parent he most resembles, general health and hereditary diseases. Next examiner wanted to know if his victim had ever been subject to either of a long list of complaints.

It will thus be seen that these examinations of candidates accomplish two purposes. They throw out all those who are not up to a certain minimum standard, and they grade those who have passed that minimum according to their relative development and strength. In order to get a standard a table was first made out by Dr. Brown. This table was prepared from an average of measurements and tests—not of a few great athletes, but of a large number of individuals of good development and strength. If an average of 65 of this standard is not reached the candidate is rejected altogether, and according to the average percentage in all the tests the successful candidates are graded. The tables and rules for this grading are so arranged that good general development and strength count for more than special strength in particular sets of muscles alone.

In the total marking, which grades the candidate on the eligible list, the physical tests count one-half of the whole, and the mental examinations count the other half. The character and medical examinations do not count in the grading. For these the candidate either passes or does not pass. Those candidates for police, for instance, whose character is proved good, whose health, eyesight and hearing are up to the required tests, who know the police rules, powers and duties so well, and can make so clear a statement in writing, and show such penmanship, and can do simple arithmetic so well, and have such a degree of physical development and strength as to stand near the head of the list, are certainly a picked lot of men. If they stand the probationary trial of six months of actual service before final appointment, it may be safely said that those selected under this system are at least quite as well adapted, if, indeed, they are not much better equipped for their work than if selected because of their political energies exhibited in packing caucuses and getting voters to the polls, or on account of some secret influence or "pull" in city, state or national politics, or in otherwise making themselves superserviceable to some party "boss."

In view of the foregoing description of the work it is almost superfluous to add that Dr. Brown is an enthusiastic believer in the whole scheme of examination in development and strength. In a chat with him, however brief, one would be impressed with his thoroughness and his absolute belief in the value of the tests to the community at large, in securing the best fitted men for these two very important departments of our protective service. "As a result of these examinations," said he, "I find I have to reject a large proportion of those who have succeeded in running the gauntlet of the preliminary and physical examinations. I test the men who come before me here and in New York for their all-round fitness. It was tried in Boston before any other city in the country, but New York has now adopted the same system, and, I think I am justified in saying, the authorities fully appreciate it there, as they certainly do in this city. In Boston, when we first adopted the system, we had, practically, no data to go by, and we picked out fifty of the older members of the police force—men who were regarded as the best specimens—and examined them. The tests they were put to found them very poor on their legs. They had poor wind and a poor stride when running. They were not active. Of course, our tests have been changed and improved considerably since the system was first put into operation, for since that time we have been enabled to collect a large amount of valuable data, and the experience which we have all had in the actual application of the system to the practical needs of the police and fire departments has been of very great help in many ways. Our averages are based upon scientific and well-known principles, the system being a modification and extension of that used by Dr. Dudley A. Sargent, of Harvard University. In order to get the requisite percentage, an applicant must be in pretty good physical condition, and a pretty sound man. We take the symmetry, development and strength of a man, and base his normal condition upon that. It would be a good thing if the men had to go through this examination every few years, and thus be forced to keep up their condition to a proper standard. The life of a policeman is such a change from the active pursuits he has previously engaged in that it has a tendency to make him too heavy, and to a certain extent the life of a fireman may be open to the same criticism. I believe that the men should be required to exercise an hour a day and be paid for the time. In fact, I believe there should be a gymnasium attached to every police station and engine house, and the members of the departments required to go through certain stated exercises as part of their official duties daily."

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and * * become his MAN from that day forth. * * Services were free and base. * * Base service was to * * carry out his dung. —[Blackstone.

—Collector of the Port Cooper rushed to the defense of Senator Quay to-day in a self-prepared half-column interview. He says the address is both unwise and unjust; that it leaves a doubt in every mind if the real purpose is not to injure rather than to correct, and, if this be not so, he wants to know why they should call into review the acts of a senator who voted right on the elections bill, the tariff, and silver. He says that some of the signers aided in the movement that forced Delamater on Quay, at a time when the latter was ready to take up Hastings. On the whole he thinks it is a movement in behalf of the democrats. Of the senator he says:

"Senator Quay has battled with many storms. The gentlemen who believe him to be a little man but prove the narrowness of their own surroundings. He is one of the party's leaders—not its boss, surely, not my boss nor yours—and if he continues active in politics he will doubtless, as in the past, seek the removal of all serious obstructions to republican unity."—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, June 30.

Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his fief or fee, to do all in his power to defend him.—[Blackstone.

—The Richmond Palladium says that "the President will be his own successor," and that "there never has been an abler, cleaner or more successful administration of public affairs" than he has given the country. The Palladium is edited by Isaac Jenkinson, who also edits the post-office at Richmond.

—Collector Cooper of Philadelphia went last week to Atlantic City, where the Pennsylvania editorial association was visiting. The editors represent more than 100 county newspapers, nearly all of them republican. Mr. Cooper reports that they are all for Harrison.

—Amos Smith is a warm Sherman man, and owes his position as collector of customs to the senator. It is pretty generally known that a few days ago he called upon Foraker at Sherman's request, with the object of having the ex-governor say yes or no as to whether he would oppose Sherman's re-election or be a candidate himself. The report goes that Foraker told Smith that his mission was impertinent, and gave him a very unsatisfactory message to take back to Sherman.—Cincinnati Dispatch to New York Times, July 21.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given."—[Blackstone.

—One of the most disgraceful appointments made by the Harrison administration is that of Edwin B. Low as postmaster in this village. It was opposed almost solidly by the respectable republicans of Westport on the ground that Low's reputation for honesty was bad and his habits so intemperate as to render him totally unfit to discharge the duties of the position. Despite the remonstrances of the citizens, whose knowledge of Low's character is complete, this man has been elevated to the chief position of trust in the community. Quite naturally the people are full of indignation. They feel that their rights have been trampled upon by Postmaster-General Wanamaker and Congressman-elect John M. Wever of Plattsburg. Denunciation of these two worthies is heard on every side in Westport and vicinity.

Wever, who is a banker of Plattsburg and politician of the Hill stripe, is charged with having promised the office to Low long before election, in the face of the fact that the opposition to Low was widespread. He disregarded entirely the objections offered, and even, it is alleged, suppressed the remonstrances and the petitions. When the people saw that Wever was determined to put Low in the post-office, they turned their attention to Mr. Wanamaker and Mr. Whitfield, the assistant postmaster-general. Personal appeals were made to both these gentlemen against the appointment of Low. Many letters were written them in support of these appeals. Low's unfitness for the post was thoroughly demonstrated. Wanamaker and his assistant professed to be much interested in the case.—Westport, Essex County, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, June 30.

Thus the feudal connection was established, * * and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster.—[Blackstone.

"The" Allen, gambler, republican political heeler, and keeper of places of resort of people of questionable character, lies hovering between life and death at 246 West Forty-third street. He was a quick fighter, but he ran across an Italian who was quicker than he and received several stab wounds, one of which, it is feared, will prove fatal.

At about 11:30 o'clock Thursday night Allen and four others were playing cards in Allen's saloon at Bleecker street and South Fifth avenue. The game that they were playing is called "slaughter in the pan."

While the game was in progress John Carrero, an Italian, came in and asked to be allowed to take a hand. Allen said that he would not play with Carrero, and the Italian left the saloon. About an hour later he returned armed with an ice-pick and immediately made a rush for Allen. Seizing Allen by the throat before the latter could recover from his surprise, the Italian stabbed him again and again until he fell bleeding to the floor.

Allen is fifty-three years of age, and has had a bad reputation all his life. While he descends from a respectable family, his father having been an Episcopalian clergyman, most of his brothers have been either criminals or associated with the criminal classes. Of the five brothers two are doing time in state prisons and one was shot in Ohio.

Wesley Allen, or "Wes" Allen, as he is known, one of "The" Allen's brothers, is spoken of by Inspector Byrnes as probably the most notorious criminal in the United States. He is described as "saucy and treacherous," and requires to be watched closely, as he will use a pistol if an opportunity presents itself. He has been a thief for many years, but has not spent much time in prison. Martin Allen, another brother, is a burglar, and was sentenced on November 1, 1883, to serve ten years in Sing Sing for burglary. Jesse Allen, a third brother, was shot in Ohio after committing a burglary, and died. John Allen, a fourth brother, is the only reputable man in the family. He is a jeweler in this city.

"The" Allen has consorted with toughs and criminals from his earliest days, which were spent in the eighth ward. During the war he kept a bar-room known as the "St. Bernards," at Prince and Mercer streets, which was a notorious resort for bounty jumpers, thieves, and loose women. Later on he opened a gambling den at 611 Broadway, and it was here he killed John Molloy by shooting him with a pistol early in the morning. No one was present to witness the affair.

Allen always combined politics with his business so as to get the necessary protection from the police in his nefarious business. He was at one time a political boss of a low type—not a boss in the sense of a leader, but a boss of his own followers. His affiliations were usually with the republicans. He was first prominent in the republican affairs of the old eighth ward, where he had considerable control of the colored voters. He held the whip over them if necessary, but when free-handed liberality suited his purpose best he used it. Besides his control over the colored voters he had a certain "gang" of his own henchmen, who were useful in running caucuses or in packing primaries.

Allen knew how to manage these things well, and when he was at the height of his power an eighth ward primary usually went his way. When the fifth assembly district succeeded the eighth ward as the political division, Allen was still something of a power. Of late years he has bobbed up occasionally in the many district fights in the fifth. Sometimes he was with this faction, sometimes with the other. In the last fight, in which ex-Police Commissioner Stephen B. French was the winner, Allen was with French. Years ago Allen ran for alderman, and he always claimed that he was elected and counted out.

When John I. Davenport was appointed chief supervisor of elections he found a proper tool and associate in "The" Allen, and made him one of his principal heelers. Part of Allen's duties to the Grand Old Party was to ship repeaters from New York and Philadelphia to Indiana and Ohio at election time. At one time Allen joined the greenback labor party in this city, and Shupe took him for his side partner and got him nominated for the assembly. Allen, at one of the meetings of the county committee of the greenbackers, pushed the chairman off the platform, put in his own man, and captured the meeting, the delegates being frightened by his heelers.

The prosperity of Harry Hill in his Houston street dive aroused "The" Allen's envy and he started another similar place a short distance away in Bleecker street and called it the "Mabille." It was a resort for thieves and loose women, sports, dissipated clerks, and strangers who wanted to "do the town." It was even below the low standard of Harry Hill's, but nevertheless, after Harry Hill's, Billy McGlory's, and Tom Gould's places had been closed by the police, "The" Allen's "Mabille" continued to flourish for some time, owing to his strong pull with the republican machine. He was regarded as a spy and go-between between the police and thieves, and was a great pet of Commissioner French's. Finally the "Mabille" had to be closed, too, and "The" Allen became more and more of a republican ward worker. His influence with Mr. French was said to be enormous, and he could almost always get his heelers jobs in the post office, custom-house, or navy yard.—New York Times, July 11.

"By not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord.—[Blackstone.

—There seems to be no reason known at the treasury department for the removal of Appraiser Stearns except that he is a democrat. Secretary Foster and Assistant Secretary Spaulding are out of town to-day, but no one about the department pretends to know any other reason than the political one for the displacement of the wounded democratic veteran. Some of the treasury officials were reluctant to make the change, and it was only just before the President started for Cape May that he signed the papers driving from the public service his comrade of the war for the Union. General Cogswell, in accordance with the reports already published, was the most earnest advocate for a change in favor of his friend, Mr. Dodge. The President, if asked the reasons for the change, would probably reply, as he did to the correspondent of the Post, in the case of the displacement of postmaster Pearson of New York, that he "did not think any statement was necessary."—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, July 6.

—Sergeant-at-Arms Adoniram J. Holmes, of the house of representatives, is an Iowa man, and he has evidently heard the cries of distress which his fellow-republicans of Iowa are sending up because of the outlook for next fall's election.

His first contribution to the cause was made to day, when he dismissed Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms Thomas Cavanaugh, who has held that office since the republicans took control of the house, and against whom it is declared no charges have been made. By dismissing Cavanaugh after all the work of the fifty-first congress has been done, Mr. Holmes makes room for the appointment of an Iowa man, who will have nothing to do but draw his salary until he is displaced by a democrat next December.

Of course, the new deputy can be depended upon to work and vote for the republican ticket, and as his chief duty will be to draw his salary, he ought to be willing to make liberal contributions to the party's campaign fund.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, June 30.

—When Mr. Blaine was called to the most important place in the cabinet he wrote, in reply to the President's letter tendering the appointment (which letter clearly outlined the President's views), a statement that distinctly implied in the clearest terms unquestioned and unbending fealty to the head of the administration, and by no act, word or intimation has Mr. Blaine at any time since left his loyalty open to the slightest suspicion.—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PARTY EXORCISM.

—Quayism tried to force the bankrupt Delamater on the people as governor, and it is capable of dictating the election of such a treasurer as Bardsley if political exigencies demanded. The latter-day Republicanism of Pennsylvania has become a stench in the nostrils of honest men.—Buffalo Express [Rep.].

—"The movement to force Mr. Quay off the national republican committee, and to depose him from the leadership of the party in Pennsylvania is commendable. It should receive the approval of republicans everywhere," says the Cincinnati Times-Star [Rep.].

—Men will not work intelligently and enthusiastically under the direction of a partisan chieftain who has forfeited their confidence on the score of integrity, whose agents and associates are corrupt and discreditable, whose purposes are usually dishonorable, and who, whether his ends be good or bad, is reckless and unscrupulous as to the means which he employs for their accomplishment. This is the case with Mr. Quay. It is said that the President has entered into a sort of offensive and defensive alliance with the Pennsylvania boss.

The republican masses hope and believe that this story is false. Such a league would discredit Gen. Harrison, deeply offend his admirers, and fatally handicap the party in the campaign. The republican voters of the country demand that Senator Quay step down from the chairmanship of the national committee before the lines are drawn for the canvass of 1892.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat [Rep.], July 14.

—After the publication of the Philadelphia address, the Omaha Bee (rep.) thinks that Quay "ought by this time to be convinced of his entire unavailability as a leader of the Keystone republicans."

—The Advertiser, which was one of the first to protest against the retention of Senator Quay in an important position on the republican executive committee, is glad to notice so general a republican condemnation of the Pennsylvania boss and his political methods. There is much in the Pennsylvania idea of political warfare which citizens of both parties have seen fit to condemn, and Mr. Quay's only reply to the recent signed protest against his retention in a responsible political position is no answer to its justice. Even if it be true, as he is reported to have charged, that the signers are "all democrats or mugwumps," that fact would not militate against the truth of their indictment.—Boston Advertiser [Rep.].

—There is a strong and growing conviction among republicans that Mr. Quay's prominence in the party councils is hurtful to the party.—Philadelphia Press [Rep.].

—"Senator Matthew S. Quay of Pennsylvania can not counteract the demand that he shall resign from the chairmanship of the republican national committee and remove his big thumb from the republican party in Pennsylvania, by denouncing his critics as mugwumps and free-traders."—Albany Journal [Rep.].

—"It is time for plain speaking and resolute action. The republican party in Pennsylvania needs reform, and it can not take the very first step toward reform so long as Mr. Quay retains his place in its leadership and councils. It is the height of folly for the party to run amuck against the public conscience by refusing to eliminate the leadership which has brought it into discredit and defeat."—Boston Journal [Rep.].

—Even the Boston Traveller (rep.), speaks out. "The pressure is increasing," it says, "and it really looks as if Matthew Stanley Quay had better retire from the chairmanship of the republican national committee while he can do so gracefully."

THE ROUT OF SENATORS PLUMB AND GORMAN.

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, of the national civil service commission, is the right man in the right place. His alert mind, his strong conviction, his accurate knowledge of details, and his aggressive temperament instantly challenge any false statement or sneering assumption against reform from whatever source it may proceed. Senators Plumb and Gorman have had occasion recently to discover that Mr. Roosevelt is "an ugly customer" to deal with upon this subject except with facts and arguments. If anybody supposes, said Senator Plumb in his place, that the civil service commission is now without fear or favor, he is entirely mistaken. Favoritism of the grossest kind is shown, and underhand work takes place by which persons are picked out for selection by that commission. This, says Mr. Roosevelt, is a charge of cheap corruption. It was susceptible of immediate proof or disproof. If true, the commissioners were guilty of official misconduct. If false and without foundation, the wanton allegation of such rumors, or, as Mr. Plumb says, "information which seems to me to be conclusive," is saved from being infamous only by being contemptible.

The commission instantly wrote to Senator Plumb asking that the information on which his assertion was based should be immediately furnished to the President if it affected the commission, and to the commission if it affected any of their subordinates. They promised prompt and thorough investigation, adding that all their books, records, and papers were open to any responsible person, and that the career of every appointee could be traced in detail from his examination to his appointment. Nothing could be more frank, honorable, and explicit than the offer of the commission to meet the charges of Senator Plumb. Three months and more have passed, but neither Senator Plumb nor Senator Stewart, who had sustained his charge, has answered the letter of the commission. The reason, says Mr. Roosevelt, is that the statement did not contain a particle of truth, a fact which both senators knew, or ought to have known, when they made it.

Senator Gorman also foolishly exposed himself to the same unsparing castigation. He said, in an interview, to show the absurdity of reform, that a letter carrier was asked "the most direct route from Baltimore to China." Mr. Roosevelt wrote him promptly, saying that if such a question was asked it was against the explicit orders of the commission, which had in its office a complete set of the examination papers of every letter-carrier since the examinations began. The papers had been thoroughly examined, and no such question appeared. Would Mr. Gorman kindly state the date and place of the examination, or would he send a person to search the papers for the question which he alleged to have been put to a "bright young man in the city of Baltimore?" Mr. Gorman discreetly did not respond. After a few weeks, therefore, Mr. Roosevelt publicly told the truth in saying that Senator Gorman had told something else than the truth, for no such question was asked as he asserted to have been asked. To this challenge Senator Gorman made no other reply than to state in the senate that in common with everybody who had criticised the inability of the commission to enforce the reform law, he had been very severely criticised by the president of the commission—meaning Mr. Roosevelt, who is not the president—and when Senator Blair asked him what he did about it, Senator Gorman answered: "I did about it what I do in the case of all interference by impudent people who without warrant ask me about my discharge of my duty. I took no notice of it." Evidently Senator Gorman had stated what was untrue, and would not acknowledge it. The conclusive evidence of its untruth was offered to him, and he would not look at it. His conduct convicts him of bearing false witness, as that of Mr. Roosevelt shows the perfect readiness of the commission to answer every question, and of Mr. Roosevelt himself to expose remorselessly the ignominious attempts of senators of the United States to slander other public officers. No member of congress who has read Mr. Roosevelt's letter describing the complete and ludicrous rout of Senators Plumb and Gorman, and Senator Stewart as their reserve, is likely to attack the civil service commission without carefully surveying the ground.—Harpers' Weekly, July 18.

Secretary Tracy deserves credit for extending the operations of the merit system to the navy-yards at Norfolk, Va., and Portsmouth, N. H. But he will quickly make a farce of his well-meant experiment unless he develops more capacity for resisting pressure than the newspapers give him credit for in a case that arose at Norfolk. The incumbent of a post in that yard was, it seems, found to rate lower at the examinations than another candidate. But the incumbent, like most of them, had a pull. This he exerted so vigorously through the agency of a former member of congress that he was given the place, and the man at the head got nothing. This will never do. If the secretary yields to one pull he will be subjected to hundreds of them, and his new policy will be "pulled" to pieces.—The Civil Service Reformer, July, 1891.

[Secretary Tracy, after careful consideration of the objections, has since upheld the examination and appointed the man selected by the the competition.—ED. CHRONICLE.]

Mr. Chittenden had ample personal knowledge of official life and the civil service in Washington, and his brief but stringent remarks upon them are of great value. The awful suffering and personal ruin due to the spoils system of the service he knew well by observation. "No men," he says, "better deserve the attention of philanthropists than the clerks in the government service;" and his words outweigh the gibes of a thousand mere party politicians when he says, "It will be a fortunate day for the country when the civil services system is extended to all the government offices except the cabinet and those immediately connected with congress."—From Harpers' Weekly's Notice of Chittenden's Recollections of President Lincoln.

In reply to Mr. Clarkson's statement in the North American for May that "no boss can live more than a year," the Boston Transcript (May 5) cites the instance of Quay, who continues to hold his place in spite of the denunciations hurled at him by men of his own party. Other instances disproving Mr. Clarkson's statement will no doubt occur to our readers, and show to them how absolutely reckless Mr. Clarkson is when he attempts to argue. He has no power of dealing with facts. Vigorous language is his sole forte in writing and speaking. As an instance of how long a boss may reign, the case of I. Freeman Raison of Baltimore may be cited. Before the war he was an officer of a Know-nothing club which made itself infamous for its use of pistols and shoemakers' awls at the polls. When his party was overthrown, it might be supposed that Raison would disappear from politics; but no, from that day to this he has been a power in Maryland, and always in most disgraceful ways. His life and methods have been fully exposed by the reformers of Baltimore. Every one knows just what he is; but such is the strength of a boss, where the spoils system exists in perfection, that neither reformers within his party nor those who have left it to coalesce with the opposition have been able to overthrow him. Gorman himself—who, by the way, has certainly been a boss more than a year, in spite of his published record—would not today think of making a move or deal in Maryland without taking into account Raison's hostility or friendship, as the case might be.—Civil Service Record, July, 1891.

About one hundred and forty members of the Massachusetts reform club recently gave a dinner to express their respect and admiration for General Corse, the Boston postmaster, whom President Harrison is stated to have said that he could not re-appoint in spite of gallant services during the war and an admirable record as postmaster, because the postmaster had failed to give a public disapproval of southern outrages. The readers of the CHRONICLE will be interested in what General Corse had to say upon this occasion, and use is made of the report of the Boston Post of May 8:

General Corse was greeted with great enthusiasm, the whole company rising as he was presented. He said it was with some embarrassment that he tried to find words to express his gratitude for this reception. It was a rather sad commentary on the public service that a man should be commended for doing what was only his duty. He was deeply in sympathy with the reform club. He was that much of a partisan that he went on the line of his party when it commended itself to his opinion, and when it did not he was not with it. Probably men were more emancipated from party to-day than ever before.

When he took the Boston post-office he found the machine a very crude instrument. He addressed himself to the details of the business, examining the offices in Baltimore and several others. He learned it from top to bottom. The post-office system of the country was not perfect. No private business could be managed like this without going into bankruptcy. There were five or ten bureau heads, all at loggerheads with each other. If a postmaster got one into sympathy with the improvements the others might oppose him and his efforts went for naught. The post-office department was alien to the post-office. The heads of the department probably thought if the offices were wiped out they would have a very good time. A man must have great persistency to achieve reforms under such conditions.

The civil service law had been a constant bulwark against his political friends. It was a singular fact that the best friend a man had would unload upon him the most worthless whelp in the world to get rid of him. No doubt through the agency of such associations as the reform club civil service was advanced very materially. It was a delight to him that the navy yard and the Indian department had been added to the civil service.

General Corse related how, not long before his successor was appointed, he was in Washington to see the postmaster-general. He found that certain politicians could gain access to him at all hours, while he who was on department business had to wait a long time to find out when he could see him next day. The postmaster-general said he was so occupied with affairs of state that he could only give him a few minutes of time. When he went into the office he saw that the postmaster-general was occupied with a colored man from a southern state who wanted an office. The postmaster-general was talking to the negro, saying that he understood he had been in a democratic caucus.

"No, sah, I was never in a democratic caucus," the negro replied.

"Well, you were seen in a democratic convention then," continued the postmaster.

"No, sah, never was in any democratic convention," reiterated the negro.

"Well, then, were you not in consultation with democrats?" pursued the postmaster.

"Never, sah, never," repeated the negro.

General Corse commented upon this state of things, and said he advised the postmaster-general to turn over to the first assistant postmaster this matter of investigating the character of applicants for small post-offices. The department, he said, was like a run-down railroad. Some man had got to go into the office of the postmaster-general some time and sacrifice years in building up a new and improved system, for which his successor would get the credit. The great idea of some postmaster-generals was to reduce postage, annihilate a lottery or annex the telegraph. The best step to be taken was to create an administrative head, and keep him there for ten years at a salary commensurate with the work.

Unless a postmaster-general was in sympathy with the congressional committees on post-offices and postroads he was entirely helpless. In the local office there was nothing which the ordinary business man could not accomplish. It was purely an industry. The postal service was designed merely to take a letter or package from one man and deliver it to another. * * *

He went on to show that the deficiency in the post-office department was due to the fact that $5,000,000 worth of work was done for the government for which no credit was given, and that newspapers were carried for a cent a pound which cost five cents per pound. In the recent controversy over the Boston office it was his desire that the office should not fall into the hands of the spoilsmen. The man who succeeded him would make a good postmaster, and the office would not fall into the hands of spoilsmen. If the democratic party succeeded in 1892 he hoped a good official would not be displaced.

ADDRESS TO THE CITIZENS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

As Pennsylvanians and as republicans, we, the undersigned, feel constrained to address our fellow citizens throughout the state upon the present political situation—to point out what we believe to be the essential causes of the alarming degradation in public affairs from which we now suffer, and the necessary steps toward improvement.

The republican machine in this state, under the leadership of Senator Quay, and those lieutenants whom he has drawn about him, is corrupt, and in strong contrast to the rank and file of the party. That leadership is absolute in its control, as it is unscrupulous in its methods, and disastrous in its results. With Senator Quay's political record the public is so familiar that it is unnecessary at this time to give a detailed history of those more remote public acts through which its notoriety was acquired, while a brief reference to its more recent events is appropriate in order to depict clearly the present situation.

Mr. Quay is mainly responsible for the overwhelming disaster which befell the republican party in this state during the past autumn, whereby an accustomed republican majority of twenty to thirty thousand was changed to a democratic majority of seventeen thousand. The single issue of the campaign, as determined by Mr. Quay himself, was the vindication of his own personal and political character. The adoption of the republican platform involved a declaration of confidence and respect for the junior senator, and in the election of the republican candidate the acceptance of a man who was nominated at the dictation of Mr. Quay. The state rejected both the plank and the candidate, and a political revolution ensued. The republican party was defeated in Pennsylvania, its most conspicuous stronghold. It might have been supposed that the leader who had inflicted such a wound upon his party, and to whom it had given so overwhelming an evidence of a lack of confidence in him, would have retired from public prominence. Mr. Quay, however, contented himself with an elaborate defense of his record before the United States Senate. This was both untimely and inconclusive; untimely, since it came after all possible damage that could result to his character had been effected by his silence under the grave charges repeatedly made against him from responsible sources through the long critical period preceding the election; inconclusive, since he failed in it to adopt the simple and the only course in relation to the treasury scandal that could have made clear his innocence. Had Mr. Quay accepted the suggestion that he should call upon Mr. MacVeagh and the other gentlemen who were said to have been present when his alleged defalcation in connection with the treasury was covered by Mr. Cameron, to testify in his favor, he would have adopted the obvious means for securing vindication. But this he did not do; and failing to take such a course his defense falls to the ground, and his previous position remains unchanged. Notwithstanding these facts he still retains the party leadership, and his lieutenants, either acting under his direct, though hidden, command, or only in strict accord with the principles of his school of politics, by the attitude they assumed toward the ballot reform bill, have violated the express pledges of the party, have openly defied the will of the overwhelming majority of their constituents, and have been guilty of a stupid political blunder. The amendments first made by the state senate committee to the Baker ballot bill were of such a nature as to transform the very spirit of that measure from one in the interest of free and fair elections to one designed to perpetuate the corrupt practices under which the state had so long suffered, and by which these leaders have so long retained their power. But those who designed and favored these amendments, and who thereby declared themselves in favor of a fraudulent ballot, will be remembered by the voters of this state, and when the day for a consideration of the qualifications of our public servants shall have come, the names of those who have thus defied the commands of their constituents will not be forgotten.

For the defeat of the bill abolishing the local school boards in Philadelphia, which was designed to free our public schools from political influence, and from a divided and cumbersome control, a republican legislature must also be held responsible. The measure had the approval of the great majority of our best citizens of all creeds, and of both parties, and the time was ripe for its adoption.

All these statements, while they touch the root from which other evils have grown, find a fitting culmination in that scandal of more recent exposure—the robbery of the city and state treasury by its dishonest guardian. Not only must the citizens of Philadelphia suffer a tarnished name, a direct loss of a million dollars or upwards, while thousands of depositors lose their earnings through the failure of banks connected with this defalcation, but those untold and untraceable losses, resulting from the shaken confidence in the community, must also ensue.

There is a fundamental fallacy in the theory of politics which has for years obtained in this state, and of which Mr. Quay has been the leading exponent. It is that public offices are spoils, the lawful property of the politicians who capture them, and by whom they are dispensed in turn to their underlings as the prizes of war. But the truth is that these offices are a public trust which should be held in stewardship by the politicians for the people. The disaster of a looted treasury is explained by the fact that the step from this fallacy to the startling and bald appropriation of public funds to the private uses of public officers is a long one in appearance only, not in reality. That step has now been taken. A partial remedy for future troubles of the same kind lies in the party's acceptance and assertion of the truth that a public office is a public trust, and that it will not support in power men who deny that truth. We are soon to nominate an auditor-general and a state and city treasurer. In making these nominations, if the elections are to give these posts to republicans, we must see to it that the men chosen are both honest and of such firm character that they can not be twisted to dishonest purposes.

In the presence of these facts, can the republican voters of Pennsylvania hesitate as to their duty, or be in doubt as to their course? The moment is a crisis as real and as momentous as any through which the state has ever passed. There was a time when Pennsylvania rose in arms to victory at the presence of a hostile invader upon her border, but the danger was less than to-day, when the hands of the public thief are upon her ballot-box, and have been through her treasury. The poison of political corruption and dishonesty have alike affected those who have promoted, and those who have permitted it. It has produced a paralysis, running through moral causes to material results. Many of our good citizens have been blind and deaf to the conditions about them, until the vicious system and the evil principles which have been tolerated so long have brought forth fruit after their kind. But when loose political morals and methods have culminated in appalling defalcations and increased tax rate, none will dare dispute the value of sound principles in politics. With a great financial scandal, the black bottom of which has not yet been sounded, fastened upon Philadelphia, and with the name of our state a word of political reproach throughout the country, we are convinced that the time is ripe for change. We appeal to the patriotism, to the sound sense of republicans throughout the state, or, in the absence of sensibility to higher considerations, to that fear of impending financial and political danger which further inaction will bring, to so consider this question, and so to agitate it as to secure speedily the required reform. Here, in reality, is a chance for reform within the party by such an expression of popular sentiment against the objectionable men, that they shall fail of renomination to their respective offices, and thus the voter be saved the alternative of accepting an unworthy candidate, or voting for one of the opposite party. The evils which we now suffer will be overcome, if each man shall but feel a personal responsibility for their removal, and will make those individual and associated efforts which, if wisely planned and faithfully executed, bring victory. The objectionable public records of the men who have inflicted those evils must be exposed. There must be a more competent and worthy leadership than that of Mr. Quay, and the legislature must be purged of those who have placed themselves on record as the enemies of ballot reform. The demand for the retirement of these men from the places which they have disgraced, must be unflinching. The political methods which they have adopted must be discontinued, and in their place must be substituted only those consistent with sound morals and with the practice of honorable men. These ideas must find expression through the public press, and by the private letters of constituents to their representatives. If they are not insisted upon and adopted, the republican party in Pennsylvania is doomed. It will fall rapidly from decay into dissolution. No party can long survive the deliberate abnegation of principle, or the adoption of the heresy that the people at heart have ceased to believe in right. That what we urge is not sentimentality, but politics of the most practical sort, the financial losses which the state and individuals are now enduring, would seem to have clearly proved.

We issue our appeal at a time when these events are fresh in the public mind, to permit that full consideration and agitation of the subject which should precede ultimate action at the primaries or the polls. If this appeal shall excite a popular response, ways and means can readily be devised for organized effort at a later date.

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

When President Harrison was inaugurated, the reform system established by law had been extended to some 32,000 places in the federal service. In two years and five months he has extended it to cover some 700 additional places.

The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments * * * to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

Headman Clarkson in less than two years removed more than 30,000 fourth-class postmasters, and since March 4, 1889, more than 100,000 federal place-holders have been displaced by partisans of the administration. This has been done in the wilful and wanton exercise of "the power of official patronage."

LAST month, with the good authentication which repeated publication without denial in leading newspapers seemed to give it, the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE published what purported to be a dispatch from Secretary Rusk to Professor Nipher, asking what his politics were, presumably with reference to his selection as head of the weather bureau. This paper has since learned from authority which can not be questioned that Secretary Rusk sent no such dispatch. There is no doubt as to how Professor Mark W. Harrington, who was afterwards appointed, stands as to "politics." In an interview in the New York Evening Post of August 11, given below, he states his views with entire frankness. It will be a relief for the country to find that so far as it lies with the head of the bureau the object of transferring the weather service to the department of agriculture in order to reduce it to the spoils basis will, if there was such an object, be defeated:

When asked by your correspondent whether he intended to put his force under civil service rules, or to use his influence to that end, he answered:

"The Washington office is already under the rules, except in the case of those employes especially exempt by law, and a few others filling positions created by the act transferring the bureau from the war department to the department of agriculture. The employes outside of Washington are not in the classified service. They were in the army under the old regime, and did not need the protection of the civil service rules. On the transfer they lost their military standing and gained none in the civil service. So far, however, there have been few vacancies to fill, although there have been some promotions and some changes of position."

"On what principle do you propose filling vacancies?"

"I can not fill them personally; I have no appointing power. My authority extends no further than nominating. Before I entered the public service I was always warmly in favor of the merit system. Since taking office I have found that the civil service rules, through their not extending far enough, make such a task of reorganization as I was faced with here exceedingly difficult."

"In what way?"

"By preventing me actually from nominating some excellent men for promotion. The highest salary in the classified service is $1,800. Hence, when a man deserves to be raised to be chief of division at a salary of $2,000, and his superior officer would be glad to recommend him for such an increase of responsibility and pay, the question at once arises, will the extra $200 a year compensate for the risks attending its acceptance? For when a man steps above the classified service, you know, just as when he falls below it, he is beyond the protection of the civil service rules, and must take the chances of war."

"You would prefer, then, increasing the scope of operations of the merit system in your bureau?"

"I am in favor of the extension of the merit system over practically the entire service. There are a few positions, of course, which should be filled by professional experts, who have already so high a reputation in their own special fields that a proposal to examine them would be an impertinence. Aside from these, however, and possibly a few others whose exemption would be universally recognized as proper, I think all the higher positions ought to be filled by promotions from lower grades, and all admissions to the service made through competitive examination thrown open to everybody. I shall recommend that this course be pursued, and I have no doubt that in due time the meteorological service of the government will be, with the exception I have already noted, under the civil service rules."

Prof. Harrington declined to be interviewed concerning Secretary Rusk's probable course in civil service matters, or to say anything which could in any way commit his chief, even by implication. He wished it distinctly understood that for the views he expressed he alone was responsible.

From a gentleman who is believed to speak with authority for the secretary, however, it is learned that Prof. Harrington expressed his opinions clearly and in full before accepting office, and that the secretary was the better pleased with him for his candor.

At the recent national convention of the letter carriers held in Detroit the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That the letter-carriers of the United States, in convention assembled, respectfully ask the President of the United States to extend the civil service to all free delivery cities of the country."

Why does not the President make the extension? The carriers want it, the civil service commission is ready to take charge of the competition, and the republican platform emphatically promised it. Why is it not made? Are not two years and a half sufficient time in which to keep a promise?

At a national convention of fire superintendents held recently at Springfield, Massachusetts, the president with the decided approbation of the convention expressed himself as follows:

"A politician has no right in a fire department. To bring politics into a department is to destroy its usefulness. A man worthy to be a fireman must be educated in his business, and can't be a ward heeler at the same time."

At the recent semi-annual examination for clerks and mail carriers for the Indianapolis post-office there were five applicants for clerkships and eleven for positions as carriers. Ex Congressman Grosvenor, if we remember rightly, was very solicitous over the hundreds of young men who traveled to the place of examination at great expense, passed a successful examination, and then sick at heart waited in vain for a place. This objection to the law can hardly be thought serious in the face of only sixteen applicants, and the young men of the state may properly be reminded that race, color, politics or religion shuts no one out from a chance to work in the Indianapolis post-office; also it may be said that it is better for the post-office to have the possibility of the higher excellence of a larger number of candidates for competition.

It seems that Assistant Secretary Crounse and Treasurer Nebeker each desired to have his son for his secretary. The places are worth $1,800 apiece a year and are excepted from the civil service classification. They have the further advantage of being "back doors" to the classified service because after having served a certain period private secretaries are admitted upon a "pass" instead of a competitive examination. It is stated that Secretary Foster objected to the appointments and then Nebeker and Crounse got together and fixed up the trick of each appointing the other's son for the place, but Secretary Foster vetoed that likewise. Just why Secretary Foster drew the line on Nebeker and Crounse we do not know. The land is dotted with relatives and friends from those of the President down who have received the gift of offices; all the same, it is always interesting to note any squeamishness in this direction. Providing for relatives is a delicate operation and requires a good deal of secrecy and at the best always has an element of uncertainty as to whether the public will swallow it without protest. Such an erratum as Raum's son lately committed undoubtedly requires a temporary pandering to public sentiment. As to Nebeker and Crounze they need not be discouraged. The familiar plan is yet open to them of making a spoils' appointment upon the understanding of a division of the salary. They could make at least $900 apiece a year in this way.

THE President has made a rule that hereafter promotions in the departments at Washington shall be made upon competitive examinations under the control of the civil service commission. These examinations will now amount to something, and those who stand highest will secure the promotions. Heretofore there has been a pretended examination, so easy that all in a given class could pass and then favoritism did its work by permitting a choice from the whole list. The only permanent control of examinations in which the country will have any confidence must rest in the commission. Secretary Tracy and Postmaster-General Wanamaker, if they wish to secure any permanent improvement, will have to take steps accordingly.

CONGRESSMAN WARWICK, the successor of Mr. McKinley in Ohio, instituted a competitive examination of candidates for appointment to West Point. Being open to all, a hundred or more are said to have competed. Answering an inquiry concerning a report that Congressman Warwick was dealing in bad faith with the results of the competition, a correspondent writes:

"I find your clipping and letter on my return from a trip. The newspaper account gives the facts in part, though there is some confusion. It has been the custom of Major McKinley to order competitive examinations to fill vacancies at West Point and Annapolis. Mr. Warwick followed the precedent, and made up his board of examiners, both educational and physical. Among all the applicants the son of Dr. T. Clark Miller, of Massillon, was facile princeps. His father is a leading republican, and pressure was at once brought to bear upon Mr. Warwick to have him appoint some one else, disregarding the recommendations of the committee which had unanimously endorsed young Miller for the place. There was an applicant from Holmes county, whose name now escapes me, whose father was as described in the article sent me. I am not able to state that he was lowest on the list; my impression being that he stood well up, though inferior to Miller both in mental and physical making. This man received the votes of the committee for alternate. Mr. Warwick never, so far as I have been able to learn, has made an appointment for the place, but it is said that he contemplates a new competitive examination. There was considerable of a sensation at the time and I can readily see that Mr. Warwick will be much embarrassed by the attitude he assumes, whatever it may be. If a new examination is ordered the committee and the successful applicant may well feel aggrieved, the one by being stultified, and the other by being disappointed. If Miller is appointed the democratic constituents of the gentleman may make it unpleasant for him. As Holmes county, the residence of the alternate, gives 2,200 democratic majority Mr. Warwick is in a manner between the devil and the deep sea. What I have said is a very moderate statement of the facts, as I understand them. In a word, Mr. Warwick is seeking to undo, for political effect, the work of the committee chosen to inquire into the qualification of applicants.

"A word as to the manner in which the examination was conducted. Every young man was known by a number only, and the report was made on the examination papers by the number. Mr. Warwick held sealed envelopes containing the names of the men, and until these were opened the committee were not supposed to know the name or pedigree of any applicant."

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL died August 12 at the age of seventy-two years. He was a distinguished poet and man of letters, but his crowning glory was that he was besides these the ideal American citizen. It was a light thing for Mr. Lowell to be so thoroughly American as to love his country and to feel pride in her greatness, but never to have shirked the disagreeable task always plucking at the sleeve of the real patriot of a watchful attention to her specific dangers is proof of a far more genuine Americanism. Seeing clearly the menace of the spoils system, he spoke his mind freely and he went further and took up the burden of allying himself with an association organized to fight it.

IN the death of Mr. George Jones, the controlling proprietor of the New York Times, the cloud of parasites who feed on the community have lost a relentless enemy. In the course of its attempt to condense the facts showing how the parasites work, the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has found the Times an inexhaustible source of information; and if these columns have quoted from it more than from other papers it is because the Times in the same proportion strips naked the public evil which more than any other eats into American public morals.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S REPORT ON THE BALTIMORE PRIMARIES.

When Mr. Cleveland's term closed Maryland was almost a republican state. The struggle had been between Gormanism in control of the federal and state patronage on one side and anti-Gormanism, unsupported by any spoil whatever, on the other. Had this state of the issues continued, Maryland would today have been as doubtful as Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana and Iowa. But the plum of federal patronage was given by President Harrison to the republican party machine. As always, there was not enough to go around; those who did not get any began to fight those who did, and Maryland has become as safely democratic as Alabama. Having looted the federal offices the new incumbents in the post-office and in the marshal's office performed their duties as a secondary matter. They gave their first consideration and efforts to hand to hand struggles to control republican primaries and conventions. The classified service being involved Mr. Roosevelt attended their primaries held last March. He obtained a large amount of evidence by personal observation, affidavits and oral examination of witnesses. Congressman Mudd, true to a congressman's notion, that the federal service has no duty so important as the manipulation of primaries, and exasperated that an official should presume to take down the facts of such manipulation, rushed to Washington and demanded Mr. Roosevelt's removal. In the face of this demand Mr. Roosevelt embodied his evidence into a report to the President with pertinent comments. This report has just been given to the public, but only extracts of it have so far appeared in print, and it is impossible at this writing to give it in full. It evidently strikes at the very root of the spoils system. It shows among other things "a federal employe attempting to drag one of the primary judges out of a window; another federal employe smashing a ballot-box and grabbing two handfuls of the tickets, and being pitched out of a window for his over-zeal; another trying to stop an election which seemed to be going against the interest of the faction to which he belonged; still others 'fighting fire with fire,' and frankly confessing their willingness to cheat or do anything else to carry the day for their side."

John Reed, an employe of the custom-house, frankly testified:

I don't say I wouldn't cheat in the primaries. Who ever gets two judges wins.

Q. How do you do your cheating? A. Well, we do our cheating honorably. If they catch us at it, it's all right; it's fair. I even carried the box home with me on one occasion. * * * I have broken up more than one election.

Q. As a matter of fact, in your ward, it is the office-holders who do and always have taken an active part in the primaries? A. Exactly; they are the ones that ought to.

Q. It is mainly the office-holders who run the primaries? A. Most undoubtedly; * * * the great majority are office-holders or people who want office.

Postmaster Johnson, having made a clean sweep in the unclassified service, and having dismissed fifty per cent. in the classified service, thus delivered himself:

Mr. Johnson—There are men that have told me right in my own office, "If you don't like what I do I will go out." People have put men in here over whom I have no control about elections; they're independent of me.

Q. You mean that a great many of the men here, although nominally appointed by you, are really put in by somebody else outside; that is, by the different ward leaders of the party? A. They are recommended by outsiders and they work for the men who put them in here, and are under their control.

Q. Is that so generally in the non-classified service? A. Yes, sir.

Q. They feel responsible to the men who put them in, to the politicians and ward leaders generally, and not responsible to you? A. Yes, sir, that is it.

Q. The amount of it is that in making the non-classified appointments you have to parcel them out to the different wards—the different ward leaders nominate men for the positions? A. Yes, sir; there are about eighteen hundred applicants and about sixty places.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE AND PARTY DELEGATES.

The most important event during the month in connection with the management of the federal service is the acceptance of the resignation of Collector Erhardt and the appointment of J. Sloat Fassett to succeed him in the New York custom-house. President Harrison said to Mr. Erhardt:

"I acknowledged the receipt of your letter resigning your office as collector of the port of New York, and advised you that I would, at a later date, communicate with you again. I now accept your resignation to take effect upon the appointment and qualification of your successor, and in doing so I beg to say that I have held you, both personally and as a public officer, in the highest esteem and confidence, and had no other thought than that you would continue to discharge the duties of your office until the expiration of its term."

Collector Erhardt said:

"I have resigned because the collector has been reduced to a position where he is no longer an independent officer, with authority commensurate with his responsibility. I have given bonds for $200,000. I have received for the government, during the twenty months last passed, $322,697,135.40, and I am all the time personally responsible for enormous values in money and in merchandise. My duties are necessarily performed through about 1,500 employes. I am not willing to continue to be responsible for their conduct unless I can have proper authority over them. The recent policy of the treasury department has been to control the details of the customs administration at the port of New York from Washington, at the dictation of a private individual having no official responsibility. The collector is practically deprived of power and control, while he is left subject to all responsibility. The office is no longer independent, but I am. Therefore, we have separated."

Mr. Erhardt undoubtedly stated the truth, and the country will believe him. It will also believe that the "private individual" is Tom Platt. That he stood in the way of Plattism, the New York Tribune admits as follows:

"Mr. Erhardt, who has resigned his place as the collector of the port of New York for the excellent and uncompromising reason that there was nothing else for him to do, is endeavoring to put himself in the light of a hero and a martyr. This is highly absurd on Mr. Erhardt's part, though in that respect it is characteristic. The republican party honored him with an office of great trust and responsibility. It supposed him to be a republican, a believer in its policies, anxious for its success in administration. This was the view we entertained of him, and the view we presented to our readers. But Mr. Erhardt has employed the opportunities and powers of his office to create party discords, to hold unworthy democrats in the offices they had improperly got under the Cleveland administration, and to obstruct the policies of the treasury department. When he first began to do these things, we gave him some good advice in a kindly way, and he ought to have taken it. But he preferred to keep the company and to heed the counsels of those who were hostile to the policies he was put in office to enforce, and he soon caused himself to be looked upon as an odd combination of mugwump Pharisee and Tammany boss. The result is that he has "resigned."

Mr. Erhardt has thought himself called upon to give out another and a different notion of this incident. "The recent policy of the treasury department," he says, "has been to control the details of the customs administration at this port from Washington, at the dictation of a private individual having no official responsibility." It is open to suspicion that reference is here made to the Hon. Thomas C. Platt. We have no commission to speak for Mr. Platt, but if he has been doing things that have rendered Mr. Erhardt uncomfortable in the Tammany-Mugwump policy he has pursued, we are sure the republican party will judge his offense lightly. What Mr. Erhardt calls "dictation" we should describe as a "narrative of cold facts." The republicans of New York have no desire to see the custom-house run as a tender to Tammany Hall under a sham civil service reform. If Mr. Platt has told this to Secretary Foster, he has told the honest truth. The democratic and mugwump papers which are mourning Erhardt's departure mourn not for him nor for the service, but solely because they know that a large quantity of democratic rubbish will soon be swept from the custom-house, as it should have been swept long ago.

When Mr. Fassett was sworn in he was presented with a San Domingo cutlass, in barbaric origin and purpose truly emblematic of the spoils system, and with the following legend:

This cutlass is an instrument of torture to be used in beheading democrats. Use it quickly and success is assured for the republican party.

Frank Platt, the son of Platt, comes to the surface as the attorney of the new collector and performs his duties in the sprightly manner of a man who has secured a very fat job. For this he is clearly indebted to his father rather than to his legal attainments. The evidence is too overwhelming to admit of the least dispute, that Tom Platt, a private citizen, without the least authority or right to interfere with the management of the federal service, forced Collector Erhardt out of his place because the latter would not let Platt have places in the public service to give to a gang of followers under his control. It is a perfect instance of bossism triumphant, such as the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has steadily maintained was the ruling spirit of American, national, state and municipal public affairs and the greatest evil connected with our civil government. President Harrison did not, as he might have done, prevent this triumph; he alone made it possible.

Again the evidence is so conclusive as to permit no denial, that the expected and understood payment the President is to receive is favorable delegates at the next party convention. He sold executive power vested in him by the constitution.

POINTS OF VIEW.

President Harrison has given us the best commission we have had. But, on the other hand, he has given to the lukewarm friends or decided opponents of the reform, like Wanamaker and Clarkson, positions so important that they have been able to do more in certain directions to retard and injure the reform than the commission has done to improve and extend it. For while, except for details of management, the commission has merely advisory power, and must receive the sanction of the President for what it may propose to have done, these men are autocratic in their department, and can remove or appoint as they please thousands of our public servants, an extent of arbitrary power far more in keeping with the despotism of Russia than the democracy of America. The recommendation of the commission to extend the reform to the census bureau the President has disregarded. Its efforts to punish offenders guilty of bribery or of levying political assessments have been of little avail, because they have not received the aid they had a right to expect; and consequently the offenders still go unpunished. The order forbidding office-holders to take part in political meetings has been openly and constantly violated without rebuke.—Rev. Henry Lambert on the Present Status of Civil Service Reform, Civil Service Record, July, 1891.

While the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE desires to put on record an emphatic protest against Mr. Lambert's inference that Wanamaker and Clarkson have been able to retard and injure the reform more than the civil service commission to improve and extend it, the facts themselves are a fair indictment of this administration, and, mutatis mutandis, we think Mr. Lambert should have added, of the preceding administration. Change Wanamaker and Clarkson to Vilas and Stevenson and their acts are identical. Brazen brutality in the one pair may be substituted for hypocritical brutality in the other. Political assessments were publicly brought to notice in the preceding administration and were treated just as President Harrison is treating them, and the same with the interference of federal office-holders in primaries and elections.

In both administrations a few bright spots of reform have brought out the exceeding blackness and extent of the spoils horizon. It is not a fair standard of comparison with one administration to infer that the bright spots illumine the entire black sky and for the other that the black sky neutralizes the bright spots.

Mr. Lambert's point of view is that of the wide extent of spoil under the present administration. The following quotation, from the Boston correspondence of the New York Times, July 13, illustrates a point of view based on the power of the reform spots:

"Nobody will seriously question Mr. Cleveland's sincerity of purpose to eliminate hurtful partisanship from the business of office-holding. He stood out against the whole democratic party on this point, and he is deserving of credit for his firmness. Not only that; he won his party largely to his side, and established a precedent which his successors must follow, to a limited extent at least. The reform elements which broke away from Blaine in 1884 upon this issue encouraged him and sustained him. But they expected too much. They wanted him, in one term, to revolutionize public sentiment and break down a system which had become firmly rooted by long and unbroken usage. Whenever he made a mistake they set up a howl which was heard throughout the length and breadth of the land. The departments of the government with all their multifarious branches were filled with men of one political faith, with men who had secured their positions through political activity and who utilized their official station to retard the progress of true reform. No matter how offensive these men might happen to be, if one of them was disturbed the President was accused of violating the spirit and letter of the civil service law."

It is this shifting standard that injures the influence of civil service reformers. It never fools the political bosses who are nothing if not clear-minded.

Again in the last month it has been a hundred times asserted by the independent press that Quay, Wanamaker, Clarkson and Dudley "represent" the republican party. They undoubtedly do represent the controlling machine. They are evil men but it is doubtful if Gorman is not a more consummate evil-doer than all of them together. Yet note how the standard of comparison and requirement changes in the following Washington dispatch to the Boston Post, July 22:

Senator Gorman has been asked to take entire charge of the democratic campaign in Maryland with a view to saving the state to the party this autumn. The farmer's alliance movement has become threatening, and the regular democrats are fearful that it will defeat their state ticket and, worse still, throw the control of the legislature into dangerous hands. Senator Gorman is asked to take charge, not to secure his own re-election, which is certain if the legislature is democratic, but to save the state from the disgrace which has come upon Kansas and South Carolina by the domination of the alliance element. Senator Gorman is recognized as the ablest political manager in the state, and all elements of the party are urging him to take the lead. There is no sign of the old independent movement against the senator in Baltimore, but on the contrary the independent democrats are willing to subordinate personal interests.

THE MERIT SYSTEM AND INDIVIDUAL MANHOOD.

A young man had passed a civil service examination in a city at a period when only democrats got in through the competitive system and republicans were got out by dismissal without cause. This carrier, with the rest, relied upon his democracy to get his place and to keep it. The civil service law had been a temporary and unpleasant formality. He was naturally an indifferent and disobliging carrier with enough of insolence in his demeanor to exasperate his helpless republican patron but not enough for any other purpose. This went on until the democratic defeat in 1888. Then in a day this high stepping young fellow became weazen and care-ridden. He was suddenly confronted with the old hardship of political proscription. The withdrawal of the wages to support his family, the task of finding other work made the civil service law loom up in his mind as something more desirable for him than the sort of politics that consists in using a Tom Platt cutlass. But he was obliged to remember that the law had been no bulwark and the time seemed at hand when he would be manipulated out of work as had been his predecessor. Under this strain he succumbed as most men do when the means of supporting their families are in peril. He became the most painstaking and efficient of carriers but with a hang-dog servility that almost exhausted the self-respect of his former suffering patron through sympathy. After a period and a small crisis in the post-office, it was noised about that the law was to be enforced in spirit and it was to be a bulwark of safety to the efficient and honest employe, whatever his politics. No student of human nature could view unmoved the moral change in the old carrier. His manhood had not been restored; it had been evolved. He walks about to-day in all confidence that so long as he does his work well and bears himself with courtesy to the public, his means of livelihood are in no peril and he is free to hold his political and religious opinions. It is the thousands of identical cases over the country that make the strongest argument for the warfare on the spoils system.

THE TOWNSHIP TRUSTEE'S OFFICE.

TRUSTEE'S OFFICE,
CENTER TOWNSHIP, MARION COUNTY,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND., 1891.

Editor of the Civil Service Chronicle:

DEAR SIR—Shortly after I took charge of this office, one year ago, you criticised my appointment of deputies and asserted positively that the county would have to pay dearly for my actions, inasmuch as my management of the aid given to the poor would largely increase the expenses of the county, attributing this supposed increase to our inexperience and imperfect knowledge of the applicants.

Feeling sure that whatever I might say at that time would not change your belief, I remained silent until the present.

My answer to this charge will be found in the statements following:

Aid given by my predecessor from Aug. 1, 1889, to Aug. 1, 1890:

Groceries.....	$ 3,518 00
Coal.....	1,612 15
Wood.....	212 50
Transportation.....	679 75
Burial Costs.....	1,614 75

Total..... $ 7,637 15

Aid given by me from Aug. 1, 1890, to Aug. 1, 1891:

Groceries.....	$ 3,290 00
Coal.....	992 03
Wood.....	102 50
Transportation.....	565 35
Burial Costs.....	1,730 30
Clothing.....	16 30

Total..... $ 6,696 68

Decrease..... $ 940 47

I feel confident that very few, if any, worthy poor have been neglected during the past year. You also asserted that my appointments were made solely to pay somebody out of the public treasury, for having done party work, or, perhaps, personal work for myself. Let me say very emphatically that I made no promises whatever to any of the men employed at this office, or their friends previous to my election.

Trusting that you will give the above as prominent a position in your valuable paper as you gave the said criticism, I am yours very respectfully,

SAMUEL N. GOLD.

The criticism referred to by Mr. Gold is found in the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for August, 1890. There was no assertion that there would be any increase of expenses, or that the county would have to pay dearly for Mr. Gold's actions. A comparison of expenses with any preceding year is worth nothing against the criticism complained of—that Mr. Gold had dismissed thoroughly honest and capable employes, whose knowledge of the worthy and unworthy applicants for relief from the public treasury was in every sense expert, and had put into their places men unfamiliar with their exceedingly important duties. It is no answer to say that the worthy poor have not been neglected. That is only one side of the question. Moreover, the statement is the mere opinion of a man who deprived himself of the means of knowing the worthy poor and of baffling the consummate adroitness of the thousands of unworthy applicants for support from the public treasury. The CHRONICLE said:

Township Trustee Gold, whose township embraces the city of Indianapolis, has removed all of the employes of the office except one, a woman, and has put in Frederick Voght, a molder, Charles McCreery, an advertising agent, Thomas L. Duffy, a laborer, and Joseph Keisburg, whose name we can not find in the directory.

Mr. Gold will never make anybody believe that he could substitute these employes for such men as Frank Wright and Smith King, whom he dismissed, without detriment to the public. He might as well say a plowman could command an ocean steamer.

It is only when in public office and in connection with the business of that office that men like Mr. Gold maintain that equally good results can be obtained with inexperienced assistants. Mr. Gold does not follow this principle in his private business. He is a democrat, but he keeps in his employ some faithful and efficient men who are republicans. He does not turn out his skilled book-keeper and put into his place Voght, the molder, or McCreery, the advertising agent.

Having deprived himself of means of knowledge within his office, the only way in which Mr. Gold could have found out how to properly spend the public money was by application to the charity organization society. If that organization did the work for him, then his deputies hold sinecures; if they searched the records and hunted old information themselves, then Mr. Gold's office was spending its time getting and wisely applying knowledge which it might have had, and skillfully applied at the start by keeping the men he dismissed.

It is no answer to the charge that Mr. Gold paid personal and party debts out of the public treasury with his deputyships, to say that he made no promises before election. Why did he not keep Frank Wright and Smith King?

Mr. Gold is an instance of the respectable citizen who gets an office and, in complacent ignorance, supposes he can violate business principles and then meet criticism by pointing to the fact that the cost of his office is less than under his predecessor. When our insane hospital was in the most infamous part of its career, it answered criticism by pointing to its expenditures which showed a less cost per capita for maintenance than could be shown anywhere else.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has established a board of promotion in the post-office department. The board is to determine a form and mode of examination subject to the approval of the postmaster general. The examinations shall be competitive, and the competition is open to all from the next lower grade in the same bureau, and to all from still lower grades who obtain special permission. The value of this system will, like the system of Secretary Tracy's, depend upon its permanence. If the two secretaries go out of office without having their systems brought under the civil service law by an order of the President, their successors in office are very likely to say that while they believe "in civil service," they don't believe in just this kind, and all the work of Messrs. Tracy and Wanamaker will go by the board.

EULOGY OF QUAY AND DUDLEY BY THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE, JULY 28, 1891.

Resolved, That we accept, against our judgment and with much doubt as to the wisdom and expediency of it for the party's interest, the action of Senator Quay on his resignation as chairman and member of the national committee. In submitting to it, with so much reluctance and regret, we desire to express from our knowledge of the facts of his pre-eminent service to the party, the deep obligation under which he has placed the republican party and cause of good government and patriotism in the United States. He undertook the leadership of a doubtful cause, in a time when the republican party was disheartened and the democratic party confident in the power of supreme control in the government and the nation, and when the odds of the contest were against our party, and by his matchless power, his unequalled skill in resources, his genius to command victory, won for his party an unprecedented victory in the face of expected defeat. We know, as no one else can know, that the contest which he waged was one of as much honor and fair methods as it was of invincible power and triumphant victory, and that it was won largely by the power of his superior generalship and his unfailing strength as a political leader. In the great contest of 1888, in the months of severe effort, and during years of close personal association with him, we have learned to know the nobility of the man, and we desire in this conspicuous manner to place on public record, for the present and for the future, as an enduring answer to the partisan assaults of a defeated enemy, our testimony in appreciation of his public service and his personal worth.

Resolved, That while we are left by General Dudley's own wish no other course than to consent to his retirement from the committee, we feel that his action deprives the committee and the party of the invaluable and loyal service of one who has proved himself one of the ablest and most faithful public men of his time. In every field of honorable contest and patriotic purpose, as a soldier winning in his boyhood the stars of a general in the union army; as a public official, serving with equal fidelity his country in prominent places; in the political field with like ambition for the nation's good, he has proved himself always worthy of the respect and admiration of his countrymen. In his whole public career in his unselfish service, and with his generous nature, he has given freely his time and labor, never thinking of private profit or personal emolument. His whole life is a proof of his manliness of purpose and his patriotism as a citizen. Speaking from what we know of his rare abilities and unusual devotion to party and country, we would express this evidence of what we know the republican party owes to him for his services in so many of its contests, and especially in the memorable struggle of 1888. We part from him officially with sincere regret, and in doing so we wish to put in the records of the committee this expression of that party's gratitude and personal friendship in which we know he is so worthy to be held.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

—The resignations would give greater reason for the hope that republican politics are to be managed by different methods hereafter were it not that Gen. James S. Clarkson was elected as chairman in the place of Senator Quay, and that Mr. Clarkson has not hesitated to avow his belief in politics by the machine and for the machine.—Christian Union.

—Gen. Clarkson can not be considered as superior to Mr. Quay in his political ideas. These facts, when coupled with the reasons which compelled the resignation of Collector Erhardt of the port of New York, do not afford satisfaction to the friends of civil service reform and decent politics.—Congregationalist

—Each of the two parties is living on the same familiar diet—the mistakes of the other party. The republicans, being in power, do not appear to much advantage as to the disposal of offices and the carrying out of the civil service reform, and their choice of leaders is far from ideal.—National Baptist.

—We are glad Quay and Dudley have retired. We are glad that the sentiment of the party was strong enough to make it necessary for them to retire; we only regret that it seems advisable to the committee to cover their withdrawal with such fulsome adulation.—Independent.

—The Pilot of Boston says of Quay and Dudley that they are more widely than favorably known to the public as coadjutors of Postmaster-General Wanamaker in the "frying-of-fat" and "blocks-of-five" tactics, whereby the late election was won. Turning to Mr. Clarkson, it says that he is a spoilsman who makes no hypocritical pretense of "reform," and believes that the party in power should control the distribution of offices.

In the August Forum Edward P. Clark exposes the Jacksonian plan of rotation in office as an interloper in our political system.

Hon. Dorman B. Eaton has a paper on "Civil Service Reform" in the North American for June. After showing the present status of the reform, he adds: "It is no wonder that selfish politicians and bosses, who care more for patronage than for principle, are hostile, angry, and alarmed."

Moorfield Storey, of Boston, at the Harvard commencement-dinner said:

"There are men who are fighting the battles of the country in various fields, and who are proving their fidelity to the veritas which is stamped upon our seal by many an act of courage and self-denial. Meeting, as they do, month after month, abuse and misrepresentation, should we not do them and our country service if once a year we sent them our 'God-speed' in language that could not be mistaken? Would not a ringing cheer from this Memorial Hall encourage the fainting reformer as the pipes of the Highlanders revived the despairing garrison of Lucknow? When Theodore Roosevelt is fighting wild beasts at our modern Ephesus, will it not inspire even him with courage to know that the graduates of Harvard of every political faith are with him in his battle, and are sure that he will win?" [Tremendous applause.]

Ex-Secretary of State Bayard delivered the annual address to the alumni and students of the law department of Michigan University.

He called the attention of his audience to the wrongs the spoils system worked, and said, referring to appointees to public office under the system:

"These men hold that the public offices, which, as the name implies, are apportionments of public functions and duties for the public advantage, are created in order to furnish means of support and emolument to the individuals who are placed in them, thus losing sight altogether of the mutual relation of a government and its agents; indeed, subverting that relation and making that the servant of its own employes and agents, and this theory logically and practically carried to its conclusion involves nothing less than the revolution and defeat of our republican system. In fact, it reproduces the rule of the pretorian guard of ancient Rome."

THE MERIT SYSTEM IN THE CINCINNATI POST-OFFICE.

"It is hard to overcome the prejudice that has existed against the system of civil service examinations, and promotions on a basis of merit," was a remark made by Mr. John B. Staebach, on the day his term as cashier of the post office and secretary of the local board of civil service examiners expired. "The system now embraces all offices employing more than fifty men and of course embraces Cincinnati. All positions here, except the heads of departments and places where the incumbent has to handle a great deal of money, are filled by examination. During my three years' experience I have witnessed a good many improvements and I can assure you that the features that were at one time open to criticism have been largely eradicated.

"It was urged once somewhat pertinently that the examinations were of a technical nature, framed for school boys and not for men of experience who were apt to be somewhat 'rusty' in geography and arithmetic. The tendency has constantly been to correct the features that were honestly criticised and to make the tests as practicable as possible."

"Postmaster Zumstein is carrying out the law in the right spirit. There have been only four or five removals made in the classes to which the law has been made applicable, and these would have been made, I think, by Mr. Riley, had he remained. The men removed were incompetent."—Cincinnati Times-Star, Aug. 11.

The Ohio republican convention, June, 1891, in its platform said:

We denounce the present governor of Ohio for having converted the benevolent institutions into political machinery, making political merchandise of the sufferings and calamities of the helpless wards of the state.

(4) The existing republican administration promised, when it assumed power, to give full effect to reforms in the civil service. Offices in that service have, notwithstanding such pledge, been conferred for political reasons to as great an extent as at any former period in the history of the country. The civil service of the United States, considered as a whole, is to day a partisan organization, doing active political service for the administration by which it is employed.—Maryland State Democratic Convention, July, 1891.

PLATTISM.

The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and * * become his MAN from that day forth. * * Services were free and base. * * Base service was to * * carry out his dung.—[Blackstone.

—"There never was a time when Mr. Platt was so thoroughly appreciated or so highly esteemed by the republican party as he is to-day. The republican party without Mr. Platt would be like the play of 'Hamlet' with Hamlet left out."—Gen. John N. Knapp, Chairman of the New York State Republican Committee.

—"Did you notice the slap that Col. Erhardt made at you?" asked the reporter.

Mr. Platt's eyestwinkled for a moment, then he smiled, and, after looking at the reporter for a moment, said: "I see that he says that the affairs at the custom-house have been controlled from Washington at the dictate of some private individual who has no official responsibility, if that is what you mean?" Then came another smile, and as he slipped a paper-cutter through the edge of an official-looking envelope the ex-senator added: "But that can not refer to me. He must have been thinking of some other fellow when he wrote that."

"Well, what do you think of Senator Fassett's appointment?" asked the reporter.

"No better appointment could have been made," was the reply. Senator Fassett is pre-eminently well fitted to assume the responsibilities of the office, and his appointment should and I believe will please every good republican in the state. I think it is certain to strengthen the party throughout the state."

A few moments after Mr. Platt had finished speaking he left his office for the Pennsylvania railroad ferry en route to Washington. He was going on private business, he said.—Interview in New York Evening Post, July 30.

—"The office and its business are absolutely strange to me. I have everything to learn. I would say, however, that I have a very distinct purpose to make the administration of the office as successful as my present ignorance of it and the consideration of its patrons while I am learning will permit. Whatever ability I can command will be at the service of the government, and that, I hope, will be assisted by such encouragement as the administration of it may seem to deserve."—Interview with Collector Fassett, Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 31.

—Ex-Senator Thomas C. Platt arrived here at 9:40 o'clock last evening. This morning Mr. Platt called on Secretary Foster and later went to the navy department. Talking to the Mail and Express man, Mr. Platt said: "I am pleased with Mr. Fassett's appointment, but I have already told the Mail and Express all I have to say on that matter. There is no truth whatever in the rumor that Appraiser Cooper is going to resign. He was in my office yesterday, and we had a long talk. I can say positively that he will not go."—Washington Dispatch to New York Mail and Express, Aug. 1.

—At 12:30 Mr. Fassett's dictation of letters was interrupted by the appearance of a small but significant group of men. These were Frank Platt, son of Thomas C. Platt, Vernon H. Brown, Garrett A. Hobart of New Jersey, and United States Commissioner John A. Shields. Young Mr. Platt, who is a lawyer, produced Mr. Fassett's $200,000 bond duly executed. The ink was scarcely dry upon the signatures of the sureties, who were Vice-President Levi P. Morton, Jesse Seligman, the banker, Vernon H. Brown, agent of the Cunard steamship line, and Garrett A. Hobart, the New Jersey republican politician. Each of the bondsmen qualified in the sum of $50,000.

Commissioner Shields was then called on to administer the oath of office to Mr. Fassett. Col. Erhardt, who was also present, remarked jocularly that the oath would not be valid unless administered by Commissioner Shields, who had so long performed this function for the collectors of this port. Mr. Fassett then dully took the oath of office in the presence of the persons named and Mr. Sperry.

The ceremony was scarcely over when a present for Collector Fassett arrived from one of his admirers. It was a West Indian cutlass, called in San Domingo a machete. Its giver was Nathaniel McKay, who made a speech at the recent convention of republican clubs at Syracuse. The handle of the cutlass was tied with red, white and blue ribbons, while its blade was decorated with small American flags and inscribed all over with sentiments like this:

"This cutlass is an instrument of torture to be used in beheading democrats. Use it quickly and success is assured for the republican party.

Republican directions: Use daily, morning, noon and night, until every democratic head is severed.

Sure cure for democratic headache."

Mr. Hobart, Mr. Brown, and Commissioner Shields left the custom-house soon after Mr. Fassett had taken the oath. Frank Platt lingered behind. At half-past one o'clock he and Mr. Fassett came from the collector's inner office and left the custom-house.

Mr. Fassett, when questioned to-day, declined to say anything on the subject of new appointments in the custom-house.—New York Evening Post, Aug. 12.

—Among the callers received by Mr. Fassett in the course of the day were Bernard Biglin,¹ George Hilliard, Senator Saxton, William Leaycraft, ex-United States Marshal Clinton McDougal of the northern district of the state, Postmaster Van Cott, Senator Stewart, Appraiser Cooper, Colonel William L. Brown and John Simpson. Surveyor Lyon took Mr. Fassett out to luncheon. The surveyor's relations with the administration are much pleasanter than they were with the old one. If Mr. Lyon had taken Colonel Erhardt out on the same hospitable errand, the wiseacres at the custom-house would have thought that Arcadia had come back to earth and had settled down to do business at the corner of William and Wall streets.

Last night Collector Fassett was the guest at a dinner at the Oriental hotel. Among the others present were T. C. Platt, Vice-President Morton, Senator Stewart and others.—New York Times, Aug. 14.

[¹Rumors that have for some time been afloat in relation to a possible change in the office of appraiser of the port settled yesterday into a definite report that the brother of "Barney" Biglin is booked for the place. The prospect has appalled the Union League Club, to whose urgency in connection with that of the merchants, with whom for many years he was creditably associated, Mr. Cooper owed his appointment. While ready to make full allowances for the exigencies of practical politics, the stride from Marvelle W. Cooper to Barney Biglin's brother is a longer one than people of respectable leanings like to contemplate.

"Barney's" brother's name is Joseph C., if it is of any interest to identify him more closely than as the brother of "Barney." He is now in charge of the ninth division in the appraiser's department. The place came to him, of course, through his brother, whom he is credited with having served in it more faithfully than he has served the government. If stories are to be believed, the place has been used as a lever to throw in Barney's way the trucking business of merchants whose goods unhappily fall within that division.—New York Times, May 5.

The exposure in yesterday's Times of the scheme to hand over the appraiser's department to the Biglins raised a howl of protest throughout the entire business district. Merchants were emphatic in declaring that unless the administration wishes utterly to discredit itself it will shake itself clear of this alliance.

Apart from the humiliation of bowing to the authority of such a man, merchants are indignant when they think that the appointment would compel them to turn over all their trucking from the public stores to the Biglin family as the price of getting an examination of their goods. Already this form of tyranny has become offensive, in spite of Mr. Cooper's efforts to prevent it. With the Biglins in full control it would be intolerable.

Some curiosity was manifested yesterday to see how Platt and Elkins would take this business uprising. No one cares much for the wishes of these schemers, which often miscarry, but they are recognized as a power for mischief in things political. So far as yesterday's inquiries developed anything in this regard, it appeared that the concern of these worthies in the Biglin scheme is not of the kind to keep them awake nights.

Platt and Elkins control the syndicate that has worked for a Bowling Green site for a new custom-house. It was to their interest that a cheap site be acquired for the appraiser's warehouse in order that the saving might be applied to the Bowling Green appropriation. Biglin was useful to them in this work, for the appraiser's site is to go to the government for $350,000 less than the appropriation for it, provided Lindley carries out his contract to deliver for $500,000.

It is for his service in securing this saving that Biglin is promised the appraisership for his brother. Of course, if the syndicate can not bring enough influence to bear at Washington to carry out this deal, Biglin will have wasted his time.—New York Times, May 6.]

—E. C. Lee has enjoyed a variety of experiences lately. For some time he has held office as assistant superintendent of the custom-house. When Joseph Murray resigned the post of superintendent a couple of months ago Mr. Lee took up his duties. He had devoted himself to them but a few days when Collector Erhardt happening not to leave the custom-house until 5:30 o'clock one afternoon, found no watchman on duty at the entrance, and therefore suspended Mr. Lee. A few days later the assistant superintendent was reinstated, but when the orders for a reduction of the force were sent out Lee's name was supposed to be included in the list of those to go. It was not there, however, and he continued placidly in office.

Yesterday there came another change for Mr. Lee. By a telegram from the treasury department he was appointed janitor of the custom-house at a salary of $1,000 a year. The office is made for the man in this case, for hitherto the custom-house has got along without a janitor.

Lee has a powerful "pull" with the republican leaders, and in these days of promised prosperity for men of "influence" after Platt's own heart, he is not likely to be neglected. He has had the backing of Sheridan Shook and Leader Robert A. Greacen of the fifteenth assembly district, and William Brookfield, chairman of the republican county committee, has lent him a helping hand.—New York Times, Aug. 8.

—At the convention of the republican league, held in Syracuse, New York, August 5, the following office-holders were on the committee on resolutions: Mahlon Chance, inspector of immigration; John E. Millholland, another inspector; Robert P. Porter, superintendent of the census; Charles E. Fitch, collector of internal revenue; Henry Hebing, collector of the port of Genesee; Edward A. McAlpin, postmaster at Sing Sing, and Clarence Smith, son of Dr. William M. Smith, health officer of the port, one of Platt's particular cronies, appeared as an eleventh-hour candidate, and carried off the first vice-presidency.

—About two weeks ago the canvass (for the republican caucuses in this county) began in earnest, ex-Senator Fassett leading one section of the party and Postmaster Flood and his brother, ex-Congressman Thomas S. Flood, the other contingent. About that time Governor Hill's Albany heelers came to town and took an active part against Mr. Fassett.

Strange as it may appear the governor struck hands with his old party enemy, Mr. Arnot, and the triple alliance was formed and put into working order. Democratic heelers from all parts of the county were called in. They got money and instructions and proceeded to work to carry the caucuses for blood. The strange combination was a puzzle to all good citizens, and to offset it republicans turned out en masse and defeated it. At each caucus democrats by the hundred appeared and offered their ballots and swore them in, but it was labor in vain, for Fassett had an overwhelming majority.—Elmira, New York, Dispatch to New York Times, August 9.

—At Horseheads to-day, where the Chemung county convention was held to name delegates to the state and senatorial conventions, 186 delegates were expected to be in their seats. Contests, however, are made in 108 cases and these were divided up as follows: Fassett faction, 43; Flood faction, 65.

The widening of the breach to-day means a direct fight against Thomas C. Platt's influence.

A newspaper of Elmira prints an open letter from ex-Assemblyman Van Duzer, in which he accuses Collector Fassett of trying to defeat him in 1884 at the instance of Thomas C. Platt, and of swinging over from Evarts to Morton at Mr. Platt's suggestion, after promising to support Evarts for United States senator. The letter claims that Mr. Fassett is trying to make a deal with the democrats to get the county.

Mr. Van Duzer said to-day: "The letter is in answer to an open letter sent to me in which Collector Fassett admits that he defeated the renomination of Congressman Flood because Flood declined to let him name the postmaster. Mr. Flood is now determined to test Fassett's power, and if he attempts to run the convention this afternoon we will withdraw and hold one of our own. We are averse to a split this fall, but we do not propose that Collector Fassett shall run the place for Tom Platt."

Postmaster Flood also spoke against Mr. Fassett, and said that the republicans of the district were trying to show the people of the state that they could not be controlled by Mr. Platt.—Elmira Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, August 16.

—The expected struggle between the opposing factions of the republican party in Chemung came to a close at Horseheads this afternoon.

Collector Fassett was early on the ground and opened headquarters at the Platt House. Congressman Flood, accompanied by Postmaster Flood of this city and Gen. Langdon, appeared early and also put up at the Platt House. * *

Postmaster Henry Flood made a speech, in which he denounced the other side. He said they had opposed him for years, had got him out of a position in his regular practice on a railroad, and were now trying to oust him from the post-office. He charged them with holding snap caucuses and conventions, and was especially severe in his remarks in reference to the Advertiser. He denied using money, said democrats at caucuses referred to Mr. Platt as boss, and that he never did and never would wear any man's collar. They had threatened and bulldozed him and used every effort to drive him from the republican party. * *

Then the twenty-seven regular Flood delegates and about fifty others were seated, after which the following delegates were elected: State—J. D. F. Slee, Jonas S. Vanduser, Henry Flood, George McCann, A. B. Fitch and Benjamin D. Smith; senatorial—C. J. Langdon, Thomas S. Flood, Moses Munson, John O'Connor, Julius S. Denton, Ira A. Jones.

In the meantime the regular convention was called to order by Abner C. Wright, chairman of the republican county committee, and Mr. Fassett was made chairman amid great enthusiasm. The collector made a speech, during which he reviewed the history of the factional unpleasantness. He referred to the double dealing of the other side, and told how they had connived with democrats and slaughtered their party candidates; and how some of the late caucuses were run by democrats in the interest of the Floods. He denied each and every claim of the others, and explained everything to the utmost satisfaction of all present in the crowded hall, for he was continually interrupted by applause.—Elmira Dispatch to New York Times, August 16.

—Collector J. Sloat Fassett, who has been doing political work in Chemung county nearly all the time since he was appointed to his present office, came down to the custom-house this morning to put in a day's work for the United States government. He was warmly greeted by a crowd of place-seekers. The result of his day's labor was summed up at two p. m. in the announcement that he was going to appoint thirty additional laborers for work at the public stores.

There will be no changes in the big offices at present, he said.—New York Evening Post, August 17.

—Granville D. Parsons, ex-mayor of this city and at present a member of the excise board, was notified yesterday of his discharge from the United States Express Company by John M. Frazier, general superintendent.

Mr. Parsons is a staunch republican, and has not in every instance satisfied the wishes of Senator Fassett and Col. A. E. Baxter, republican leaders, who have some friends who have not been successful in securing licenses. At this disregard of orders Tom Platt, president of the company, was consulted, and he deemed it advisable, by political discrimination, to dismiss Mr. Parsons from his position as cashier and head book-keeper of the Elmira office.

Granville Parsons had been connected with the company since 1857 in several trusted capacities, and this piece of political jobbery is a deliberate appliance for denying an honorable man, gray from service, the means of a livelihood.—Elmira Dispatch to New York Times, May 17.

—The preliminary skirmishing to the republican campaign this fall has commenced and the fierce contest over who is going to control matters in the cataract county has fairly begun. It is a fight of the Hiscock supporters against the anti-Hiscock faction. The leader of the latter is ex-Congressman Richard Crowley, and he has back of him the support of the party organ, the Journal, which a year ago was fighting him.

Hiscock made a big blunder when he ignored the Journal's canvass for the postmastership here, and the party paper is bitterly antagonistic to his interests. The first point was gained by the anti-Hiscock men last week by the election of John T. Davison as chairman of the republican county committee. Davison was one of the candidates for the office eight months ago, but by a trick on the part of the Hiscock Suspension Bridge custom-house, ex-Collector Benjamin Flagler, chief lieutenant of Collector Low, was elected to the place. He was forced to resign and Davison had a large majority.

The Hiscock men who hold office are endeavoring in every way to secure control, and have made places in the custom-house and post-office here for friends of ex-Congressman Crowley, in the hopes of appeasing him.—Lockport, New York, Dispatch to New York Times, July 19. [Hiscock is known as Tom Platt's 'errand boy.'] —OSWEGO, N. Y., Aug. 1.—The republican county convention for Seneca county, held at Romulus to-day, was one of the most exciting in the political history of this section, resulting in a bolt and two conventions. Only one convention is held in the county, there being only one assembly district, to elect state, judicial and senatorial delegates. The fight was between the Platt and Miller men, the forces of the former being led by J. B. H. Mongin, a partner of ex-Senator W. L. Sweet, and the Miller men by A. M. Patterson, a millionaire manufacturer of Waterloo. The forces have been getting ready for the fight for weeks and began gathering at Romulus last night, coming from all directions in hacks.

The convention was called for 12 o'clock to-day. At that hour the Miller men marched from their hotel to the hall only to find the door barred, and to learn that the Mongin men had entered the hall by a side door. A sheriff's posse of forty men was on hand to preserve order. They were inside, and seemed to be all in sympathy with the Platt forces, and to take their orders from them. The Miller men tried the rear door, but could not get in. Then they brought a battering ram to play on the front door. When they broke in the door they found the muzzle of a deputy sheriff's revolver leveled at them.

"You hit that door again and I'll fire," shouted the deputy.

The Patterson men desisted and started to withdraw, when Col. Manning, a Seneca Falls lawyer, jumped on a box.

"Don't go away, men," he shouted. "We'll hold the convention right here at the point of the pistol."

They then proceeded to elect a full set of delegates to the state, judicial and senatorial conventions, but without the formality of credentials or roll-call.

In the meantime, windows were smashed with stones, and somebody threw a bottle of vitriol, which struck the sash and broke, discoloring the building. They then withdrew.

While this was going on outside, the Mongin men were holding a convention inside. They elected as delegates to the state convention, W. L. Sweet, J. B. H. Mongin, P. Maguire, G. W. Peterson and E. L. Andrews. Only the presence of the deputies, who were armed with clubs and revolvers, prevented a first-class riot. The Mongin men say that when the doors were broken in the county committee was in session and the convention had not been called. There was great excitement, and to night the two factions are ready to clash wherever they meet.—Oswego Dispatch to New York Times, August 2.

—There was a hot republican primary in the first ward of this city at noon to-day, in which Platt and anti-Platt tickets were voted. Over five hundred persons were on hand, and a posse of police, under the marshal, was required to keep them in order and prevent acts of violence.

The Platt forces were led by B. B. Odell, Jr., republican state committeeman, and the opposition by Joseph M. Dickey. When the polls were closed not far from one hundred persons remained to vote, and were thus disfranchised. The vote resulted: Platt, 219; anti-Platt, 129.

It is expected that the fight will be continued in all the ward primaries in the city. Postmaster W. G. Taggart, and all the leading politicians of the city rallied to the support of Odell without regard to their residence so far as wards were concerned.—Newburg, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, August 16.

—We find the administration—which should be the neutral quantity, the reconciler of the factions—freezing out one of the best collectors New York ever had at the bidding of a relentless faction leader and installing in his place one whose most apparent claim to preferment has been his unswerving loyalty to that leader. It looks as if President Harrison were more interested in restoring to Mr. Platt the control of the party machinery in New York than in electing a republican governor or a republican legislature next November.—Brooklyn Times [Rep.].

—Mr. Platt declared that he loved Clarkson for the heads he has cut off, and he has got a collector in the New York custom house whom he expects to love for the same reason. Do the republicans wish the country to understand that the civil service reform pledges in the party platform and the President's letter of acceptance were only good until after election.—Pittsburg Dispatch [Rep.].

—The system by which ex-Senator Platt or any other individual is enabled purely for political reasons of a low and sordid character to turn out of office an upright and capable public servant like Mr. Erhardt is wrong in itself. * * It virtually gives notice to every republican office-holder in New York that he must serve Platt. * * And if it is intended to help along the second term on the condition that Platt shall set the New York machine in motion for Harrison, it will do the President in the long run more harm than good.—Philadelphia Bulletin [Rep.].

Thus the feudal connection was established, * * and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster.—[Blackstone.]

—The Cedar Rapids Gazette, July 23d, prints the make-up of the recent state republican convention. There are ninety-six counties in the state and its report covers eighty two. There were more than sixty office-holders in the convention. The following names are given:

J. B. Patterson, Boone county.
Byron McQuinn, postmaster, Benton county.

—The negotiations pending for the last few weeks for the sale of the Logansport Journal were consummated to-day, and the paper is now in the hands of a stock company, composed of strictly Harrisonites. The price paid was $16,000. Among the stockholders are ex-Judge S. H. Chase, ex-State Senator A. R. Shroyer, Postmaster D. W. Tomlinson and Ex-Representative B. F. Campbell.—Dispatch from Logansport to Indianapolis Sentinel, July 23.

—John B. Cockrum, assistant United States district attorney, addressed, August 4, a republican club upon the recently nominated republican candidates for the city offices.

—"No, the fact that a meeting was to be held was not discovered through the treachery of any member of the anti-Harrison forces. There are a thousand ways in which such information can leak out. The leaders of the movement throughout the state are known and spotted. In the postmasters, postal agents, revenue men and other federal employes throughout the state, the administration has what you might term an army of agents and detectives, and any suspicious move on the part of a prominent anti-administration man is promptly reported to headquarters and his movements are watched, and the antidote is promptly applied for any mischief that may be set brewing. In general terms you may set it down that the president is nearly as well informed as to what is going on in the camp of his enemies as his enemies themselves, and when the time comes he will show his hand."—Indianapolis Correspondence Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. [Rep.]

—About two hundred Pennsylvanians, members of the Pennsylvania state club, and all office-holders, of course, sweltered in an upper room in the grand army building to-night. Mr. Quay was the subject of a highly-complimentary resolution, which expressed regret that he had resigned from the national committee, and the Pennsylvania state committee was requested to return him to that committee in consideration of his valuable services to his party.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 6.

—Senator Quay, fresh from his Beaver home, arrived at the Continental hotel this morning, where he was soon joined by Collector Cooper. The ex-chairman of the state committee sat down, and they were busy for fully an hour discussing the coming republican state convention, its platform and candidates. When the matter of the convention had been fully discussed, the subject of the succession to Chairman Andrews was taken up.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 12.

—"If I receive the nomination, I feel confident of an election, and I can assure you that, as in the past so in the future, I shall know how to take care of those who assist me towards success."

From the circular letter of Herman H. Gocsling, county commissioner of Hamilton county, Ohio, seeking to become treasurer of the county.

—"A lady is a cousin of a prominent official in the census office. She secured a clerkship through this relationship, and by the same means secured the appointment of seven or eight more clerks at good salaries, and these clerks are now retained through all the dismissals that have taken place. They pay the lady who got them the place a large portion of the salaries they receive each month."—Washington Correspondent St. Paul Pioneer Press [Rep.]

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

When one thinks of the kind of government our forefathers supposed they had established, and when one thinks of the republic so many valiant soldiers fought to preserve, what a travesty it seems as one reads the actual state of affairs disclosed by this report (Mr. Roosevelt's)! It never before was so clear that to be a true patriot, to be worthy of the spirit of 1776 and honor those who died for their country from 1861 to 1865, one must be a civil service reformer, and do all he can to abolish utterly this horrid spoils system.—Civil Service Record.

REV. HENRY LAMBERT, of West Newton, writes the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE:

In noticing the report in the July number of the Civil Service Record, of my address before the Newton Civil Service Reform Association, you remark:

"The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE desires to put on record an emphatic protest against Mr. Lambert's inference that Wanamaker and Clarkson have been able to retard and injure the reform more than the civil service commission to improve and extend it."

Your "emphatic protest" does me great injustice, for I made no such sweeping statement as you attribute to me, but said distinctly that they had done more to retard and injure the reform, in certain directions, than the commission has done to improve and extend it, a very different, but entirely true statement, in which Mr. Dana, editor of the Record, agrees with me. I trust, therefore, that you will do me the justice to let my correction appear in your next number.

THE Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., will be glad to receive a copy of July, 1889, of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE to complete their file.

THERE seems to be all over the country, not only an active participation in politics by federal office-holders but a very general domination by them of the machine. The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE asks its readers to assist in making its record as complete as possible by forwarding particular instances.

THE annual meeting of the national league of civil service reform associations, will be held at Buffalo, September 29th and 30th. The first public meeting will be held Tuesday evening at Concert Hall, when George William Curtis will deliver an address. Meetings will follow on Wednesday at the lecture-room of the Buffalo Library, at which, in the forenoon, papers will be read as follows:

The Secret Executive Sessions of the Senate.—By William D. Foulke.

This Divorce of Municipal Business from Politics.—By Moorfield Storey.

(Upon a topic to be announced hereafter.—By Sherman S. Rogers.)

In the afternoon general business will be transacted, including the hearing of reports and the election of officers. Wednesday evening the Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association will give a dinner to the members of the national league. All members of local associations are members of the national league. Buffalo is near Indiana, and the sacrifice to go to this meeting would, for many Indiana members, be a small one. Their enjoyment would be great, and the same may be said of the western members generally.

THE reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

When President Harrison was inaugurated, the reform system established by law had been extended to some 32,000 places in the federal service. In two years and six months he has extended it to cover some 700 additional places, and has made the rules cover promotions in the departments at Washington. To have made the reform system, months ago, cover many thousand additional places, such as letter-carriers in free delivery cities, pension agencies and so on, would have been but ordinary diligence in performance of the above plain contract.

THE spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments * * * to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

Headsmen Clarkson in less than two years removed more than 30,000 fourth-class postmasters, and since March 4, 1889, more than 100,000 federal place-holders have been displaced by partisans of the administration. This has been done in the wilful and wanton exercise of "the power of official patronage." The office of collector at the port of New York is now being tossed from henchman to henchman to placate Tom Platt, a private citizen, in order through him to secure delegates at the next republican national convention. This use of offices is not different in kind or unconstitutionality from the use of the Chilean civil and military service by Bal-maceda to break down the government of his country.

THE evidence taken by Mr. Roosevelt, assisted by John C. Rose and Charles J. Bonaparte, at Baltimore, makes a remarkable publication. In other official investigations, where it would hurt the other party, scraps of evidence have been introduced showing the connection between the public offices and primaries and conventions. But this investigation had for its one object the discovery of how far and in what manner do the federal office-holders of Baltimore interfere with the free action of the people attempting to perform their political duties. Mr. Roosevelt went straight to this object without regard to who was hit or hurt, and he has put on record a mass of evidence which is a monument of shame and of inestimable value. The country can now see the spoilsmen in black and white in their own words. With equal propriety the administration might allow the crew of a man-of-war or the troops from Fort McHenry to be assessed and brawl and fight at primaries, as to allow the civilians from the postmaster's and marshal's offices to do it. The Civil Service Record for September publishes Mr. Roosevelt's report in full, and the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will, from time to time, publish the most important parts of the evidence taken.

WE hear a great deal in these days about party "issues," and many excellent people regret that civil service reform has never been and never will be an "issue." These civil service reformers still cling to the idol of party or a party leader, and they really mean that Platt and Hill and Gorman and Quay and their gillies dictate the "issues" of their respective parties. If an issue springs from a condition of things that floods the country with facts, the spoils system is at this moment the great issue in this country in spite of scant mention in any platform. This paper means to gather the facts of municipal, state and national spoil and put them into condensed shape for people too busy to get them themselves. There is not a month that its space is sufficient to print one-twentieth of what it collects, and it is a conservative estimate that it is not able to collect one-twentieth of what is printed. Such a floodgate of spoil touching every phase of public life as Tammany opens, this paper has to pass by. If gathered into a book as the facts appear from day to day in the New York papers, it would form the most astounding and incomprehensible manifestation of this century. It is criminal; it lays a vile touch upon the administration of justice; it blackmails; it steals; it corrupts far and wide, and though this is known by the best men of both parties in New York, its power is as great and as far reaching as it ever was. So far as any sign shows to-day, Tammany may last forever. Why, indeed, should Tammany and Tom Platt make an "issue" on civil service reform when their power and life are dependent upon spoil?

THE postmaster-general has sent a circular letter to postmasters at county-seats, inviting them to visit each postmaster in their respective counties, and report to to him before October 15 upon the condition of the office. In view of the high regard which this administration has for ex-Headman Clarkson, and in view of the many reports of the political information obtained by the census takers, it was natural for many people to suppose that Mr. Wanamaker desired before October 15 to know what republican postmasters were not sufficiently active and where it would heal breaches to remove the democrats who here and there have hitherto escaped the knife. The Boston Post, August 19, states that the leading white republicans of Alabama recently met at Birmingham, and appointed a committee of fifty to "hunt up and prefer 'charges' against every democratic postmaster in the state." Mr. Wanamaker suggests an easy channel for these "charges." The suggestion does not appear to find favor from republican sources. The Cedar Rapids Gazette says:

It would require two weeks steady work for Postmaster Daniels to examine the offices in this county, and his expenses could not be less than $40; besides, he would have to pay for extra help at his own office while absent. Then again we do not think the average county-seat postmaster, who is usually a county-seat politician, would care to make an unfavorable report of a rural postmaster, who is usually a rural or local politician. The postmasters will generally notify Mr. Wanamaker that they are not in the inspection business.

Minor post-offices in divisions under superintendents who do not hold their places by favoritism is one thing, while minor post-offices in divisions by counties under a county political boss is another.

CONGRESSMAN WARWICK, the successor of Mr. McKinley, submitted the selection of a cadet to West Point to a competitive examination, and himself selected the board before whom the candidates were to compete. They are stated to have been professional men of the highest standing in the four counties. The sixteen-year-old successful competitor proved to be the son of a republican, and Congressman Warwick has finally rejected him and appointed a boy who was a candidate and rejected by the examining board. This is one of the little silly mean things a grown man does who barter public office for private pelf.

FROM THE SPEECH OF WILLIAM DUDLEY FOULKE BEFORE THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS AT SARATOGA, SEPTEMBER 3.

The principles underlying civil service reform are as clearly demonstrable as any in political economy. They start from the same axiom of self-interest, which, while not the sole motive of human action, are still apt to play a preponderating part. Just as men will buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, just so is it a necessary consequence of the spoils system that men in the distribution of offices will pay the highest price for political support of the greatest political value. As commercial value is measured by dollars, so political value is measured by votes, either in the caucus, convention or popular election. * * * In the primitive stages of republican government men consider more the quality of the man to be appointed than in its later and more impersonal stages. In the earlier days of our government we acted upon the theory of personal discretion in the selection of office-holders, the President was supposed to have some knowledge of the postmasters and collectors whose names were submitted to the senate, and when postmasters and collectors were few, this theory was not unreasonable. In the earlier days of the steam-engine the valve was turned on by the personal action of the engineer; but as the machinery became more highly developed and complicated, automatic action was found to be necessary. So has it been in our government. When the number of postmasters increased to 40,000, personal selection became no longer possible. These things must now be done by system. What shall the system be?

The development of the spoils system in American politics has been attributed to Andrew Jackson, to Martin Van Buren, to Aaron Burr. It is not due to any man. If Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren and Aaron Burr had never lived it would still have been engrafted at some time or other, in some form or other, into American institutions, in the absence of some other definite system established by law. So long as appointments were left to the personal discretion of an officer selected by universal suffrage, the spoils system was a necessary result. The vote-value of the man could not be disregarded when he sought office from those whom he had helped to power. But just so surely as the spoils system was the product of natural law, just so certain it is to-day that its abolition is a necessity born from the evils which it inflicts.

No one will deny that party government is a necessary phase of popular government. Party government in the political world exercises much the same function that competition does in the commercial world; that war does in the physical world, and that the constant struggle for existence (the strong preying upon the weak) does in the organic world. It is a part of the great development of nature through the survival of the fittest. Where all men vote, the strongest conquer at the ballot-box by essentially the same rules that armies conquer in war. The temptation is powerful to use all means lawful, or unlawful, according to the decalogue and golden rule, or against them, to defeat the enemy. In earlier times and among the lower types of humanity the love of booty was a powerful motive with the man of war. The right to despoil his enemy was never questioned. But it has gradually dawned upon the consciousness of the civilized world that this right of plunder not only inflicts unnecessary hardship upon the conquered, but that it is the greatest weakness of the conquering army. How many have been the battles lost where after the first onslaught the victorious troops, instead of securing the fruits of their victory, devoted themselves to plunder and have in their turn been overcome and despoiled! The military world recognizes to-day that the courage of the soldier must be sustained by other motives than by the hope of spoil, and that to allow an army to devote itself to plunder is to corrupt and ruin it. This is true none the less in politics than in war. In nearly every instance patronage is a source of weakness rather than strength. The number of the disappointed is always greater than the number of the successful. Even the man who receives the coveted plum is apt to prove ungrateful. The corrupting influence of plunder is such that the honor said to exist among thieves can not be trusted. President Arthur had the patronage yet he could not secure a re-nomination. President Cleveland had the patronage, yet it contributed probably more than anything else to his defeat. President Harrison has had the patronage, yet the success of the republican party in 1888 was converted in 1890 into the most disastrous defeat in its history.

The analogy between the spoils of war and the spoils of office goes further in the division of booty among chiefs and men. The share of each was determined not by what he took, but by the relative war value of the man. The chief was to have one-fifth or one-tenth of the whole; then came the greater warriors, while the common man must content himself with but little. So in politics, as we have seen, the place to which a man is entitled depends upon his political value. The man who raises or distributes a small campaign fund gets a small place, while the man who raises his hundreds of thousands may even hope for a seat in the cabinet. The small speaker in the country district may aspire to a country post-office, but the great leader, whom all men flock to hear, may perhaps become premier. The question which after all determines the office to be given and the man to have it is, how many votes is he worth? Now, it is evident that under such a system as this there is no relation of fitness between the man and the duties he is required to perform, unless those duties are political. If his duty is to guide the policy or spread the principles of his party and win votes for it, of course the best politician will be the best man for the place; but if the duties are administrative or financial, the man whose excellence lies in neither of these fields of action will very likely be a bad man for the place. In all non-political offices we are sure, under such a system, not to get the best service, but a rather poor service. Skill in managing a caucus has no relation to skill in adjusting the accounts of the treasury department. The man who can best whoop up the boys by promises of patronage is not always the best guardian of the public funds. Indeed, the particular kind of politician whose vote value is the most easily determined, and the results of whose labors are the most palpable, is generally the one who is most disqualified for responsible office.

The influences which determine the conduct of the conscientious, independent voter are not so immediately traceable to the particular action of any one man as are the votes of the venal "floaters" to the action of the man who divides them into hocks of five, or who raises the money to corrupt them. The venal politician is, upon the immediate face of things, a more valuable man than the more remote agent who convinces the intelligence. Hence he is apt to secure the better place, unless the fear of public indignation following the discovery of his methods makes his appointment impossible. So it often happens that a few votes in the convention which makes the nomination are more important than a vast number of votes at the popular election. Hence we find that the support of delegates is specially sought for by aspiring candidates and that great numbers of those who have thrown their influence for the nominee in convention are to be found among the successful aspirants for office.

Another thing which results is a political hierarchy, or as Mr. Lucius B. Swift more accurately calls it, a system of feudalism in office-holding, in which the respective rank and power of the men are often quite different from that prescribed by the constitution and laws. According to the latter, the President and members of the cabinet make the appointments according to certain statutes, the head of a department or bureau is authorized to appoint the officers who serve under him, and he is responsible for their conduct, dismissing them if they turn out to be inefficient, yet in point of fact we find that appointments are not made in any such way. A member of congress or political boss of the district or city is really the appointing power. Sometimes, like Senator Quay, he holds an office, which is often purely legislative and involving no such duty as the distribution of patronage, and sometimes, like Mr. Platt of New York, he holds no office at all.

These gentlemen, the greater barons of politics, divide their possessions among the lesser, the county chairmen and political bosses, and these again apportion their allotments among the leaders in townships and wards, who in their turn divide their little holdings among their own thralls and hustlers. In each case fealty is due, not to the head of the office nor to the government itself, but to the particular source from which the appointment comes. The result is that the men appointed, inasmuch as they do not owe their place to any qualifications for the work to be done, and do not expect to retain it by virtue of their industry or fidelity, but on account of their influence with the men who appointed them, often neglect their duties and devote themselves to political work quite inconsistent with those duties. This system has all the vices and lawlessness of feudalism, and those additional weaknesses which spring from the unstable and uncertain tenure upon which these offices are held. The men who nominally make the appointments, the head of the office or department does not dare to make removals for incompetency lest he should offend the powerful "influence" which stands behind an incompetent man. The "influence," on the other hand, cares little for the manner in which his vassal performs the duties of the office, so long as the personal and political service to himself is satisfactory. There is thus a divided responsibility, the duties are neglected, and there is nowhere any power to apply the remedy.

FEUDALISM REVIVED.

The cities of New York and Brooklyn, the former especially, have produced a political and social system which bears some resemblance to the Roman relation of patron and client, and a greater resemblance to the feudalism of the middle ages. It is a spontaneous natural growth, and bids fair in future years to play a part even more important than it exercises at present. The nucleus is an association, or club, chiefly political, partly social, numbering anywhere from 50 to 5,000 persons, and headed by a leader, an alderman or such like, who dies, or is deposed now and then, in which case the succession is not hereditary, but determined by the popular will, informally expressed. Each of these clubs is part of a still larger body, led by one man, and this larger body is, again, part of one of the two great political parties and subservient to the state boss for the time being. Boss Platt on the one hand and Governor Hill on the other are the feudal lords now at the head of the two great kingdoms or provinces, and beneath them is a regular gradation of leaders down to the ward "heeler" who haunts the liquor saloon of the local boss, and never does an honest day's work—except in the way of politics.

Of course the chief functions of these feudal bodies are primaries, caucuses, state conventions, political meetings and elections. But scarcely less important are picnics and funerals. The Post commented the other day upon the fact that two political clubs, both affiliated with Tammany Hall, had just enjoyed a maritime excursion—and in neither case was anybody murdered or even maimed—to such a degree of discipline has Tammany attained. On Friday last two more sacred politico-feudal rites were celebrated, a picnic and a funeral, one in Brooklyn, one in New York. The picnic occurred in Brooklyn, and was attended by fully 5,000 persons, belonging to the fourth senatorial district, it being the annual festival of the P. H. McCarren Association. The crowd included men, women and children, and they were entertained from 4 P. M. till the next morning—all at the expense of McCarren, the local feudatory, to whom they owe allegiance. McCarren stood at the gate of the pavilion where the picnic was held and shook the hand of every man, woman and child that entered, and kissed all the babies. Of course the people did not stream in miscellaneously—they marched in by divisions, each division constituting the local association or nucleus, already mentioned. Thus we have the "P. Donnelly Association," the "John Dunn Association," the "Hugh O'Brien Association," the "Michael J. Devine Association," and many others.

But while these festivities were transacting at Brooklyn a feudal funeral was occurring in New York, being that of John Stroubenmuller, late boss of "de Ate," i. e., the 8th assembly district. The chief interest of this occasion arose from the fact that prominence at the funeral would be a factor in the selection of a new boss. Hence a spirited rivalry among the leaders in the size of their "floral tributes." Hence, also, a contest as to who should head the procession. The New York World says that Barney Rourke sent the biggest "floral tribute." It was a wreath bearing the following inscription:

He was our friend.
Yours respectfully,
BARNEY ROURKE.

Another aspirant, F. Wolf, is said to have remarked when the wreath was borne in, "I wonder where mine is. That kid must be crawling. Ah! Here he comes." And then to the bystanders, "Now what do you think of that for a fine one? Barney's might be a little the biggest, but mine cost the most money all right enough."

But, on the whole, it is conceded that Barney Rourke profited as much by this funeral as McCarren, of Brooklyn, did by his picnic. "de Ate" has done homage to Rourke.—Boston Post.

PLATTISM.

The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and * * become his MAN from that day forth. * * Services were free and base. * * Base service was to * * carry out his dung.—[Blackstone.

—It was not long after Collector Erhardt had been in office that Platt sent in a list of about twenty names of men whom he wanted appointed to office at once. Mr. Erhardt looked it over and asked the messenger where it came from.

"From Mr. Platt," is said to have been the messenger's answer. Then the collector is reported to have said:

"It is about time that Mr. Platt learned that I am the collector of the port of New York."

"What answer shall I take back?" asked the messenger.

"Take back that answer," said the collector, referring to what he had previously said.

From that time on Platt began his warfare on Mr. Erhardt. He failed for some time to carry his point, but when Secretary Foster succeeded Mr. Windom, Platt's chances improved, and now the republican party in this state is politely told that any man who can not do the bidding of T. C. Platt must get out of office, no matter how efficient a public official he may be.—New York Times, July 30.

—It has been for and against T. C. Platt, for and against Senator Hiscock, and for and against Warner Miller. Republican voters in this county are largely anti-Platt, and a distinctively Platt candidate for any office would receive scant consideration at their hands. This hostility has grown up because of Platt's interference with and control of appointments, some of which have been most unsatisfactory. The selection of E. E. Robinson as postmaster at Ithaca and the removal of the collector's office from this city to Waverly, in Tioga county, one of Platt's henchmen receiving the commission, produced deep feeling which found open expression of decided dissent. The collection district is Tompkins, Tioga, and Schuyler, Tompkins county furnishing greater revenue than the other two combined, and the change of location is regarded here as an outrage. The Ithaca postmastership is a mere sinecure, the official being a telegraph operator at the Lehigh Valley Railroad station, who sometimes appears at the post-office in the latter part of the day. As regards the performance of any duty to compensate for his large salary, he might as well be a resident of Alaska. His appointment was secured by T. C. Platt and John W. Dwight of Dryden, in this county, in defiance of an earnest protest sent to Washington signed by many republicans of the highest character and most pronounced political views, but this protest was entirely disregarded. This parceling out of offices in this locality has produced a deep feeling of dissatisfaction, which probably will appear in the canvass.—Ithaca, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, August 29.

—The republican county convention met in Ithaca, September 5. Postmaster E. E. Robinson, who is employed by the United States government at a salary of $3,000 a year to keep an eye on the post-office when not engaged in his regular business, despatching trains on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, at once assumed control of the convention. For some reason, probably to discourage the attendance of too many spectators, those who had charge of the matter had furnished only about the requisite number of seats to accommodate the delegates.

The postmaster called attention to the fact that many of the seats intended for delegates were occupied by spectators and requested that they should be vacated to make room for delegates who were standing. * * * The postmaster thought the debate had proceeded far enough, and producing that well-known weapon used in debate—which ex-farmer Enz is responsible for introducing into republican county conventions—he moved the previous question, which was promptly carried and Counselor Baker was crushed again, and with him the young republican orator who had the temerity to say something about the question which he was trying to debate.

The vote on the postmaster's motion revealed the strength of the machine, and it was apparent that Almy would receive the nomination for county judge, which he did on the first formal ballot, his vote being 64, or ten more than the number required. * * * After which the postmaster adjourned his convention.—Ithaca (N. Y.) Democrat, September 10.

—The enrolled republicans of Brooklyn and the Kings county towns held their primaries yesterday for the election of delegates to the various assembly conventions to-morrow night. The object of the latter is the election of delegates to the state convention to be held Sept. 9. Every effort had been made to bring about a harmonious feeling among the local leaders before the voting began yesterday, but it was successful only in those wards where a fight would have been of no consequence.

Wherever the party is in a position to distribute anything there was a struggle for control. The most serious fight was that between State Committeeman Thomas A. McWhinney and Assemblyman Joseph Aspinall in the twenty-first ward. Aspinall represented Ernst Nathan, whose chief desire now is to remove McWhinney and replace him by Charles J. Dunwell.

When the voters began to arrive they found several thousand copies of a circular in which "Boss" Nathan was attacked most viciously as a man who stabbed in the back every candidate whom he could not manage. It was pointed out that he had given Blaine very few votes in his ward in 1884 and had knifed the assembly candidate the following year. The circular continued:

"The anti-Nathan ticket stands unpledged to any man. This is not a fight against Charles T. Dunwell personally, but only because he is being used by Mr. Nathan to advance Nathan's ambition to become a supreme boss.

"The power of Internal Revenue Collector Nathan over those having official business with his office is well-known and realized by every dealer in spirits, tobacco and cigars, and he appears to be attempting to press them into his service for his own political advancement and against the action of the republican association of the ward. He is spending nearly every evening in the ward, superintending the canvass and pressing the button, and subordinates from his office are exceedingly active there. A circular has been issued to the Nathan ring containing the names of many gentlemen who will vote the regular ticket, and to swell the numbers some of the names have been repeated. It may be difficult to forecast the result, but many protest against this attempted 'bossism,' and the result of the 'button pressing' may have the same effect as it had upon our candidate for congress last year."—New York Times, September 2.

—The republican primaries in Jefferson county have left the party in anything but a happy and united condition. The expenditure of about $3,000 by one candidate to secure delegates to a district convention created the impression that the county is becoming one of the most corrupt in the state.

The work of federal office-holders who left their official duties to work the caucuses has awakened honest people to a sense of their obligations to the state, and it is not unlikely that charges will be preferred against the head of the Cape Vincent custom-house and some of his subordinates.—Watertown, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, August 29.

—After a factional fight, the most exciting in the history of Onondaga county politics, the Hiscock-Hendricks faction to-day won the first battle in the contest to retain control of the state senatorship for the Onondaga and Cortland district. They captured by a substantial majority the city caucuses which elected delegates to the senatorial convention to be held next Saturday. The results of the caucuses held throughout the district make it certain that Assemblyman Rufus T. Peck, of Cortland, will be nominated for state senator.

The struggle to capture the senatorship in the interest of Senator Hiscock has been, according to republican authority, the most disgraceful ever waged in the district. The leading candidates were Assemblyman Howard G. White, of Onondaga, and Assemblyman Rufus T. Peck, of Cortland. Peck is a gillie of Senator Francis Hendricks, and the senator has in person led the fight for him, assisted by the various leaders of the Hiscock faction, with the United States Senator himself as director general of the campaign. Senator Hiscock himself hurried home from his trip to the far west to rally his forces and fight for Peck's nomination.

The Cortland county caucuses were held last week and sent a delegation, practically salted for Peck, to the senatorial convention. This result, it is claimed by the Standard (republican), was accomplished by the most corrupt and disgraceful methods ever put into practice in the district. It is openly charged that votes for delegates were purchased outright by the most lavish use of money, and that no less than $4,000 was spent to corrupt the voters and purchase Peck delegates.

Having carried the Cortland caucuses the Hiscock-Hendricks faction set about to defeat the will of the republicans of Onondaga by adopting the same methods which had prevailed in Cortland. At the republican caucuses held in the town of De Witt, men who had received favors at the hands of Senator Hiscock were forced into the fight. The senator's brother, Charles Hiscock, who holds a fat position in the United States revenue office, led the force.

Eugene Bogardus and G. C. Ferris, both of whom have sons in the assayer's office in New York at large salaries, were also actively fighting for the Hiscock candidate. The sheriff's office also took a hand in the fight, and the sons of county postmasters tramped the town to help the Hiscock men carry the caucuses.

Hiscock, since his return from the west, has made frequent visits to New York to confer with Platt, and Platt emissaries from Oswego and elsewhere have been here and taken a hand in the senatorial contest. Peck is not the choice of the business men of Cortland for senator. He carried Cortland for the assembly last year by less than 100 votes, and is the most unpopular man in the district.—Syracuse Dispatch to the New York Times, September 4.

—Mr. Coykendall is with Platt, and his influence dominated the conventions in the second and third assembly districts and that of the first district to the extent of bringing about the selection of ex-Member of Congress James G. Lindsley, and County Judge A. T. Clearwater. Charles Davis, one of the first district delegates, is a friend of Sharpe, and Christopher G. James, another delegate, is employed in the New York city post office. It is believed by some that Sharpe is with Platt, because Platt sanctioned his appointment in the appraiser's office in New York city after Senator Hiscock had recommended him to the President.—Kingston (N. Y.) Dispatch to New York Times, September 4.

—The republican primary elections, at which delegates were chosen to the republican state convention, were held in all the assembly districts of this city yesterday. Frederick Leffson, president of a German organization, telegraphed to Collector Fassett that deputy collector Wilson Berryman was working around the polls. Berryman was at his desk when the collector received the message, but he subsequently asked for a "day off," to be charged against his vacation, and Mr. Fassett remembering his own work at Horseheads, granted it to him. Mr. Berryman went back to the seventeenth district polling place and looked out for the interest of the regulars.—New York Times, September 4.

—But another thing that the primaries have settled is that a complaint is to be made to the federal authorities in regard to Internal Revenue Collector Nathan's pernicious activity in local politics. His office is being run as a political machine. The subordinates have been working in this third senatorial fight with great vigor, and all their efforts have been directed to inducing republicans to vote against Senator Birkett. It is said that a list of over one hundred men who have been importuned by these subordinates of the collector has been drawn up and will be sent to President Harrison. One of Nathan's men was an inspector at the recent twenty-first ward primary, and he was ordered to New Jersey by the department on the day of the primary and kept there until just before it opened.

Then it was discovered that he had the official roll book in his pocket, and that his absence was designed to prevent the opposition from having the names of thirty-five recently elected members placed on the roll, thereby enabling them to vote. This trick was rendered worthless by the granting of a mandamus by Judge Osborne, under which the votes were received. But it is an example, and a very fair one, of the way an important federal office is being used to advance the fortunes of a local party boss.—New York Times, September 6.

—The Evening Post's correspondent met Collector of Internal Revenue Nathan in Power's Hotel this morning and asked him whom the Kings county delegation would support for governor. "Our first choice," he replied, "is General Stewart L. Woodford."

"And who next?"

"Andrew D. White."

"How does your delegation feel towards Collector Fassett?"

"Very favorably."

"In the event of a contest between ex-Minister White and Senator Fassett whom would your delegation support?"

"That would have to be determined. The Kings county delegation will work in harmony with the New York delegation. We shall be a unit in the convention."—Rochester Dispatch to New York Evening Post, September 7.

—It has been reported within the last few days that Frederick S. Gibbs is to be the regular republican candidate for assemblyman in the thirteenth district and that he would have the support of ex-Senator Platt and the republican county organizations. A reporter for The Evening Post learned that such is not the case: that if Gibbs should be nominated by his alleged "regular" organization in the thirteenth, the county leaders will not recognize him as the party's candidate, will not contribute to his support, and, in all likelihood, will see to it that the Cowie people place a candidate in the field against him.

Although the Gibbs delegation was seated in the county committee, Gibbs was not recognized as the regular leader of the district. He had a number of men appointed to places in the custom-house during Col. Erhardt's regime, but has had none since Mr. Fassett went into office. It is stated by an excellent authority that when Collector Fassett begins the weeding out process the Gibbs men will be the first to go; that no democrat will be touched until after the Gibbs people have gone. Gibbs very recently succeeded in obtaining a place for one of his followers in the custodian's department in the post-office. The giving of that place, it is stated, led to a very warm interview between ex-Senator Platt and Postmaster Van Cott, and it is understood that the appointee will be removed as soon as the state convention is over.—New York Evening Post, September 7.

—The general sentiment seems to be summed up in the words of John E. Brodsky to your correspondent: "We'll give all the candidates a show on the first ballot; then the whole business will go for Fassett." Brodsky proclaimed further, with a chuckle, that the New York City delegation was going to start off in the convention with a vote for "that great and good man, Andrew D. White."

Thomas C. Platt has been known for many years as a grim joker. According to appearances this morning he is carrying out the grimmest joke of his life. He sits in his parlor in Power's Hotel, declaring vehemently to all visitors that he is for Andrew D. White, first, last, and all the time, and eulogizing in the most earnest way the ex-President of Cornell. But all the time his lieutenants are down stairs, preparing for the nomination of his chief lieutenant, Fassett. This idea appears to be to give the impression that he thinks Mr. White is the best man, and that he will not desert him until a great wave of enthusiasm for Fassett sweeps away all other candidates. If the wave turns up on schedule time, the boss will probably shed a public tear for the Ithaca statesman, and declare that he could not prevent Fassett's nomination.

The little comedy is very amusing to the delegates who are here. They know that until Platt arrived yesterday morning there was a general doubt as to the nominations, and that within ten hours after his arrival the name of Fassett was on everybody's tongue. Delegates who came here shouting for their local candidate grew silent and all at once came to the conclusion that Fassett might be more available.—Rochester Dispatch to New York Evening Post, September 8.

"No officer should be required or permitted to take part in the arrangement of political organizations, caucuses, conventions, or election campaigns. Their right to vote and to express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessment for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed."—President Hayes, June 22, 1877.

—Big and little federal office holders have been jostling one another in the hotel corridors ever since this convention began to pull itself together. The two most conspicuous ornaments of this office-holding array were, of course, Thomas C. Platt, member of the commission for the location of a government dock in Washington, and the collector of the port of New York, Mr. Fassett.

Only a single instance is known where the chief of a department gave his subordinates to understand that it would be better policy for them to remain at home than to come to Rochester. Naval Officer Theodore Willis is understood to have conveyed some such hint to his men, and the Brooklyn men in his department appear to have generally observed it. Some of the more important place-holders who were here are the following:

Thomas C. Platt.

J. Sloat Fassett, collector of the port of New York.

Ernst Nathan, collector of internal revenue for the Brooklyn district.

John W. Jacobus, marshal of the southern district of New York.

John E. Milholland, inspector of emigration at the port of New York and press agent for the Platt aggregation.

Denis Shea, deputy collector in Mr. Fassett's office.

John H. Gunner, of New York, deputy collector in Mr. Fassett's office.

John Collins, of New York, deputy collector in the collector's office.

Gen. Michael Kerwin, of New York, collector of internal revenue.

Ferdinand Eidman, of New York, collector of internal revenue.

Robert H. Hunter, collector of internal revenue for the Poughkeepsie district.

Barney Bigliu, baggage contractor at Castle Garden.

Jesse Johnson, district attorney for the Brooklyn district.

Col. Archie E. Baxter, of Elmira, marshal for the northern district.

Henry Flood, postmaster of Elmira, and contesting delegate from Mr. Fassett's own town.

Jonas S. Van Duzer, postmaster of Horseheads and also a contestant from Mr. Fassett's county.

William B. Morgan, collector of the port of Buffalo.

James Low, collector of customs at Suspension Bridge.

Charles E. Fitch, ex editor of the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle and collector of internal revenue for western New York.

John E. Smith, of Morrisville, Madison county, assistant district attorney, with headquarters at Syracuse, and a candidate for the nomination of state senator against Titus Sheard.

Mynders E. Van Cliff, of Ithaca, commissioner of the circuit court.

James Miller, postmaster of Utica.

Gen. Reynolds, postmaster of Rochester.

Carroll E. Smith, postmaster of Syracuse and editor of the Syracuse Journal.

R. M. Ritchie, postmaster of Saratoga Springs.

George W. Dunn, postmaster of Binghamton.

Leonard Groesbeck, of Troy, United States bank examiner.

Amos Roberts, postmaster of Addison, Stenben Co.

Horace E. Morse, collector of customs at Cape Vincent, Jefferson county.

—Rochester Dispatch to New York Times, Sept. 9.

—Mr. J. Slee, of Elmira, the speaker for the anti-Fassett Chemung delegates, was given the first opportunity to speak.

He charged that the republican county committee of Chemung was in the hand of the contestants opponents, who did not hesitate to use every means, lawful and unlawful, to run the primaries to suit their selfish ends. He said there was not the slightest doubt that, barring the fact that pistols and knives were not used by the Fassett people, their methods were the most disgraceful ever witnessed in the county. Mr. Fassett, he said, repeatedly honored by the people of Chemung, had betrayed the confidence of his constituents and bulldozed them in the hope of making them support his line of action. There was a feeling in Chemung so intense against this system of party rule, that unless some rebuke was administered at this committee's hands, a wrong would be done to the republicans of the county that would result disastrously to the party in November.

The contestants, he claimed, after a fair fight secured 100 votes out of 186. The only convention was called for August 15. On August 14 the county committee, made up of Fassett men, decided to admit no one to the convention who was unprovided with a ticket. Tickets were not given to the anti-Fassett men until fifteen minutes after the hour for the convention to open. Under the circumstances, they were obliged to hold a convention of their own and elect delegates.

Col. Archie E. Baxter, United States Marshal, representing the Fassett crowd, consumed twenty minutes in replying to this arraignment. He was frequently interrupted by the members of the contesting delegation, and they asked him some awkward questions. He insisted that if democratic money had been kept out of the county, Fassett would have won in every town. This is a proposition that makes men smile who know the facts. Dr. Henry Flood, postmaster of Elmira, refuted the charge.—Rochester Dispatch to New York Times, September 9.

—The fact is that the business of the convention was cut and dried for it. The only question is, how long ago Platt wrote out the slate. The best informed politicians say that he arranged for the business of last night several months ago, when he put Fassett into the custom-house, made him a quasi New York city man, and thereby secured the 133 votes of the New York city delegation. All the evidence is in this direction. Without New York city's solid vote there might have been more than one ballot last night, and it was pretty clear that if a struggle for the nomination was entered into by even a second ballot, Fassett would find opposed to him a combination which he could not defeat.—Rochester Dispatch to New York Post, September 10.

—The news of the appointment of Senator Hendricks as collector was no surprise at the custom-house, nor did it cause disappointment among those whose tenure of office was rendered secure by the resignation of Col. Erhardt. Everybody regarded Hendricks as Fassett's natural successor. Hendricks is Hiscock's chief local lieutenant in Syracuse, and Hiscock is Platt's right-hand man. Therefore, it was thought Hendricks would carry out the party plans arranged by Fassett, that is, a clean sweep of democrats, and the running of the custom-house on the Platt spoils system.—New York Evening Post, September 17.

PLATTISM AT LARGE.

—Colonel Webster Flanagan, who put the famous question, "What are we here for," at the republican national convention, 1880, has had the question very satisfactorily answered for him by President Harrison. He is now collector of customs at El Paso, Texas. Flanagan has the reputation of being a very active politician of the sort who believe that there would be no use of the spoils if they were not for the victors, and that there would be few victories without the spoils. He is a power in Texas republican politics, and his appointment is looked upon as a shrewd move by Mr. Harrison to obtain a firm hold on the Texas delegation at the next republican national convention.

Cunie, the colored leader, who is collector at Galveston, was not a personal friend of the President's. He has always been an admirer of Mr. Blaine, and Flanagan is said to be the only man in the state who can dispute his control of the republican political machine. While it is believed that Cunie would be loyal to Harrison under ordinary circumstances, it is not thought that anything would prevent his supporting Blaine if he is in the field. Flanagan, on the other hand, is not a Blaine man, but has been for Sherman and is now for Harrison. It is believed by friends of Mr. Harrison that, backed by the administration, he could take the state conventions away from Cunie if the latter turned against the administration, and it is said that this consideration entered into his selection to succeed Collector Clark at El Paso.—Boston Post, September 5.

CHARGES WITHOUT APPARENT FOUNDATION.

Lucius B. Swift, Esq., Indianapolis, Ind.:

DEAR SIR: I received your letter enclosing the following cutting from the Brookville American of July 25, it being a quotation from the Delphi Journal:

The circumstances surrounding the cases of the two democrats from this city who have been appointed under this so-called civil service law since the Cleveland administration turned up its toes to the daisies, bear some very suspicious marks of favoritism. In each of these cases a civil service examination was passed, but it was a mere excuse, for "the pull" of a friend did the rest. Let the average republican worker ask for a place, and his qualifications and recommendations are consigned to the impenetrable gloom of the civil service lists. But the democrats from this county are more fortunate. The examination is passed, and "a friend" who has influence at court steps up and "fixes" the whole thing, and the appointment is made. And this demonstrates that this civil service business is hypocritical and fraudulent; sort of a family affair, a channel by which particular pets and favorites, democrats who have a "pull," float gracefully into the promised land, while the ordinary republican eats grass in the fence corner.

The article asserts that under the present administration there have been two, and but two, appointments from Delphi, Carroll county, and practically states that the civil service examinations under which these candidates were appointed were fraudulent. This last statement is simply and purely a baseless slander. During the time of my service as commissioner, that is, during the last two years and a half, there have been, as far as our records show, but two appointments from Carroll county, and these, I presume, are the two appointments referred to. One was that of Clay M. McClure, who was appointed as a junior draughtsman in the supervising architect's office of the treasury department on March 19 last. The other was that of Mrs. Rachel A. Crawford, who was appointed a book-keeper in the treasury department on July 1 last.

Mrs. Crawford passed the difficult book-keeper's examination with an average of 87 per cent. At the time of her appointment, she was the highest on the woman's register, and, more than that, her average was higher than that of any other person on the same register for the last four years.

Mr. McClure passed the much more difficult and highly technical junior draughtsman examination with what is for that examination the good average of 75 per cent. At the time of his appointment there were a number of men on the draughtsman register. Every one of these who stood above him was appointed before he was, with one exception, the exception being that of a man who was already in the treasury department in another capacity, and who had previously been in the supervising architect's office, as I am informed. It is presumed, therefore, that for some reason that office did not wish him back.

The examination papers of both Mr. McClure and Mrs. Crawford are on file in our office and can be examined at once by any responsible person. If the editor of the Delphi Journal or the Brookville American or any one else can make out the slightest prima facie case of fraud in either the examination or the marking or the grading or the certification or the final appointment of these two candidates, not only will the commission immediately investigate the matter, but will also call for its investigation by the secretary of the treasury, and at the investigation made by the commission the gentlemen making the charge of fraud can themselves be present, either personally or by representatives, and can examine all the books of the commission, as well as the two candidates themselves.

To advance a charge of fraud, without also showing a sound basis of justification for it, is to commit an act no less cowardly than infamous. It seems to me that the article in the Delphi Journal, quoted in the Brookville American, is itself good evidence of how faithfully the law is being observed. It shows, assuming that its statements as to the politics of the two persons appointed are true, that democrats have precisely as good a chance as republicans under the law, and that no amount of "pull" will help a man if he is unable to win his place honestly and fairly on his own merits. The Delphi Journal has unwittingly paid a compliment of the highest character to the law and its administration, and as a strong republican I feel particularly pleased at the evidence thus unconsciously given to the effect that in the administration of the civil service law the republican party is keeping the pledge of the national platform.

Very respectfully,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Washington, D. C.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

Noah W. Pierson testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) State your full name, Mr. Pierson. A. Noah W. Pierson.

Q. What is your position in the post-office? A. I am assistant engineer.

Q. How long have you been in the service? A. I have been here about a year and two months.

Q. Appointed by Postmaster Johnson? A. Appointed by the eustodian.

Q. By Mr. Johnson as custodian of the office? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Pierson, understand that there is nothing affecting you at all in any question we put to you; it doesn't affect you in the least as far as we now know; it is simply a matter of observation of the law in certain particulars by others, not by you. Do you know anything of the collection or contribution of any funds for political purposes at this time? A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know anything about the collection of $5 apiece, or the attempted collection of $5 apiece from a number of employes of the post-office, or of the postmaster as custodian, for primary purposes? A. No, sir.

Q. You have never known of any that you know anything about? A. No, sir.

Q. You don't know of anyone having paid any sum or having been asked to pay any sum for political purposes recently? A. No, sir.

Q. And specifically with reference to the primaries on Monday next? A. No, sir; I don't know anything about it.

Q. You know nothing about it at all? A. No, sir.

Q. And you have never been approached by anyone who asked you if such and such a man had paid? A. No, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) You understand that neither Mr. Roosevelt nor I know anything about this matter, except that certain reports have been brought him, and he asked me as president of the local civil service reform association to come down here and assist him in the investigation of them. Now, has any officer in this building, either under the postmaster as eustodian or the postmaster as postmaster asked you whether anybody else had contributed to the primaries?

Witness. These primaries coming?

Mr. Bonaparte. Yes, sir.

A. No, sir.

Q. Well, having inquired of you, has anybody in the service inquired of you whether some one else had contributed in any way to any fund to be used in this republican contest? A. No, sir.

Q. Now supposing some officer here has reported that you had told him that other officers in the building had contributed to this, that officer has not told the truth then? A. No, sir; the man that reported that didn't tell the truth.

Q. Have you collected any money from any one else yourself for these primaries? A. No, sir.

Q. Have you told any one, any officer in the building here, that you had collected any money? A. No, sir. This is unexpected to me, you know, gentlemen, and I am answering right off. Of course, I haven't had any time to think, you know.

Q. Of course, we understand that, and we would like you to think pretty carefully, because we don't want to do anybody any injustice. A. No, sir.

Q. Think carefully if you have been approached by any officer employed in this building with the inquiry as to whether anybody else had contributed to the primaries, or to anything of that sort? A. Not to my knowledge; I can't call any to mind just now.

Q. Has anybody connected with the building, or having an office in this building, asked you whether you yourself had contributed or whether you had collected contributions? A. No, sir.

Q. And you are quite positive you have never told any one anything from which they could understand that you were collecting contributions? A. Yes, sir; I am positive that I have never told any one that I was collecting contributions; I don't know anything about it.

Q. And that you never told any one connected with the service in any way that anybody else connected with it was contributing? A. No, sir.

Q. So that if any officer in this building has made a report to Mr. Roosevelt to the effect that certain other officers were collecting contributions or promoting their collections, and that they knew something about it, that officer has not told the truth? A. Well, of course, I don't want to say that he didn't tell the truth; he might be mistaken.

Q. I mean, that it wasn't so? A. It wasn't so if he made a report of it; yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Are you a republican in politics? A. I am; yes, sir.

Q. And actively identified with the republican party? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Identified with one of the organizations here in the city, a republican organization or a republican club, or whatever you choose to call them? A. Yes, sir; I belong to one of the republican clubs.

Q. What republican club are you a member of? A. The Active Club, they call it. It is down in the First ward; it is a ward organization.

Q. Are there going to be primary elections next Monday? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there going to be a contest between two republican factions? A. Well it looks that way, sir.

Q. It looks that way. Do you take an active part in this contest or not? A. Well, no; I don't think it is my place to take an active part.

Q. You don't think it is the place of any government employe to take an active part; is that your idea? A. No, sir. I think it is his place to go and vote his sentiments and then go away.

Q. But you don't think it is the place of any government employe to stand around the polls and work for one faction or the other; hold tickets and so fourth? A. No, sir. I don't think there is anything like that going on there.

Q. Precisely. Do you know if the post-office employes, as a whole, sympathize with one or the other of these factions? A. I don't know.

Q. Or are they divided? A. Well, from rumors; that is all I can go by.

Q. Certainly. It is simply a matter of common notoriety. What do you hear? A. There seems to be a little difference of opinion.

Q. Well, are there two factions in the republican party here in Baltimore that are going to contest in the primaries on Monday? A. Not that I know of, sir.

Q. What will the fight be on? A. The fight will be this: These people in our ward—I only take my ward for instance—they want to send one delegate to the convention, and the men that I favor on, they want to send another, that is the sum total.

Q. But what are the difference between the two factions; is one of the factions identified with Postmaster Johnson? A. Well, not that I know of.

Q. Not that you know of? A. No, sir; I don't know anything about that.

AFTERNOON.

Noah W. Pierson, recalled.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) We want to be clear in order that we don't do anybody any injustice in this matter. Do I recollect you to have testified this morning that you didn't have any conversation with anybody on the subject of the payments of assessments of employes here? I don't mean to use that term; I should say contributions towards the expenses of the primaries.

Witness. How is that?

Q. Didn't you tell us this morning that you hadn't had any conversation with anybody on the subject of the payment of contributions by any employe of the post-office? A. Yes, sir.

Q. That you didn't have any conversation with John F. Thomas? I think we asked you that particularly? A. No, sir; you didn't ask me that.

Q. Well, I will ask you now. Did you have any conversation with Mr. John F. Thomas, the superintendent of the registry division about that?

Witness. What do you mean?

Mr. Bonaparte. About certain employes of the post-office giving money for the expenses of the primaries?

A. Well, I was talking to Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Thomas told me that Mr. Hammond had told him that Ashton had given me $5 for the primaries.

Q. That Ashton gave you $5 for the primaries? Well, now, what more passed between Mr. Thomas and yourself? A. Mr. Thomas told me to go down and see Mr. Ashton and ask him for that money he promised to pay.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Mr. Thomas told you to go down and see Mr. Ashton and ask him for the money? A. That was after we had the conversation.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Did you go? A. I went down and asked Mr. Ashton if he had ever given me any money for the primaries, and he said, no.

* * * * *

James Wilson, colored, testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What is your position? A. I am a laborer.

Q. Under Postmaster Johnson as custodian of the post-office building? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been so employed? A. I have been here about six months.

Q. Were you appointed by Postmaster Johnson? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. C. B. Johnson, of South Bethel street? A. No, sir; I don't know him.

Q. Or Mr. R. H. Harris, of 314 South Caroline street? A. Yes, sir; now I know who you mean by C. H. Johnson.

Q. Then you know C. H. Johnson, of South Bethel street, and R. H. Harris, of South Caroline street? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do both of these gentlemen take a more or less active interest in local politics? A. Yes, sir; they have in the last primary.

Q. They live in the third ward? A. Yes, sir.

Q. There are going to be primary elections next Monday, are there not? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there going to be a contest in the primaries? A. Yes, sir; I judge so, from the looks of things. There is one polling place.

Q. There is going to be a contest in the primaries then? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of course I am speaking of the republican party; you are a republican yourself, are you? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you a member of any republican organization? A. I am of the district association, yes, sir.

Q. Well, in the third ward there seems likely to be a contest? A. They appear to seem like it; yes, sir.

Q. Acting under that committee? A. Yes, sir. It seems like the colored element goes with Mr. Johnson.

Q. Well, go on. A. And the principal part of the other element, which is called the Henderson faction, are taking their hands off.

Q. There are two factions here? A. Yes, sir.

Q. One called the Johnson faction? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the other called the Henderson faction? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the fight on Monday next is going to be between these two factions? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the Johnson faction has for its heads Postmaster Johnson and Marshal Airey? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, does the fight bid fair to be a pretty bitter one next Monday? A. It seems so.

Q. At one time in the third ward it looked as if the colored element was going to be against the Johnson faction? A. Not the majority of them, but a portion of them.

Q. A portion of them? A. Yes, sir.

Q. But now that has been gotten right, and it looks as if they would all go for the postmaster? Q. Yes, sir.

Q. At one time were these two men, C. H. Johnson and R. H. Harris, going to go on the ticket opposed to the postmaster? A. I don't know whether they were going to go on the ticket or not.

Q. But they were going to oppose him? A. Yes, sir; they were the head parties.

Q. Of the opposition to him? A. Yes, sir; among the colored?

Q. Well, I suppose you are friendly to Postmaster Johnson? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you went to Mr. C. H. Johnson and Mr. R. H. Harris and asked them to come up here and see the postmaster? A. I asked them to come up and see Dr. Weaver.

Q. Did you take them up here yourself? A. They didn't come at all.

Q. You simply asked them to come and they didn't come? A. Yes, sir; that is right.

Q. Did they see Postmaster Johnson at all or any one connected with the office then? A. No, sir.

Q. Then they just changed of their own accord? A. Yes, sir; through me.

Q. You persuaded them to change? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Who is this Dr. Weaver that you asked them to come and see? A. He is the assistant custodian.

Q. Of this building? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And this Mr. Johnson is a cousin of his, this Mr. C. H. Johnson? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) And Dr. Weaver is a colored man, the assistant custodian? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) And you asked him to come up and have a talk with his cousin, but he didn't come. A. He didn't come.

Q. Do you feel pretty sure that he didn't see anybody connected with the office? A. Pretty sure, sir; I can tell you the reason why; these gentlemen are all friends of mine.

Q. That is what we understand. A. Yes, sir; they are all friends of mine; and, well, a gentleman by the name of Jacob H. Seaton is in our ward, a colored gentleman, a leader, gentlemen, he is down there, and him and I got to talking to these gentlemen, and he showed them where it was to my interest to fight for this faction.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) To your interest? A. Yes, sir.

Q. The leader of the ward showed Messrs. Johnson and Harris where it was for your interest that they should fight for this faction? A. Yes, sir; that they should fight for this faction.

Q. For fear it would jeopardize your position here? A. Yes, sir; certainly. He told them it was to my interest to vote this way, and as they were friends of mine they said they were willing to support people that had supported the colored people, and that Mr. Johnson done that, but they didn't say they were going to vote that way, but they would take their hands off for my benefit.

Q. For your benefit? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) When you say they took their hands off you mean that they were thinking of running as delegates on the other side? A. I know they was with the other faction at the last primary election.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) They were the leaders on the Henderson side, and it being shown to them that it would be to your interest to cease their opposition to the Johnson faction they agreed to do so? A. Yes, sir; they agreed to do so.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Were you present when Mr. Seaton had this talk with them? A. We had a ward meeting.

Q. And Mr. Seaton explained the matter? A. Yes, sir; Mr. Seaton explained the matter in the meeting.

Q. When was that ward meeting? A. That was last Monday night.

Q. Can you recollect in general terms what Seaton said then? A. No, I don't recollect everything he said, but he explained the situation, and explained my situation, and how my appointment was made, and all.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) How is your appointment made? A. Well, my appointment was made through the people in my ward. I was a favorite with the people, with both sides; both factions favored me.

Q. Both the Henderson and the Johnson people? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the Henderson and the Johnson leaders recommended your appointment? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you were appointed on the recommendation of the colored republican element of your ward? A. Yes, sir; the colored element in that ward.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) You are pretty sure then that this explanation of Mr. Seaton to these friends of yours, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Harris, was the cause of their going out of this contest? A. Here's what the gentlemen said to me; I have been friendly with all of them ever since I have been there at work, and I was trying to persuade these gentlemen, as they said they were favorite to me and wanted me to have the appointment, both sides of the question, and ever since I have been here I have been urging them to support me, because I didn't want no split in our ward.

Q. You didn't? A. No, sir. Until last fall it seems as if this Mr. Baumgartner down there, the state central committee man, he has been kicking down there for quite a while. Well, he goes around and get a lot of the colored young men down there—lots of them had been voting the democratic ticket—and he calls a meeting, and at this meeting he invites these gentlemen, this Mr. Harris and Mr. Johnson, they came around there and got into this meeting; they heard it was going to be and they went there and captured the meeting, and they made the leading people in it.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Was this a Henderson meeting? A. Yes, sir; well Henderson started it.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) You say ever since you have been employed here you have been urging them to support you? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Well, there was, I suppose, some money collected for the primaries? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had this Mr. Seaton had anything to do with the collecting it? A. No, sir.

Q. Had either of these other two anything to do with it? A. Harris and Johnson? No, sir; they had nothing to do with it.

Q. Nothing at all? A. No, sir.

Q. Now have you any idea who did contribute to the expenses down there? A. Well, there is some gentlemen who was office-holders.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Certainly; the office-holders? A. Yes, sir; we had a meeting to ourselves, you understand.

Q. The office-holders had a meeting themselves to contribute? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Now, were Mr. Harris or Mr. Johnson present at that meeting? A. No, sir.

Q. Was this confined to the office holders; was anybody else there except people who were in office? A. That was all.

Q. About how many of you were there? A. There was about 7 of us.

Q. About 7 office-holders; there are that many in this ward? A. Oh, my; there is 14.

Q. The other 7 didn't come? A. No, sir; they wasn't there; I think they sent the money.

Q. Do you know who they sent it to? A. Well, we made a treasurer, you know, amongst ourselves; in fact, gave it to one gentleman to keep the money.

Q. All of these people who attended the meeting gave it to one of themselves, one of their own number? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are pretty sure they didn't give it to either Mr. Harris or Mr. Johnson? A. No, sir.

Q. Who was it they gave it to? A. A gentleman by the name of Mr. Martin.

Q. Is he a colored man? A. No, sir; he is a white man.

Q. Is he employed in this building? A. I think he is; yes, sir.

Q. In what capacity? A. I think he is a letter carrier; I think he is.

Q. From what ward; the third ward? A. Yes, sir; the third ward.

Q. Now, you are pretty certain that neither Mr. Harris nor Mr. Johnson or this old gentleman, Mr.

Seaton, had nothing to do with collecting any money? A. Nothing at all; no, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What is the first name of Mr. Martin? A. Henry Martin, I think.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) He is a letter carrier from the third ward? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect when this meeting was held? A. I think it was last Saturday a week.

* * * * *

Q. And when you had agreed among yourselves what you ought to give on that occasion, you gave it to one of your own number, and not to an outsider? A. Yes, sir, one of our own number.

Q. You are pretty sure of that? A. Yes, sir, pretty sure.

Q. Now you are pretty certain that none of the office-holders from the third ward, so far as you know of, gave $5 apiece to any outsider? A. No, sir; I am pretty sure of that.

Q. Was $5 the amount they were each to give? A. That was it; yes, sir.

Q. You have already answered it two or three times, but I will ask you the question again; you are quite sure that neither Mr. Harris nor Mr. Johnson had anything to do with getting $5 for anybody? A. No, sir; I don't believe they would accept $100 if it were offered to them by any one.

Q. This money that you raised in that way, it wasn't intended to buy votes with, was it? A. No, sir; it was just spread in the ward to pay ticket-holders.

Q. And to have tickets printed and so forth, I judge? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And for what other expenses was it? A. That is the only expenses; printing tickets and ticket-holders.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What are the ticket-holders? A. They get $2 apiece.

Q. You pay the ticket-holders? A. Yes, sir; for working, helping to poll the vote.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Was either of these men, Johnson or Harris, employed as a ticket-holder, do you remember; are they going to be employed as ticket holders? A. No, sir, they are not.

Q. The ticket holders you have, I suppose, will belong to your faction? A. Some of them have voted with the others in the last primary.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) But they will vote with you now? A. Yes, sir; they come of their own consent.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) And this money which you raised was raised from among the office-holders? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was given to one of your own number, and it was intended to be used in the regular expenses of the primary? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now we want to get this pretty straight, so that we can bring it back on the person who is guilty. You didn't give your $5 to Mr. Johnson or Mr. Harris, that you say positively? A. No, sir.

Q. You did give it to Mr. Henry Martin? A. Yes, sir, one of our number.

Q. Now you say there was a man connected with the elevator; what is his name? A. His name is Mr. Mitchell.

Q. You don't know his first name? A. No, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Is he a white man or a colored man? A. He is a white man.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Did you see him pay his money? A. No, sir; I didn't see him pay his; he told me he gave it to this Mr. Martin.

Q. You have no doubt about him telling you the truth about that? A. Well, he showed me $5 one night, and the next morning he told me he gave it to Mr. Martin. You see we didn't give the money the first time we had a meeting.

Q. You didn't? A. No, sir; that was afterwards. Some of them were willing to give it then and didn't give it. Of course I didn't have mine at that time.

Q. Do you recollect who were willing to give it at that time? A. I don't think any one gave it, but we all agreed upon it.

Q. And now you have given us your name and Mr. Mitchell's, the elevator man, and you have mentioned one or two others. You mentioned the name of Mr. Glass? A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was his first name? A. I think his name was Mr. Harry Glass.

Q. He is a letter carrier? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any reason to know he gave his money to Mr. Martin, or gave it to somebody else? A. He told me he gave it to Mr. Martin.

The genesis of the mugwump is that he first becomes better than his party, and next better than his country. The teachings of the mugwumps for the past five or six years have been for the purpose and to the result of stifling enthusiasm and encouraging indifference. We want to remove this sort of dry rot, and bring republicanism back to its old-time force of warm blood, fearlessness and uncompromising courage, and to educate every young man in the land that next to being an American, the greatest badge of honor he can wear is membership in the republican party.—From Clarkson's Letter for the Dinner of Quay's American Club.

AT the meeting held at the opening of the recent city campaign to ratify the nomination of the republican candidate, Mr. Herod, he being present, ex-Mayor Cale Denny expressed his heartfelt gratification that there were "no mugwumps in this campaign." There were none on that side. The republican side was under the blatant control of the hustlers who removed Chief Webster from the head of the fire department in 1889 because he would not turn out some dozen democrats, out of eighty-two employes, to make room for republican henchmen, a full account of which was given in the CHRONICLE for April, 1889. Joined with these were the tinhorn-Farwell club crowd who, it will be remembered, were a club of "workers" formed mainly to work for federal spoil then being distributed. It first called itself the tinhorn club, but it got no spoil, and being unable to pay its rent, it moved from large quarters on a fine street into small ones on a back street, when it changed its name to the Farwell club, in honor of Senator Farwell as "the only man who has the sand to oppose civil service." Farwell refused the honor, and the club went to pieces, its effects being sold for a few dollars. This aggregation of boys had a candidate who openly declared himself one of them. Office-holder Harry McFarland, who has a place in the government printing office to pay him for work among the worse elements in 1888, came weeks ago from Washington and took up his work. Office-holder A. D. Shaw, who was paid with an office for work among railroad men in 1888, was brought here and again set to work. In the middle of the campaign Sim Coy left the democrats and went over to the republican machine.

THIS hungry and bawling crowd at once caught the eye of the independent voter, and he instantly comprehended that rarely could so many vicious elements be balloted under foot in a single day, and rarely has the independent done his work with greater relish. He had also to justify him, the fact that in the main, the present administration had been a good one for the city, and this was particularly true of the board of public works and the controller. Mayor Sullivan, whose re-election was sought, had been elected two years previous by 1,700 majority admittedly secured by independent votes. October 13, his re-election followed by 2,700 majority. This was because the best citizens of Indianapolis refused to be bound by party ties. The times have happily changed here. The Indianapolis Sentinel is not the old Sentinel. It is a strong, fearless paper, that wants good government and pays regard to the ties of honesty as well as the ties of party. There is beyond question, a very large independent vote here. For the development of this fortunate condition, for any community, the first credit must be given to the Indianapolis News.

THE annual meeting of the National League, at Buffalo, September 29 and 30, was in many respects the most successful ever held. Buffalo was a congenial place, and her civil service reformers in great numbers, after their many victories securing a complete enforcement of both federal and state laws, held their heads high. Elsewhere are given the tenth annual address of Mr. Curtis and the paper by Sherman S. Rogers. Mr. Foulke's paper opposing secret sessions of the senate is excellent, and Moorfield Storey's paper on the separation of municipal government from politics, is a real contribution to the cause of reform.

The annual meeting closed with a dinner, at which Sherman S. Rogers, presided, and the speakers were George William Curtis, Charles J. Bonaparte, Lucius B. Swift, Edward Cary, William D. Foulke, Everett P. Wheeler, Theodore Bacon and E. C. Sprague.

FOR want of space THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has to omit, this month, the papers of Mr. Storey and Mr. Foulke, read at the league meeting at Buffalo, the report of the special committee on the census, and to limit the current facts mainly to the assessment circulars and to the activity of office-holders.

SHOULD the President seize upon the military and naval services and use them as he does the civil service for his re-nomination, he would have a corps of men in uniform. At primaries, at conventions, at the business of hustling voters, running over the country, laying pipes and the thousand other odd jobs, they would be conspicuous objects, and the people would be greatly interested to watch them at work. Now let the President put his civil service into uniform. Let us see Col. Archie Baxter as he journeys over New York state with Fassett, in uniform, and Postmaster Van Cott and Collectors Hendricks and Beard and a host of others. Of course, such as these should be distinguished by certain marks and extra embellishments as officers. It is probably a moderate estimate to say that the President has now 75,000 employes paid by the whole people and supposed to be giving their entire energies to the service of those who pay them, as busy as bees in his own private interest, or to put it less baldly but what really amounts to the same thing, at work for the republican machine.

We take the liberty to suggest that the color of the new uniform for the civil service should be red. Red has recently been adopted as the official color of letter boxes for the excellent reason that it shows well at long distances, and that is precisely what we want of the civil service as it labors for bosses big and little. When Col. Baxter passes through the little towns and speaks at the car door for Fassett, if he is in a bright-red uniform he shows well down the street as a federal employe off junketing. So with these different postmasters who have held conventions, their red uniform is a constant reminder that their living is furnished by general taxation, while they are using their time and official position to carry out the orders of a Quay or Platt or lieutenants of those worthies.

QUAY.

Quay is having much to disturb him in Pennsylvania. The investigations into the rottenness of the recent scandals bid fair not to be stifled after all. Governor Pattison's proclamation for an extra session of the senate has obliged Quay to summon his henchmen, Marshal Leeds, Collector Cooper, Controller of the Treasury Gilkeson, Collector Warmcastle, Assistant Postmaster Hughes and others to meet the situation.

The Public Ledger has at last brought its great influence for reform:

It is indispensibly necessary that the "spoils" system shall be struck by a crushing defeat in Pennsylvania. It is for the voters of the state now to judge—now that the issue is joined as to the deliverances in the resolutions of both conventions—which party and which nominees are most likely to strike the blow that will defeat and stamp out the system.

The North American, which calls itself the oldest daily paper in America, being in its one hundred and seventh year and the staunchest of republican papers, says:

"Fidelity to party is played out as a battle cry to lead the hosts of republicans across fields where they may be unwilling to tread." * * *

"But in the republican party itself there is a discontent more dangerous than any attack from outside. It is in our own ranks that we best know the burden we have borne. It is not reasonable to suppose that it has been borne willingly, and to day no man's individual excellence is enough to insure him from defeat at the polls if it is the belief of the republicans who dislike and despise the demoralization which has touched the public service that the so-called leaders who have caused it may be overthrown by the revolt of the ballot."

For almost the first time the men who have for years been striving to break down the boss system in Pennsylvania now find papers that will print the facts of their efforts. The republican movement against the leadership of Quay is growing. An address has just been issued, signed by 322 prominent republicans, for a meeting to organize. This address says:

"The object of those who have signed this address is to secure the recognition of common honesty and the establishment of sound political methods in the management of the affairs of this commonwealth, and to restore Pennsylvania to her original position of honor among the states of the Union. To accomplish this end, and as a natural outgrowth of the protest, an organization will be formed to break the power of spoils politics in this state, and to obtain a fitting representative of Pennsylvania's interests in the senate of the United States upon the termination of the incumbency of Senator M. S. Quay."

While Quay's enemies are rising up about him and party shackles have so loosened that the freedom of the press seems to be at hand, his friend and ally, William H. Kemble, suddenly dies. The following is from the New York Times:

The incident in the life of Mr. Kemble that brought him notoriously to the attention of the people of the state, was his famous letter to Titian J. Coffey of Washington, D. C. George O. Evans, in his capacity as fiscal agent of Pennsylvania, was commissioned to collect a claim from the government to reimburse Pennsylvania for certain bounty money that had been allowed to the state's account. The famous letter from Kemble read:

"MY DEAR TITIAN: This will introduce to you Mr. George O. Evans, who has a claim of some magnitude against the government. Treat him as you would me. He understands addition, division and silence."

It was a matter of some years before this remarkable correspondence, introducing Evans came to light. In the year 1878 Mr. Kemble was convicted in the courts of Dauphin county, Penn., at Harrisburg, of bribing members of the Legislature to vote for the famous riot bill, which would have taken about $3,000,000 from the state for the benefit of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Every effort was made to obtain a pardon for him before the case came to trial. Finding that this could not be done, Kemble fled the state. After he had been sentenced he was promptly pardoned. Mr. Quay was a member of the board of pardons and was the leading spirit that brought about Mr. Kemble's pardon.

TEN YEARS OF REFORM.

[An address by George William Curtis at the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League, at Buffalo, Sept. 29, 1891.]

When the distinguished president of the Buffalo Association invited the National League to hold its annual meeting in this city, we were sure, in accepting the invitation, not only of a generous and hospitable welcome, but we knew that we were coming to one of the holy cities of the reform faith. In the revolutionary army every state watched with profound interest the conduct of its own soldiers, and those states to-day still cherish with pride and gratitude the story of the deeds of the New York line, the Massachusetts line, the Virginia line, all of them uniting in the final triumph of the whole American line. So in our contest for reform, the contest for honest government by the people and not by the pensioned politicians, the Buffalo line has been always at the front, and to the conviction, the constancy and the courage of that line, some of the noblest victories of the good cause are due. It is especially pleasant, therefore, that we should assemble in Buffalo for our tenth annual meeting, not only to renew the pledge of our fidelity to reform, but to exchange congratulations upon its achievements and progress.

The formation of the League was not, as sometimes has been pleasantly represented, a whim of amiable gentlemen who had a fancy for new fashions in politics, for spinning moonbeams and dipping water in a sieve. The spirit of reform is the instinct of order and progress and as old as government. It is the creative instinct moving upon the face of the waters. When the republican platform of 1884, reaffirmed in 1888, spoke of the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage, it did not announce a new discovery; it merely stated a historical fact. In the famous declaration of 1688, which, after consultation with his English advisers, William the Third issued upon embarking for England, he mentioned as the sixth among the thirteen particulars in which the laws of England had been set at naught by the dethroned dynasty, the interference with elections by turning out of all employment such as refused to vote as they were required; and in the declaration of rights drawn by Lord Summers with which the crown of England was offered to William and Mary, the seventh of the fourteen grievances mentioned was the same violation of the freedom of elections by patronage. So early and so prominently in constitutional history was the evil of patronage denounced as a great public wrong and peril.

A century later the evil instead of declining had grown to such strength that when the most ignoble of British ministers sought by the corruption of patronage to restore the supremacy of the Crown, Edmund Burke raised his great voice in protest. Macaulay, in a famous passage, describes the excesses and the terror of this abuse in England, and Webster draws a similar picture of its ravages in this country. It was sixty years ago that he said, in arraigning the Jackson administration, "As far as I know there is no civilized country on earth in which, on a change of rulers, there is such an inquisition for spoils as we have witnessed in this free republic." The evil that both described was the baldest form of political corruption. It was making booty of the public service, and Marcy, who defended the outrage, justly described the service so seized as spoils. In one country the public patronage was a bribery fund to prop the crown, in the other, to help a party. In both it was organized corruption.

It is not surprising that the passionate ardor of party spirit during a civil war which identified support of a party with the existence of the government should have strengthened the tradition that extreme partisanship is the rightful condition of public employment, nor that the immense increase of such employment at the very time when this conviction was strongest should have developed at once and flagrantly the evils of an exclusively partisan civil service. The exaltation of patriotic feeling during the war is an inspiring recollection. But the reaction that always follows such exultation was not less signal, and corruption in our politics was never felt to be so general, so vast and penetrating, as during the last quarter of a century. The formation of the League, therefore, did not announce the discovery of a new abuse, but the conviction of an old one was at once so deeply extended and so threatening as to demand constant exposure and resolute reform. The story of the progress of ten years is the evidence of the scope of that conviction and of the awakening of public opinion. There is no better place for the retrospect than this entrenched reform camp of Buffalo, over which the flags of victory fly, and in which drums are beating for further advances and the final triumph.

The National Civil Service Reform League was organized at Newport, R. I., on the 11th of August, 1881. It was the result of a conference among members of civil service reform associations that had spontaneously arisen in various parts of the country for the purpose of awakening public interest in the question, like the clubs of the Sons of Liberty among our fathers, and the anti-slavery societies among their children. The first act of the League was a resolution of hearty approval of the bill then pending in congress, known as the Pendleton bill. Within less than two years afterward the civil service law was passed in congress by a vote in the senate of 38 yeas to 5 nays, 33 senators being absent, and in the house only a week later, by a vote of 155 yeas to 47 nays, 87 members not voting. In the house the bill was put upon its passage at once, the speaker permitting only thirty minutes for debate. This swift enactment of a righteous law was due, undoubtedly, to the panic of the party of administration, a panic which saw in the disastrous result of the recent election a demand of the country for honest politics; and it was due also to the exulting belief of the party of opposition that the law would essentially weaken the dominant party by reducing its patronage. The sudden and overwhelming vote was that of a congress which probably had very little individual knowledge or conviction upon the subject. But the instinct in regard to intelligent public opinion was undoubtedly sure, and it is intelligent public opinion which always commands the future. It is fear of the same righteous sentiment, infinitely stronger than it was ten years ago, which to-day prevents the repeal of the reform law.

The passage of the law was the first great victory of the ten years of the reform movement. The second is the demonstration of the complete practicability of reform attested by the heads of the largest offices of administration in the country. In the treasury and navy departments, the New York custom-house and post-office, and other important custom-houses and post-offices, without the least regard to the wishes or the wrath of that remarkable class of our fellow-citizens known as political bosses, it is conceded by officers, wholly beyond suspicion of party independence, that in these chief branches of the public service reform is perfectly practicable and the reformed system a great public benefit. And, although as yet those offices are by no means thoroughly reorganized upon reform principles, yet a quarter of the whole number of places in the public service to which the reformed methods apply are now included within those methods.

I say reformed methods and not principles, because the principle of reform is applicable to the entire public service. When under their oaths to discharge the duties of their offices to their best ability and with the divine aid, the President nominates and the senate confirms a member of the cabinet or a minister to England, the collector of a port or a postmaster, both the President and the senate are morally bound to select the fittest agents for those high public trusts without regard to personal or party interests and with reference solely to the public welfare. For the public service is the service of the people. Its offices are not the perquisites of the chief magistrate to whom the people commit the appointment of persons to fill them. Nor are they the property of the constitutional majority of the people which selects that magistrate. The majority which selects him is simply the agency by which the whole people act, and in executing the trust of appointment to office, he is discharging a duty, not to a majority nor to a party, but to the whole people; and in making the appointment he is morally bound to consider only qualification for the service and not agreement with the opinion of the majority upon subjects that do not affect the duties of the office. Undoubtedly, our political system intends the action of the President to give effect to the will of the majority in legislation. He officially confirms the policy of the country as expressed in the election and declared by congress, a policy which varies with varying opinion. But whatever the changing policy, the actual transaction of the public business under that policy is unchangeable. It demands only capacity, honesty, diligence, subordination.

This is the principle of the constitution which nowhere recognizes party, but everywhere contemplates the general welfare. It is the reasonable view of the nature of popular government. To admit the practical necessity of government by the majority is not to legitimate despotism, as to concede the necessity of government at all is not to justify the caprice of a tyrant. The majority, like the President, in the discharge of its function, is the subject of moral obligation. They are both bound to consult the general welfare. If, for instance, a majority selects a President and a congress to promote a policy of protection, the President and congress must show that the duties of postmaster in New York necessarily affect the execution of that policy, in order, morally, to justify the removal of a perfectly efficient and satisfactory officer, because of his views of that policy. If the postmaster's official duties are in no degree dependent upon his political views, his removal is as gross a public wrong and as great a violation of public principle and policy as Jackson's despotic dismissal of his cabinet because the wives of the secretaries would not visit a woman whom Jackson favored.

Ten years ago this truth was very indistinctly perceived. To-day it is a very general conviction. The entire practicability of reform, that is to say, the practicability of retaining, with the greatest benefit to the public service and with no injury whatever to any part of our political system, public officers of proved and satisfactory ability, is the second great achievement of reform within ten years.

Another happy advantage of the reform in this retrospect has been the character and efficiency of the national civil service commission. The prosperity of the reformed system depended almost wholly in the beginning upon the sincerity, the special knowledge and the tenacity of those to whom was entrusted the duty of putting it into operation. To farm out the infant to an enemy would have been to smother it. It was easy for President Arthur, after he had approved the bill, to paralyze reform by the appointment of commissioners who had no faith in the law and no heart in its proper enforcement. But he honestly placed at the head of the commission one of the most conspicuous, intelligent, and earnest friends of reform, who, at the invitation of President Hayes, had made a complete study upon the spot of the English system, and whose report is the most important contribution ever made to the literature of the subject; who had taken a leading part in the preparation of the reform law, and whose large familiarity with the question especially qualified him to organize the practical operation of the law, Mr. Dorman B. Eaton. Cordially sustained by President Arthur in the novel and difficult work, Mr. Eaton and his colleagues laid the secure foundations upon which their successors have wrought in the same spirit.

President Cleveland, to whose personal interest, while governor of New York, the passage of the reform law in this state was chiefly due, had demonstrated the sincerity of his purpose by the appointment of a state civil service commission, whose personal character and ability and unswerving fidelity to the cause were not only the earnest of the honest observance of the law, but commended the reason and the essential value of reform to the sound judgment of the state. As President, Mr. Cleveland enlarged the range of the classified service, revised and strengthened the rules of the commission and sustained it in the firm enforcement of the law. President Harrison's selection of civil service commissioners, also, was in strict conformity to the spirit of the platform upon which he was elected, and to his own professions and pledges as a candidate, and he also has extended somewhat the classified service.

The enforcement of the law through the commission by the three Presidents who have served since its passage, has been honest and honorable. It is certain that neither of them has struck at reform by entrusting the execution of the law to its enemies. They have not adopted, indeed, all the progressive recommendations of the commission, but political pressure for the practical betrayal of its work, or for the dismissal of any actively aggressive commissioner, has been manfully resisted by them. This is well done, for I can imagine a commissioner of so high a faith, so alert a mind, so aggressive a temperament, a public officer so impatient of humbug, lies and hypocrisy, and with so shrewd an eye to see and so sharp a sting to avenge even senatorial violations and sneaking cabinet evasions of the law, that he must be as welcome to lofty official delinquents as a swarm of hornets to a crowd of Sunday-school boys on a high fence stealing peaches. I can imagine such senatorial and cabinet delinquents seeking by the basest appeal to personal interest and partisan servility to persuade a President to dismiss such a commissioner; and such a commissioner I can imagine sometimes in great doubt whether he should long retain his official head but never in the least doubt that he should always retain both his personal and official honor. Such firm and self-respecting public officers dignify office and restore the public service to universal respect and confidence.

I am speaking only of the fidelity of the three Presidents to the commission. The League has pronounced its judgment upon the conduct of each of the administrations since the passage of the law, in regard to civil service reform in general. It has tested them, as was its duty, by the principles and spirit of reform which apply to the entire exercise of the appointing power and to every branch of the government and which have been especially approved by the platform of the present administration. The moral obligation of reform, as I have said, is not limited to the classified service. If its principles are sound they are as applicable to public offices employing forty-nine clerks as to those employing fifty; and an administration which observes the letter of the law in appointing the fifty, but makes spoils of the forty-nine, is not a civil service reform administration, as a man who gets drunk occasionally, is not a temperate man.

It was doubtless in recognition of this truth, and to seem to conform to the highest standard, that the platform of the party of administration declared that "the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments." It did not say that reform should apply to thirty thousand employes only of the one hundred and twenty thousand employes of the government, and that the rest should be treated as spoils, but that the spirit of reform, whatever the method of appointment, should be observed throughout the service. When, therefore, the assistant postmaster-general endeared himself to the chief administration agent of spoils in New York, by cutting off official heads as fast as possible, he violated the express pledge of his party to respect the spirit of reform as much as if, being a soldier of the Union, he had broken the orders of the march and disgraced his flag; and the President, by tolerating such riot of contempt for his own professions and for the promises of his party, made all such promises contemptible, and forfeited the claim of his administration to be considered a reform administration. Keeping one pledge does not condone breaking another. A party, like a man, is certainly not bound to make a promise. But if it promises and breaks the pledge, although a party is an elusive entity, a vote is not, and punishment is possible.

But while no administration can be fairly called a reform administration which, like the present and the preceding administrations, makes spoils of the great multitude of offices not included within the law, it does not follow that reform does not advance under such administrations, nor that the three Presidents of whom I have spoken did not sustain the civil service commission in enforcing the law. It may not be thought high praise to say that an executive officer enforces the law which he is sworn to enforce, but there are different ways of enforcing a law. In the dark ages of the Fugitive Slave law, there was an officer in Boston, who, being entrusted with a writ of arrest for a fugitive slave, used to go into the quarter of the city where the colored people congregated and announce that he believed the fugitive to be there and that he should call for him in the afternoon and expect to have him delivered up at once without delay; "and it is surprising," he said, "that after such ample and definite notice making everything easy for those who were criminally harboring the offender, I was never able to find a single fugitive." There is another method of enforcing law to be studied in the case of the Sunday liquor law in the city of New York. The farmer remarked of the Canada thistle and twitch grass in his fields that the more he pulled them up the more they grew. It may be said in the same way that the more the Sunday liquor law is enforced in the present way, the more liquor is sold on Sunday. Indeed, in the early days of civil service reform, when it was not enforced by law, but by an executive order of Presidents Grant and Hayes, I knew an appointing officer who used the order as a short and easy way with politicians whom he did not care to gratify, and so secured leisure to distribute his patronage more satisfactorily. In our history of ten years it is a very great victory of reform that the national civil service commission has been an honest and efficient ministry of the law, and that Presidents Arthur, Cleveland and Harrison have honestly supported it.

Still another victory is the fact that the system of party assessments on the civil service and the kindred evil of the interference of office-holders in elections are now so effectually stigmatized by public opinion that although not abandoned they have become disgraceful. The effort to justify the levying of blackmail by party committees of congress or of local districts, and to defend the moral coercion of public employes by irresponsible officers of the government, has disappeared in the contemptuous scorn of public common sense. Undoubtedly the practice in some degree still continues, as the late disgraceful letter of the Ohio republican state executive committee shows, but only as sneak-thieving and pocket-picking continue after laws are enacted to prevent them. The supreme court of the United States has affirmed the constitutionality of the laws prohibiting such assessments, and since the publicity given to the wide-spread and flagrant extortions of the notorious Hubbell congressional campaign committee of 1882, no senator or representative in congress who is sensitive to public contempt would authorize the signature of his name to circulars demanding of post-office clerks at home and consular officers abroad, and even of women clerks who have no vote, the surrender of two per cent. and four per cent. of their salaries to be spent in buying seven more mules or in dispatching soap to Indiana or in marshaling floaters in blocks of five.

This steady change of public opinion in regard to political changes in the non-political public service is the happiest result of the ten years' agitation of reform. It is indeed only to a certain degree a change in practice, but the change of opinion greatly facilitates its practical completion. The reform rules embrace only about a quarter of the places in the registry of the service, and within that range the reform may be fairly said to be effected. But beyond that range the civil service is still liable to be treated as spoils. By the express direction of President Hayes and by the known desire of President Cleveland, the immediate control of caucuses and conventions by office-holders was greatly diminished during the last few years. But in the state convention of the administration party this year in New York, where in other years I have seen the collector of the port of New York, in person, openly directing the votes of his subordinates, the office-holding force again appeared, and the chief figure in the convention of the party whose national platform demands that the reform shall be extended to every branch of the service and its spirit observed in every appointment, was that chief state agent of spoils, who gaily proclaims that public officers endear themselves to him not by fidelity or efficiency, but by violation of their party pledges and by making the public service party plunder. The comedy of the autumn campaign is that the platform of a convention directed by the chief administration spoilsman in the state reaffirms the affection of the party for "thorough, genuine civil service reform."

But these are only incidents of a battle which is still raging. Here and there the line is pushed back and broken. Here, there is an advantage, there, a reverse, although the general advance is plain. The appointment of the late collector of New York was a distinct violation of the executive pledge that "the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments." But the intimation that the collector contemplated a course which no law forbids and which in the time of his predecessor Swartwout was held to be entirely legitimate, nevertheless provoked a protest which was not limited to party. I know no reason in his character or career to suppose that the late collector, whose personal good name even amidst the rancor of partisan controversy has been unsoiled, would have wantonly blackened it by prostituting a public trust to promote a personal or party interest, or would have deliberately sophisticated himself by the pretense that honest and efficient public agents might be summarily removed to make place for other equally honest and efficient agents, not because the public service would be promoted by the change, but because it would advance the political interest of the officer to whose official act the collector owed his power to do the service. But the significant fact is that the mere suggestion was resented by the public sense of official decency and personal honor. Whatever reaction there may be at any point, the moral progress of reform is signally illustrated by the undoubted fact that it is becoming personally discreditable to a public officer to administer his office as an agency of spoils, and a serious injury to a party when its conspicuous leaders are no longer statesmen but bosses. To say that this is not the universal opinion is to say nothing. It is an opinion general enough and strong enough to make laws and regulations, to secure their faithful execution, and constantly to extend the range of their operation.

This revolution in public opinion is the result of the agitation of civil service reform, and I should not call it the happiest result if it were not a revolution which had produced practical results. In a rapid glance we have seen the general progress in such results during the ten years of our organization. But the annual meeting invites a retrospect of the year, and if the partisan ravage of the civil service beyond the range of the rules were the only indication of the situation, it might be thought a year of little promise. But the really significant facts are of quite another kind. Let me recall some of them, although I can but mention them.

The good work of the year began in Buffalo. Just after our last annual meeting, the court of appeals decided the case of Rogers against the city of Buffalo to test the validity of certain appointments made in total disregard of the civil service law of the state. The court approved the constitutionality of the law, forbade payment of persons illegally appointed, and declared the city bound by the action of the mayor in employing and paying persons to carry out the law, although the council had refused to provide for the payment. The court, in announcing its opinion, expressed, with the utmost force and dignity, its approval of the principles of reform, saying that under the spoils system "The chief reason for an appointment was the political work done by the applicant and his supposed power to do more, and thus an appointment to an office in the civil list was regarded as a fit and proper reward for purely political and partisan service. No one can believe that such a system was calculated to produce a service fit for the only purpose for which offices are created, viz., the discharge of duties necessary to be performed in order that the public business may be properly and efficiently transacted. The continuous and systematic filling of all the offices of a great and industrious nation by such means became conclusive proof in the minds of many intelligent and influential men that the nation itself had not in such matters emerged from the semi-barbarous state, and that it had failed to obtain the full benefits arising from an advanced and refined civilization." The Court added: "The fact must be fully recognized that the duties connected with the vast majority of offices in both the Federal and State governments are in no sense political, and that a proper performance of those duties would give no one the least idea whether the incumbent of the office were a member of one political party or another."

The reform association of Buffalo declares that the public service of the city is at last practically taken by law out of the spoils system, and no intelligent man supposes that it is any less vigorous, honest, efficient and satisfactory for that reason, or doubts that the problem of city government, one of the most difficult and important with which we have to deal, would be greatly simplified if what the association says of Buffalo could be said truly of every other city in the country.

The year has given us also in the city of New York the valuable testimony of private citizens in the recommendation of the very able committee appointed by Mayor Grant to consider the most efficient and most economical system for the conduct of the street-cleaning department in that city. The subject, like every subject which involves the honest expenditure of public money in that community, is extremely perplexing. But the public spirit of the eminent citizens who served as a committee led them to a careful and detailed investigation, and in their report they state that the efficiency of the system proposed by them will depend upon bringing the whole force of the department within the control of the civil service regulations. That this is entirely feasible, the experience of Boston in its public labor department has demonstrated, and that the result in New York would be of the highest advantage and most satisfactory to all good citizens, is unquestionable.

At the beginning of the present year the national civil service commission made known the fact that it had succeeded in adjusting the quotas of appointments under the rules among the several states. The spoils system has obtained so firm a hold upon the public mind that in parts of the country, especially in the southern states, there was a total disbelief in the honesty of the reformed system which was assumed to be only a scheme to make partisan appointments more universal and certain. But a perfectly frank conference between the commissioners and members of congress and representatives of the press from the southern states resulted in the conviction upon the part of the representatives of the press and the people that the law was a reasonable law honestly administered by the commission and, consequently, at examinations to fill additional places in the departments at Washington, candidates appeared without influence and without regard to party sympathy; the fair proportion among the states was established; the persons appointed were in general natives of the states in which they were examined, and "in the overwhelming majority of cases, these native born southern whites were democrats." The great advantage gained was not only the proper adjustment of the quota, but the practical demonstration to partisan members of congress, to the party press, and to utterly incredulous party adherents in the states that the civil service law is not only just in itself, but is honestly enforced by a party administration. The proof that such a course is possible is undoubtedly the most valuable lesson in national politics that the communities in which it was demonstrated have ever received, and Commissioner Roosevelt, in his interesting account of this demonstration, says, with a satisfaction that every friend of reform must share, "In the departmental service at Washington we have succeeded in putting nearly a complete stop to removals for political purposes."

In January of this year the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association urged upon the President the extension of the reformed system to the Indian service. The same request was made by the board of Indian commissioners, of which President Gates, of Amherst College, is chairman. The commissioners stated that they desired to secure permanence in the service for the greater part of the officers and employes. In April the President directed the extension of the rules to physicians at the Indian agencies, and to superintendents, assistant superintendents, teachers and matrons, of Indian schools, and the rules and regulations prepared by the commission for enforcing these executive directions will go into effect on the first of October. In February the national association of public school superintendents at the annual meeting in Philadelphia, commended the principles of reform as applicable to the selection of teachers in the public schools, and recommended the passage of laws requiring from all candidates certificates of qualification from the state authorities. In the state of New York, at the suggestion of the superintendent of public instruction, the school commissioners throughout the state have adopted a system of uniform simultaneous examinations for teachers upon conditions essentially competitive. Every argument for the selection of the 63,000 postmasters in the United States by some better test than personal partiality and political "pulls" is irresistible when applied to the selection of the 350,000 public school teachers in the country. We boast that the public schools make American citizens. But the teacher is the school, and if it be wise to ascertain the qualification of a street cleaner, or a physician at an Indian agency, or custom house clerk, for the proper discharge of his duty, it can not be unwise to test the fitness of public school teachers and to appoint only those who are ascertained to be fittest.

The usual attempt was made in congress by members of both parties to starve and paralyze the civil service commission. But it was briskly and ably resisted also by members of both parties. As usual the weight of ability and influence and character was with the friends of reform and not with the spoils-men. In the house the attack upon the law was defeated, and the moderate increase of appropriation asked by the commission was granted. But a difference arose between the two houses, and the controversy was adjusted by the passage of the old appropriation. The house committee on the civil service law made an investigation of its workings and reported that the public service had been greatly benefited by it and that the law upon the whole had been well executed. The conditional term of approval was doubtless due to the fact that an administration of another party had intervened between the passage of the law and the present administration, and it would have been politically unwise to imply that Messrs. Vilas and Dickinson, for instance, had shown the same zeal for honest reform in the post-office which have distinguished Messrs. Wanamaker and Clarkson, although an impartial observer might have decided that they were entitled to precisely the same praise. The committee proposed a bill for the reorganization of the commission making the regulations still more stringent and declaring that "any law which revives influence, political or personal, in the public service of the country, should be vehemently opposed, and that no system other than that in vogue at the present time can furnish a safeguard against this spirit of favoritism." The bill which was reported was not considered, and if it should be said that it would not have been reported had it been supposed that it would be considered or could be passed, I should reply that the members who reported it were honest friends of reform, and that the bill itself was evidently the result of knowledge and a sincere desire to remedy what were held to be defects in the existing law.

Eight years' experience of the working of the law has demonstrated the necessity of reorganizing the methods of promotion in the service by introducing competition as contemplated by the law and established for a time under the Grant administration. In January, 1887, compulsory competition, with the certification of the whole eligible list, was introduced in certain offices. But upon the recommendation of the commission, the President has recently authorized open voluntary competition for promotion within the classified service, under such regulations as the commission may provide. These regulations are now under consideration and will be applied as soon as possible, and the measure may be regarded justly as the most important step yet taken by the President in the interest of reform. Meanwhile, it is a striking illustration of the practical wisdom of the reformed system that promotion by voluntary competition has been lately introduced into the department of the service which has been most prostituted to party and personal influence, the post-office.

At the first examination the postmaster-general assured the clerks, as his order expressly provides, that hereafter advancement would depend solely upon the results of the examinations and the official records, and no longer upon personal favor or party influence. "God works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

Before this reform was instituted in the post-office department, the legislature of Massachusetts last winter requested the senators and representatives of the state in congress to urge legislation which would secure reform in the Charlestown navy yard and the other navy yards of the United States. If, however, those senators and representatives urged such legislation, congress was obdurate. But in April the secretary of the navy, in a luminous, courageous and decisive speech at Boston, announced his intention to exclude politics from the labor system of the navy yards. He said that the degradation of that labor into party spoils was demoralizing to any party that resorted to it, destructive to the government service, and debauching to national and local politics. "It is an ulcer on the naval administration system," he said, "and I propose to cut it out." He proceeded to state clearly his scheme, for which he said the rules were preparing in detail. The three cardinal points of the scheme were free and open competition, employment on proved merit alone, and the absolute publicity of every detail. This was the three-edged blade for the secretary's invigorating reform surgery. "I do not propose to stop," he said, "until the principle of efficiency and worth is the only test of navy yard employment; * * so that it will remove not only all machine politics from the navy yard, but all suspicion of machine politics." This speech, showing the secretary's clear comprehension of the scope and method of reform, and supported by his character, was felt at once not to be a mere flourish of political rhetoric. The secretary's rules affecting the higher positions were applied in May, and those affecting labor on the first of September, and his action is by far the most important event in the progress of reform under this administration.

"It is an ulcer and I mean to cut it out," said the secretary, and he is cutting it out. With all the ardor of the Irishman we may certainly wish him "more power to your elbow," until the cutting is complete. The only regret that can be expressed in view of this admirable act, as of the promotions in the post-office department, is, that the reform in the navy yards has not been brought under the direction of the national commission as in other branches of the service. While General Tracy is secretary of the navy there is no doubt that the ulcer of the spoils will not thrive in the navy yards. But when he retires will he have extirpated its roots? His scheme is admirable and effective, and it is based upon sound principles of reform. But it is only his official regulation. It is not yet law and with his successor the devils whom the secretary has expelled may return. If the rules of the civil service are to be applied, as they certainly should be, to the navy yards, is there any good reason why they should not be applied as in all other departments, and as they are applied in the clerical branch of the navy department? It is a reform too important to be left to the changing sympathies of successive secretaries, and its inception and execution are so important as to entitle Secretary Tracy to the gratitude of the country while they write his name high on the roll of practical reformers.

Upon a survey even so general as this of the progress of civil service reform within the ten years of the existence of this League, it is idle to deny the prodigious advance which it has made, both in public opinion and in practical application. The evil is not new nor is the League first in calling public attention to it. Escape from the vicious party despotism of the old council of appointment in this state was one of the chief reasons for the adoption of the constitution of 1821. Congress has echoed with loud debate upon the subject, with the angry altercations of party chiefs, and the terrible array of facts which is the most powerful plea of every political reform. Investigations, reports, executive orders have followed each other. But they have been the temporary weapons of party warfare dropped when they had served their purpose, not the persistent pressure of increasing conviction—hot gusts that blew off green fruit, not the change of temperature that ripens the harvest. The League has represented not party strategy to carry an election, but public conviction to reform an acknowledged evil of administration.

If it had done nothing more its service would be great in having forced the spoils system to its defence. The political pirates are at last driven to show the black flag and defiantly to declare that at every election the whole public service in every detail, with all its emoluments and opportunities, shall be made the prize of a vast struggle of greed and intrigue, of bribery and dishonesty of every kind, all inflamed to fury by party spirit. We demand that all public business, which is not political, shall be kept free from politics, and shall be transacted upon the simple principles which are approved by universal private experience. The masters of Tammany Hall, with the dealers in mules, soap and blocks of floaters, who hold that in politics fraud is not fraudulent, nor dishonesty dishonest, declare that everywhere, except in Sancho Panza's Baratania, No Man's Land, and the Isle of Fools, the public service is spoils and belongs to the victors. But Washington warned us in advance against these voices. Webster said that whoever controlled a man's means of living controlled his will. Clay said that Marcy's doctrine would end in despotism. Lincoln, hounded by the remorseless demand for spoils, said that the evil would destroy the government. Those who would use the patronage of public employment as the vast bribery fund of a party are on one side. Washington and Lincoln, patriotism and good sense, the wisdom of age, the instinct of youth, are on the other. Let all good men choose their part. We have chosen ours.

Let us now see what extensions have been made of the classified service.

They have been considerable. The entire official service has increased considerably. The commissioners in their first report (February, 1884) estimated it at about 110,000. It is supposed now to be about 120,000.

The classified service, as stated by the commissioners in their last report, November, 1890, contained somewhat over 30,000 employes, an increase since February, 1884, of about 16,000.

A large portion of this must be from natural increment within the departments, districts and offices originally classified, but a considerable part can be otherwise accounted for.

Mr. Cleveland, in March, 1888, extended the classification within the post-offices and custom-houses named in the classified service (it should be borne in mind that not all the places within the classified offices and districts were originally or have yet been brought into the classified service), adding 1,931 to the number of officials brought under the civil service rules.

January 4, 1889, Mr. Cleveland also directed the railway postal service to be classified under the civil service rules, the extension to take effect March 15, 1889. At the request of the commission, which had not time to prepare eligible lists, President Harrison postponed the extension to May 1st; since which time we have had the classified railway postal service. The number of places is understood to be somewhat over 4,000.

April 13, 1891, President Harrison made a valuable extension of the rules to about 600 persons (the number at the present time is supposed to be about 700) in the Indian service: physicians, school superintendents, school teachers and matrons. This extension to the classified service is the only one thus far made by Mr. Harrison. It is not believed, however, that this is because he is not in sympathy with the new system or is not loyal to his own personal or party pledges on the subject.

The appointment by him of the present excellent commission and the support he has accorded their vigorous administration of the law; his annulling in April last the rule which allowed promotions or transfers from the non-classified to the classified service (a rule which furnished a "back-door entrance," without the ordeal of a competitive examination), and the extension to a part of the Indian service just mentioned, have been of the greatest service to the reform. It is fair, too, to assume (although the navy-yard service has not been brought under the civil service rules) that the late extension of the principles of the reform to the navy yards, with their 4,000 or 5,000 employes, announced by Secretary Tracy, has been with the full concurrence of the President.

But the fact remains that a large part of the postal and customs service, to which the rules might well be applied, is still in the thrall and bondage of the spoils system. Why should it so remain? It may be that when Mr. Harrison came to the Presidency he found an inadequate administration of the law and rules. It is not my desire to debate this question, for it is not necessary to the purpose of this paper. Still I may be permitted, perhaps, to state my personal belief that when the commission was reorganized, so to speak, by the appointment of Mr. Roosevelt and Gov. Thompson, the entire system was in an unprosperous condition, and that unless new life and more vigorous loyalty in its administration had been put into it, not only would not extension of it have been advisable, but it would have fallen soon into serious public discredit. No law is worth much that is not properly enforced.

But the new commission has saved the system from the discredit into which it might have fallen, and by general consent it is and has been now for a long time fairly and thoroughly administered.

Then why has it not been extended to the rest of the large post-offices and custom-houses? The commissioners, in their report for 1889, said:

The minimum limit for the number of employes in the classified post-offices should be fixed at twenty-five instead of fifty. This would add not far from thirty to the forty-three now classified.

This recommendation was repeated in the commissioner's report for 1890.

Why did they not also recommended the extension to custom-houses having twenty-five employes does not appear; but it is believed that the limitation of the post-offices at twenty-five, rather than twenty or ten, was simply because, with the meager force in the service of the commission, it was not deemed practicable to go below twenty-five. Probably for a similar reason the recommendation was not extended to the custom-houses.

But there would seem to be no reason why all the custom-houses, as well as post-offices, having even ten employes, should not be brought into the classified service. If that would be too extensive an addition to be made at once, certainly the inclusion of those having twenty-five officials seems entirely practicable. Why should it not be made? Why should the custom-house in Buffalo be under the spoils system, and the post-office under the merit system? Competitive examinations for the offices on the ground floor; "influence," or personal and party service for the offices on the second! How are the people to be convinced that the system of patronage and plunder is not to resume complete sway so long as it is permitted by the President to remain entrenched in at least fifty of the principal post-offices and eighteen of the great customs districts, not to speak of the much greater number of considerable offices, where there are from ten to twenty-five officials, in all of which the old system, which has been denounced by Presidents Harrison, Cleveland and Arthur is as vigorous and vociferous as ever?

I desire to speak with becoming modesty upon this subject, and I am quite aware that the President may regard the persistent demands of the friends of civil service reform, in the midst of his varied and engrossing duties, as irksome. I believe, however, he might well enough entertain another view of the subject from which he would derive a pleasure that is not often within the reach of a President. The civil service reform, after some vicissitudes, has achieved a great success. More than 30,000 of the principal subordinate places in the federal service are under its control. It stands to-day well accredited before the people; but the condition of its safety, as well as of its final success, is that it go forward. Its great enemy still holds much of the field; but a single strong movement will decide the contest. If the President were tomorrow to issue an order by which the offices in even the non-classified customs and postal services having twenty-five employes were brought under the civil service rules, I believe it would be regarded by the whole country as practically decisive. It would show not only that there is to be no step backward, but that the end is not far distant when this reform which underlies every other reform in American politics shall be completely triumphant. This is the President's great opportunity. If he avails himself of it, more than anything he has yet done, more, probably, than anything else he may yet do, it would make his administration illustrious.

OUGHT THE CLASSIFIED SERVICE TO BE INCREASED?

[A paper read by Sherman S. Rogers before the National Civil Service Reform League at Buffalo, September 30.]

I wish to present the case of the national civil service reform, with special reference to the question of its extension.

Ought the classified service to be increased?

What I have to say will not be new, but no apology seems to be needed for urging the subject on public attention, for either this reform has justified itself by actual trial, or it has proved a practical failure.

It can not any longer be regarded as experimental. If it has failed, it would seem that the act "to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States" should be repealed, and the country be permitted to return to the harmonious and logical methods of the spoils system.

If, on the contrary, it has not only not failed, but upon actual trial has approved itself by a real and substantial public benefit, and that, too, notwithstanding it has not always had fair and vigorous enforcement, the question is most pertinent whether it ought not to be extended, and that, too, without further delay.

I know of no public utterance where the proposition which in this brief paper is sought to be maintained is better stated than the resolution of the republican party, contained in its national platforms for 1884 and 1888, to wit: that

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable.

The act to improve and regulate the civil service of the United States was approved by President Arthur, January 16, 1883. The first commissioners under it were confirmed by the senate on May 1, 1883. On the following day the rules for carrying the law into effect were approved and promulgated, and on July 16, 1883, the act became essentially operative. The official service had been classified by the rules, but under the act vacancies might be filled according to the old methods until July 16. Since that time all appointments to places within the classified service have been made upon competitive examinations, pursuant to the act and rules.

As appears by the first official report of the commissioners to the President, February 7, 1884, the entire official civil service of the United States embraced about 110,000 persons, 48,434 of whom were postmasters and 4,017 persons in the railway postal service. The rest were distributed among the various departments at Washington and through the customs, internal revenue, postal, diplomatic and consular service, etc. The President, in the exercise of the discretion reposed in him under the act, directed that there should be three branches of the service classified (not including laborers or workmen or officers required to be confirmed by the senate,) as follows:

First—Those classified in the departments at Washington, to be designated as the "classified departmental service."

Second—Those classified under any collector, naval officer, surveyor or appraiser, in any customs district, to be known as the "classified customs service."

Third—Those classified under any postmaster at any post-office, including that at Washington, to be designated as the "classified postal service."

In these branches of the classified service there were included at the outset 13,924, persons, of whom 5,652 were in the departments at Washington, 2,573 in the customs service and 5,699 in the postal service, and there remained, and still remains, in the President the power to revise and modify by extension or otherwise this classification.

Thus was inaugurated the most remarkable administrative reform in our national history. Mr. Arthur had the unique pleasure of saying in his next message to congress:

Since the 16th of July last no person, so far as I am aware, has been appointed to the federal service in the classified portions thereof, or at any of the post-offices and customs districts above named, except those certified by the commission to be most competent, on the basis of the examinations held in conformity to the rules.

A much more extended classification of the service might have been made by the President; but in inaugurating such a tremendous change it was deemed prudent, as the civil service commissioners say in their first report, while making the experiment broadly enough to test its merits, not to make it so general as to involve serious inconvenience in case of failure. Besides, as the commissioners further say:

There was need to bear in mind that the greatest opposition from patronage-mongers and partisans would be at the first stages, when the examiners would be the most inexperienced, the commission most embarrassed by novel questions and the ill-informed most easily misled.

For these reasons, probably, President Arthur made what seemed at the time to some too limited an application of the act to the customs and postal services. But it was done with the approbation of the commissioners and others of the best friends and most efficient promoters of the new system; and in view of the novelty of the situation, and the obstacles which the honest and efficient execution of the law has since met, it would be difficult now to refuse one's assent to the conclusion reached by the President. A great experiment was being made. It seemed well not to enlarge its proportions, lest by its own weight, it should break down at the outset.

But from the start, notwithstanding the difficulties encountered, the new system vindicated itself.

Mr. Arthur, in his message to the congress at its next session, said of it:

I am persuaded that its effects have thus far proved beneficial. Its practical methods appear to be adequate for the ends proposed, and there has been no serious difficulty in carrying them into effect.

In his next annual message, after a year of additional practice under the new law, Mr. Arthur said:

On the 20th of February last, I transmitted to congress the first annual report of the civil service commission, together with communications from several of the heads of the executive departments respecting the practical workings of the law under which the commission had been acting. The good results therein foreshadowed have been more than realized. The system has fully answered the expectations of its friends in securing competent and faithful public servants, and in protecting the appointing officers of the government from the pressure of personal importunity, and from the labor of examining the claims and pretensions of rival contestants for public employment.

President Cleveland said in his message to congress, December, 1886:

The continued operation of the law relating to our civil service has added the most convincing proofs of its necessity and usefulness. It is a fact worthy of note that every public officer who has a just idea of his duty to the public testifies to the value of this reform. Its staunchest friends are those who understand it best, and its warmest supporters are those who are restrained and protected by its requirements.

The limits necessarily assigned to this paper do not permit extracts so copious as I could wish to make from official utterances on this subject, especially from the various cabinet officers; but I ought not to omit the following from the annual report of Mr. Windom, late secretary of the treasury, in December, 1889. He said:

The beneficial influences of the civil service law in its practical workings are clearly apparent. Having been at the head of the department both before and after its adoption, I am able to judge by comparison of the two systems, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the present condition of affairs as preferable in all respects. Under the old plan appointments were usually made to please some one under political or other obligations to the appointee, and the question of fitness was not always a controlling one. The temptations to make removals only to provide places for others was always present, and constantly being urged by strong influences, and these results and the feverish condition of departmental life did much to obstruct and disturb the even current of routine work. Under the instrumentalities which are now used to secure selections for clerical places, the department has some assurance of manly capacity, and also moral worth, as the character of the candidates is ascertained before examination. The manifold duties of the department require the closest application on the part of the secretary and his assistants, and the freedom from importunity now enjoyed for appointments to places that are within the classified service and the saving of valuable time heretofore devoted to the distribution of minor patronage, are of very great advantage and enable those officers to devote more thought to the important questions of administration constantly arising. The clerks received from the civil service commission usually adapt themselves readily to the duties they are called upon to perform and rank among the most efficient in the department.

It may be that some utterance by some member of the cabinets of the last three Presidents, hostile to the law or skeptical of its benefit, may have escaped my search; but I think it safe to say that no such expression can be found, and that it may be stated broadly that the concurrent testimony of those officials has been favorable to the new system. A very remarkable example of this is contained in the late address of the secretary of the navy at the Boston dinner, in which he announced the speedy application of the merit system to the navy yards. To this consensus on the part of heads of departments might be added a vast number of interesting and convincing statements, reports, etc., from other executive officials, both national and state, members of congress, the great public journals and leaders of thought in the country, all in the same direction and to the same effect. Gradually the people have come to understand the true character of the new system. The vigorous administration of the law by the present admirable commission, too, has been its most effective support, and it may be said, I think, at this time, without hesitation or assumption, that the reform has passed the experimental stage and is now an assured success.

A brief statement of the limitations in the customs and postal classified service, and of the extensions and modifications since made in the classification ought now to be made.

The classified customs service on July 16, 1883, embraced only such districts as had as many as fifty officials. The same is true of the classified postal service.

The customs districts were as follows: New York, Boston, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Baltimore, New Orleans, Chicago, Burlington, Vt., Portland, Me., Detroit and Port Huron.

The Portland district was one exception to the general rule, for its officials only numbered twenty-seven. I can not imagine why the exception was made, unless it was that some wise statesman from Maine, who desired to be rid of the pestering annoyance of the seekers for place in the Portland customs house quietly induced President Arthur to lengthen his life and that of the collector by including the Portland customs house in the classified service.

The classified post-offices were twenty-two in number. The number at the present time is fifty.

Whether the number of classified customs districts has been increased I am unable to state; but, by the prompt courtesy of the secretary of the treasury, in reply to an application lately made through the civil service commission, I learn that there are eighteen customs districts having as many as twenty and not more than fifty employes; as follows: Portland, Me., 27 employes; Cape Vincent, N. Y., 20; Oswego, 25; Suspension Bridge, 17; Brownsville, Tex., 26; El Paso, Tex., 24; Galveston, 26; Cleveland, 20; Portland, Oregon, 25; Buffalo, 42; Ogdensburg, 20; Plattsburg, 28; Key West, 37; Corpus Christi, Tex., 23; Eagle Pass, Tex., 20; Cincinnati, 23; St. Louis, 31; Port Townsend, Washington, 42.

I am unfortunately not able to give similar information touching the number of post-offices having as many as twenty and less than fifty employes, although a like application was made to the postmaster-general, as will appear by the following extract from a letter lately received by me from the acting first assistant postmaster-general. It is as follows:

Your letter of the 15th instant, from Narragansett Pier, R. I., addressed to the United States Civil Service Commission, requesting information in relation to post-offices whereat twenty or more employes have been authorized, has been referred to this office.

On your stating the use you desire to make of the information in regard to the postal employes, further consideration will be given to your request. Very respectfully,

E. C. FOWLER,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster General.

It is probable, however, with the great increase of population and business and the extension of the letter carrier system, that there are a large number of post-offices (probably between fifty and sixty) having more than twenty and less than fifty employees.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

W. A. Mitchell testified as follows:

Q. What is your name? A. William A. Mitchell.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) What position do you occupy in this building? A. I am the elevator man, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Now do you remember attending a meeting * * * ? Perhaps I may recall to your mind that there was also present a man named Martin, a Mr. Henry Martin, and a Mr. Harry Glass. I believe they are both letter carriers. A. Yes, sir; and Mr. Reed was there too.

Q. What is his first name? A. Robert Reed; he is foreign clerk; assistant foreign clerk.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Employed here in the post-office? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) This man Robert Reed; he was also present, you say, your fellow clerk? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, at the meeting, first of all, did you meet together by appointment, or did you happen there together accidentally? A. We all came there by appointment.

* * * * *

Q. * * Now, will you tell us, as near as you can remember, what happened at that meeting, at that gathering? A. Well [pause].

Q. Was anything done about the primaries, in the first place, so as to attract your attention? A. Well, we met there in regards to little financial affairs.

Q. Did you agree to pay anybody money? A.

No, sir, we didn't agree to pay anybody any money at all.

Q. There was nothing said, I suppose, there about buying any votes for the primaries, was there? A. Not that I know of. I will tell you my opinion; when you can buy a man's vote, he ain't worth having a vote.

Q. Of course we all know that there has to be some money raised for primaries for legitimate expenses. A. I will tell you, gentlemen, this is the first political job I ever held, and I am green about it; I am as green as that door. I was in the candy business about twenty years before I got this job—in the confectionery business.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) How did you come to get your present position? Who was it recommended you, backed you? A. James W. Bates, the elevator man on President street.

Q. Is he a republican? A. Yes, sir; old Mr. James Bates. His son married my sister, and I have a brother a conductor on the Pennsylvania railroad, and these two spoke for me, and that is how I got the place.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You say you paid $5 to Mr. Martin, a letter carrier? A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time was it that you paid that? A. I think it was the 20th or 21st of the month.

Q. Was that when you drew your money you mean? A. No, sir.

Q. Well, all the gentlemen there that night who were office-holders agreed to pay $5; is that the idea? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you come to that agreement, or those that agreed to pay that much, how did they come to that understanding, do you recollect; it was to be for perfectly legitimate purposes, of course? A. Well, I don't know. When we met there, one of the gentlemen—of course, we all knew what we went there for—

Q. You knew what you went there for? Yes, sir; we had seen one another on the street and had been talking.

Q. What was it you met there for? A. To have a little money; to give a little money free gratis.

Q. For the primaries that are to take place next Monday? A. I don't know what they are going to do with the money, but I have an idea that they were going to use it for the primaries; I don't know; I have only an idea, but it was given free gratis; it wasn't an assessment or anything like that.

Q. It was given perfectly free? A. Yes, sir; yes, sir.

Q. You gentlemen who are connected with the post-office here, who are office-holders, freely gave this money to Mr. Martin? A. Yes, sir; just like we would give it to anybody else.

Q. Precisely, and you agreed on $5 as the right sum, sum, or how was that fixed? A. Yes, sir; we agreed on $5.

Q. Was there any discussion about that there?

Witness. About the $5?

Mr. Roosevelt. No, about settling it; whether the sum should be $5 or was that the sum all the employes were paying? A. That I couldn't say; we didn't have any discussion about it that I remember of.

Q. How did you happen to come to the conclusion that $5 would be the right sum to give? A. Well, I don't know how that was.

Q. Was Mr. Martin the treasurer, or how did he happen to receive the money? A. No, sir; we just—we didn't exactly appoint him, but some one said, I don't know who it was, but somebody says, "Well, who shall it be?" and somebody says, "Mr. Martin; he will take it," and he said, "Yes, sir; I will take it."

Q. Do you recollect how that started; who it was that started the talk about giving the money? A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Did you meet there for the purpose of settling about contributing for the legitimate campaign expenses; wasn't that what you said? A. Let's see—we met there for the purpose of donating some money.

Q. Donating some money with the view to the—? A. (Interposing) To the primaries; yes, sir.

Q. And had there been a formal call for the meeting? A. No more than we would meet one another and say: "You know there's going to be a meeting; you are coming down to the meeting to-morrow night," or something like that.

Q. Did you meet there every Saturday, or was this a specially called meeting? A. I couldn't say whether it was a specially called meeting or not.

Q. Was it a specially called meeting of the whole club, or only just of the officers? A. Just of the officers.

Q. Just a special meeting of you gentlemen who are in office here? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) But that little meeting held in the room was a meeting, merely, of office-holders called there to contribute and settle about contributions for the primaries? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

George W. Sears testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) How long have you been letter-carrier? A. I was appointed on the 18th of August.

Q. Of last August? A. No, sir; August, 1889.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Through our civil service examination? A. Yes, sir. Postmaster Brown appointed me; that is, he reappointed me; he turned me out and reappointed me.

Q. When were you originally appointed? A. I was appointed under Colonel Adreon; I think it was in August; then I was appointed and staid in under Postmaster Veazy and Postmaster Brown, and he—I really actually forget the date—but I worked on that district for sixteen years, and then it was found out that I was inefficient, and I was dismissed to improve the efficiency of the service.

Q. And you were reinstated? A. Yes, sir; so I took an examination last February a year and passed, I believe 87, and they appointed four or five of us old carriers that he dismissed; he appointed us from the examination, and I had to take a substitute again and start at the bottom of the list.

Q. Although you were dismissed to improve the efficiency of the force? A. Yes, sir.

Q. But that was not a bar to your appointment by the same postmaster? A. No, sir; I don't think so. I had a letter here. After my dismissal I got a letter from the postmaster-general when I asked for the charges made against me, and he told me I was discharged to improve the efficiency of the service, although at the same time the carrier that was put there that succeeded me—there was two of them that worked it for awhile—and there was a letter addressed to Mrs. H. G. Stewart, southwest corner of Hoffman and McCulloh streets, and this carrier left the letter at Mrs. Stewart's, southeast corner of McCulloh and Preston streets.

Q. And it was to improve the efficiency of the service that the substitution of him, after your dismissal, was made? A. Yes, sir. So the party who got the letters gave them to me and wanted me to send them to Washington. I told him it wouldn't do me much good, and the postmaster went to work and put these in an official envelope and put an immediate stamp on it and sent it up by another carrier, and wrote a note to the party explaining it, and signed it "Frank Brown, Postmaster."

* * * * *

Q. And at the approaching primaries there is a fight on, on Monday? A. There is a division.

Q. Between the Henderson and Johnson factions? A. Yes, sir; that is about it.

Q. Of course the post-office employes are all interested in the success of the Johnson element? A. Yes, sir; certainly.

* * * * *

John L. Shields testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What is your position? A. I am a letter carrier.

* * * * *

Q. Now, we will not detain you much longer. Do you know of any contributions of money towards the expenses of the approaching primaries being made among the officials here? A. No, sir; I do not.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Have you yourself contributed anything? A. I have sir.

Q. Who was it that asked you for your contribution? A. The executive of the ward, Mr. James H. Marriott; he is not in the department at all.

* * * * *

Q. It was $5, I suppose? A. Yes, sir; that is what I gave.

* * * * *

Q. Has there been any meeting or gathering of the employees of your ward to consider the question of how much they should give, or whether they should give anything? A. I believe there was.

Q. Where did that take place? A. It took place on Carrolton avenue.

Q. At either of these clubs that you have mentioned? A. No, sir.

Q. At a private house? A. Yes, sir; at a private house.

Q. At a private house of one of the employees? A. Indeed, I couldn't tell you whether he is or not.

Q. Were you present at the meeting? A. I was; yes, sir.

Q. And was there any discussion then as to how much that each should give, or how much they should give, or anything of that sort? A. I believe there was something said in regards to what they would give, and it seems to run in my mind that there was some talk about it.

Q. It was made up of these employees of this office who came from the fourteenth ward, wasn't it? A. There were a number of them, I believe, who were employees, that is, of this office, and some of them that were not.

Q. Were there some there from any other public office; some from the custom-house? A. Well, yes, sir; I believe there was.

* * * * *

Q. You say at this meeting it was agreed or talked over as to how much money should be given. Now, was there anything said about who it should be paid to? A. It was paid to Mr. Marriott.

Q. And that was the understanding? A. Yes, sir; that was the understanding.

Q. And that was what you did? A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You say that they were mainly office-holders at that meeting? A. I believe a great number of them were.

Q. Were there any outsiders, non-office-holders, except Mr. Marriott? A. Yes, sir; Mr. Marriott wasn't an office-holder.

Q. But were they all office-holders or active republican workers in that district? A. Yes, sir, I think they were.

Q. Did you meet there by invitation? A. Yes, sir we had notes to meet there.

Q. Who sent these notes? A. Mr. Marriott; they were signed by Mr. Marriott, and I supposed he sent them.

* * * * *

John W. Boulden testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Were you present at a meeting held somewhere on Carrolton avenue, some time about Monday or Tuesday last, at which there was a discussion regarding the amount of contributions that different persons were to make toward the expenses of the primaries? A. I was at a meeting; I was notified to come to a meeting, but it was merely they wanted a little money, I believe, towards ticket-holders, or something of that kind, but I don't know that there was anybody in particular asked to contribute at all, any office-holder or anything of that kind.

Q. Well, these ticket-holders were at the approaching primaries? A. I presume that is what it is.

Q. Who presided at that meeting? A. The executive of the ward was there.

Q. Was he a gentleman named Marriott? A. That's his name; yes, sir; I presume it was Marriott; he was the one, I think, that is executive.

Q. Now, did he receive any money on that occasion, do you know? A. There was some money paid there, and I think it went to him; I am not sure; I came there a little late for the meeting.

Q. To whom did you pay your subscription? A. I just laid it down on a stand that was there; the parties were in there, and I laid it down on the stand there.

Q. It disappeared, I suppose? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Now, what sort of a man is this Mr. Hammond; I mean is he a respectable and truthful sort of a man? A. I have always looked upon him as a very truthful man as far as I know.

Q. Do you know which side he takes in this contest; which side he is on? A. I do not, sir.

Q. He is not a sort of man, you don't think, that would really be on one side and profess to be on the other, is he, from the little that you know of him? A. Well, politics is pretty tricky and I couldn't say.

I have played politics in the ward long before the civil service, and I know things are pretty tricky; they were pretty tricky then, but they have got to be a little better; they are not quite so much so now.

* * * * *

Q. And as far as you were concerned you put your contribution on the desk, and where it went, you are not able to say from your present knowledge? A. No, sir.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Why did you happen to put down $5 exactly? A. I didn't suppose we had to put down that exactly, because there was no assessment at all.

Q. Why did everyone put down that sum? A. That I don't know; I seen that was what they were giving, and I gave $5 too.

Q. Who wrote to you to come to that meeting? A. It was my ward executive.

Q. This man Marriott? A. Mr. Marriott, yes, sir. James L. Webber testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You are a letter carrier? A. Yes, sir; I was appointed 1st of May, 1890.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) What ward do you come from? A. The Seventh ward.

Q. How much, if anything, have you contributed to the expenses of this primary election, this approaching primary? A. Nothing; I am going to contribute.

Q. You have not as yet? A. I am going to contribute.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You have not contributed? A. I have contributed partly, and I am going to contribute some more.

Q. Five dollars is the total amount you were to contribute, isn't it? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much have you contributed? A. I have contributed the whole amount.

Q. And are you going to contribute more than that? A. Yes, sir; some more. I am going to use my own discretion about that.

* * * * *

Q. What was the purpose for which this was to be used? A. I suppose to give the boys a good time for this work they do, so they might enjoy themselves. On Thursday night we had beer and a supper over there to treat the workers.

Q. And you did tell this Mr. Loane? A. I think that is the only one; of course he is a fellow employee, at least he was. He resigned the other day; he got a better position.

Q. Does he belong to your faction or to the other side? A. I am a republican. I don't believe in either faction. I contribute to both clubs, Mr. Stone's club and to Mr. Johnson's club. I don't believe in faction fights at all.

* * * * *

Louis E. Gladfelter testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Are you a clerk in the office here? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. To whom was it that you paid $5? A. I paid $5 very willingly, voluntarily, to a gentleman in the Seventh ward.

Q. And to be used for legitimate expenses? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Not to be used for bribery, or anything like that? A. No, sir; not at all.

Q. But for perfectly legitimate expenses? A. Yes, sir.

Q. This gentleman; what was his name? A. Mr. Bell.

Q. What was his first name? A. That I couldn't tell you; he is an office-holder here. He is a dispatcher in the mailing division here, formerly night superintendent. John Bell, I think it was, I am not sure. I will not be positive about the name.

Q. How did you happen to bring it to him; was he the man that was receiving contributions? A. Not to my knowledge; no, sir. In fact I know of no one who was receiving them.

Q. Was this just simply voluntarily paid? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who else do you know that paid to Bell? A. Not a soul, to my knowledge.

Q. When did you pay it to Bell? A. I paid it to Bell about two weeks ago, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Did you pay him on the streets? A. No, sir; I paid him down stairs.

Q. What time was it that you handed it to him? A. Well, it was in the area way; not in the area way, one of the aisles of the building, going toward the clerk's room; right before going on my time of duty.

Q. Did he speak to you about it? A. No, sir; nobody in the office or any other outsider did. I mentioned the fact to him and I just voluntarily contributed $5 towards defraying the expenses, such as paying for tickets.

* * * * *

Q. Why did you happen to take $5 as the sum to give? Is that the general sum that they are all giving? A. Not to my knowledge. Why I gave the $5, because I could spare five very well; in fact, if I had more money I might give more; I am only what you call a salaried clerk.

Q. What is your salary? A. I get $700 a year.

Q. I think $5 is all you possibly could be expected to give. Did you give any last year, last fall? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much did you give last fall? A. I gave $15.

Mr. Clarkson said not long ago that a boss could not live a year. He should come to Maryland and watch Mr. Gorman's boss-ship. After many years of petty tyranny, Mr. Gorman still controls the smallest details of office-peddling.

Mr. Daniel M. Murray, an estimable lawyer of Howard county, is the last victim. Mr. Murray wished to go to the legislature, and his neighbors wished to send him there; and proved it by carrying the primary for him in spite of Mr. Gorman's expressed desire to have Mr. Murray stay at home. Finding that Mr. Murray was likely to win in the primary, Mr. Gorman in person ordered him to withdraw. Mr. Murray had too much spirit to obey, but Mr. Gorman enforced his order upon a slavish convention, which refused Mr. Murray the nomination to which his victory in the primaries entitled him. People in Maryland somehow, high-spirited as they are proud of calling themselves, endure boss-ship not only one year, but many years.—Civil Service Reformer, August, 1891.

One has to go back ten to fifteen years to remember a time when political activity among office-holders in New York was as great and as open as it is now. * * * Numbers of custom-house deputies are displaying more zeal in working to make Fassett governor than in collecting the revenue for the government. One of them is doing good service in the state committee. The custom-house has become what it was in the old days, a center of political activity.—Philadelphia Ledger (Rep.), September 26.

—Among the members of the Republican State Committee are Mr. J. W. Wadsworth, representative-elect; Mr. C. Van Cott, postmaster of New York; Mr. F. Hendricks, collector of the port of New York; Mr. John A. Quackenbush, representative-elect; Mr. John Collins, deputy surveyor, New York, and Mr. Frank Raymond, deputy collector of New York.

WILLIAM BROOKFIELD, Chairman.
JAMES W. HUSTED, Chairman Executive Committee.
JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Treasurer.
JOHN S. KENYON, Secretary.
REUBEN L. FOX, Chief Clerk.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25, 1891.

DEAR SIR: The Republican State Committee respectfully invites from you such contribution as you may be willing to make toward defraying the legitimate and necessary expenses of the important campaign now in progress in this state.

The clear and explicit platform unanimously adopted at Rochester and the worthy and unexceptionable candidates placed in nomination fairly represent all that is sound and good in the political life of our state, and, it may be confidently assumed, meet the cordial approval of the 700,000 republicans of the state of New York.

When the beneficent policy established by the result of the great national contest of 1888 shall be supplemented by the restoration to power of the republican party in this state, and by the triumph of the reforms for which it has so persistently labored, intelligent and patriotic citizens will find ample reward for all their endeavors in that behalf. To this end a united and harmonious party is beuding its energies. A full vote will insure success; and we invoke such material aid as will enable this committee to conduct the campaign throughout the state in a manner to secure the attendance at the polls on the 3d of November of the vast body of republican electors.

Checks may be drawn to the order of the "Treasurer of the Republican State Committee" and transmitted in the enclosed envelope, addressed to James W. Wadsworth, treasurer, Fifth Avenue hotel, New York. Very truly yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH, Treasurer.

P. S.—We venture to request that you will also write us your views of the political situation in your locality and such suggestions as you may be pleased to make as to needed measures to insure success in the pending campaign.

To the Hon. William Brookfield, Chairman Republican State Committee:

DEAR SIR: The attachment of my name to a circular inviting voluntary contributions for campaign purposes may be considered a violation of the law by me, as I am a congressman-elect from New York state. I, therefore, can not consent to it, and as this may embarrass the committee, I resign the treasurer-ship.

J. W. WADSWORTH

NEW YORK, Oct. 5, 1891.

[Section 11 of the act of Jan. 16, 1883, "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," (chapter 27, Statutes at Large, volume 22, page 403,) is as follows:

"That no senator, or representative, or territorial delegate of the congress, or senator, representative or delegate-elect, or any officer or employe of either of said houses, and no executive, judicial, military, or naval officer of the United States, and no clerk or employe of any department, branch, or bureau of the executive, judicial, or military or naval service of the United States shall directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, clerk or employe of the United States, or any department, branch, or bureau thereof, or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the treasury of the United States."

Section 15 of the same law Says:

"That any person who shall be guilty of violating any provision of the four foregoing sections (including the eleventh, just quoted), shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by such fine and imprisonment both, in the discretion of the court."]

—One question was whether Mr. Wadsworth regarded it as wrong to have his name on that circular. "If a violation of the law is wrong," said Mr. Wadsworth, with a smile, "it was wrong. I resigned as soon as I discovered the mistake."

"But were not all of the circulars sent out by the time your resignation was handed in?" he was asked.

"No. Only those to the post-offices had been sent out."

When asked if he thought that any further action would be taken in the matter, he said that he thought not.—New York Times, October 8.

—Chairman Husted was at his desk yesterday afternoon, and he had numerous callers. Some came in response to the circular, and either brought cash or pledged themselves to make contributions. Yesterday was pay day at the custom-house. One custom-house employe appeared at headquarters and gave up $25, saying that that was the best he could do at present. He was told that that was all right and to do the best he could. Gen. Husted was asked last night if it were true that many employes of the custom-house had been hurrying up to the headquarters with their money.

"Have they?" he answered. "Let them come. We are glad to get money here."

Among the officials who called at the headquarters yesterday were Deputy Collector Gano, Col. Ira Ayers, special treasury agent, and Major Cronkite of the public stores. It was said about the corridors of the Fifth Avenue hotel last night that many federal employes had stepped up to Mr. Platt's headquarters in the course of the day and had settled with those in charge.

Among those who had also placed their names on the headquarters register were Revenue Collector Kerwin, Congressman Julius Caesar Burroughs, of Michigan, who is scheduled to do some campaign talking in this state, and S. P. C. Henriques, United States commercial agent at Cardenas, Cuba.—New York Times, Oct. 2.

—Many of those holding offices received their circulars early yesterday. There were many, notably among the more prominent republicans holding offices in this city, who responded almost immediately. They knew what to expect if they didn't. They hied them to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where the republican headquarters is located, and seemed really cheerful over the prospect of turning over a portion of their salary for the purposes of the campaign.

Among those who came down handsomely were Deputy Collector Charles A. Burr, Assistant Appraiser Eugene W. Pratt, Deputy Surveyor John W. Corning, Special Treasury Inspector Traitteur and Custom Inspector Henry Keeller, II. H. Howe, Captain Benjamin and a lot more. Each one declined to state what percentage of his salary he had been compelled to turn over to the committee. Many of those who have not yet subscribed would like to know just how much is to be taken from them, because as many of them are clerks on comparatively small salaries, they would rather give $3 than $5.—New York Dispatch to Boston Post, October 2.

—Mr. Platt's "voluntary contribution" circular, which practically tells employes in federal offices to step up and settle with his committee for the campaign assessments, has reached the post-office, and almost every clerk there, no matter what his salary may be, has received one.—New York Times, Oct. 7.

—Much credit is due to Postmaster Van Cott for the fine campaign meeting in Hardman Hall on Thursday evening. Mr. Van Cott and the seventh district were on deck early this year; they organized a Fasset and Vrooman club on the very day the nominations were made at Rochester, and they propose to remain there until sunset on election day—New York Tribune [rep], September.

—Few complaints have been made about Gen. Husted's management of the campaign till to-day, when it became generally known that John McMackin, the former labor leader, had been placed in charge of a bureau at headquarters. McMackin received a custom-house inspectorship in return for services to the Republican National Committee in 1888, and it has been charged that he sold out the labor ticket to help Harrison.—New York Evening Post, October 14.

—General Cyrus Bussey, the president of the New York state republican association has appointed the following named as a campaign committee. * General Bussey is the assistant secretary of the interior, and the first two names on his campaign committee are those of A. J. Davidson, the deputy commissioner of pensions under General Raum, and A. X. Parker, deputy attorney-general. These high officials and five others of less prominence are appointed to take charge of political campaign work in getting republican clerks, who live in New York, aroused to the importance of electing the Platt ticket for state officers and perpetuating ring rule in the Empire state.—Washington Dispatch to Boston Post, September 30.

—In the meantime, Collector Fassett has announced that the battle has begun. He left for his home in Elmira on the Northern Central Road this afternoon. He was accompanied by Col. Archie E. Baxter, marshal of the northern district.—New York Times, September 11.

—OGDENSBURG, N. Y., Sept. 29.—J. Sloat Fassett, republican candidate for governor, journeyed to-day from Watertown to Ogdensburg. A meeting of 3,000 persons in the town hall to-night was addressed by Mr. Fassett, Mr. Vrooman, Archie E. Baxter [United States marshal].

—MALONE, N. Y., September 30.—Mr. Fassett and his party left Ogdensburg this morning and arrived here at noon. Five-minute stops were made at Madrid, Norwood, Winthrop and North Lawrence, but the candidate's speeches were little more than "good-morning" and "good-bye" to the crowds which had met at the stations. Mr. Fassett is trying to preserve his voice and avoids speaking in the open air as far as possible. The outdoor oratory devolves upon Col. Archie E. Baxter, of Elmira [United States marshal] and * * —LYONS, N. Y., October 2.—Mr. Fassett, Mr. Vrooman and Colonel Baxter (United States marshal), arrived here this morning.

—Mr. Fassett, Mr. Vrooman and Mr. Baxter (United States marshal), will begin another week of oratory at Oswego to-night. to-morrow afternoon they will appear in Binghamton, to-morrow night at Owego, Cortland Wednesday afternoon, Ithaca, where Andrew D. White will preside, Thursday; Saratoga Friday afternoon, Sandy Hill Friday night, and Troy Saturday.—New York Times, October 12.

—The faction fact in the republican party between S. D. Coykendall and George H. Sharpe broke out in the Ulster county republican convention held here today. The strife came on the organization of the convention.

William M. Hayes said the postmaster of Kingston, who openly and defiantly opposed the election of James G. Blaine, and the collector of internal revenue had taken a trip through the county and juggled to get delegates to the convention. * * *

The result was a Coykendall victory.—[Coykendall is a Platt man.]—Kingston, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 11.

—There is trouble among the republicans of Genesee county on account of a broken slate at the county convention, which met at Batavia to-day. There were many delegates present, and the ticket was thought to be in fine shape to be railroaded through without a hitch. * *

It is street talk that the convention was controlled by Postmaster Tarbox, and it is everywhere declared that there is a rupture in Genesee's republican ranks which it will be hard to heal.—Rochester, N. Y. Dispatch to New York Times, September 29.

—Several hundred delegates to the Scranton convention of the state league of republican clubs left here this morning. The bitterness over this contest is intensified by the fact that only yesterday it was learned that, in the interest of Quay's candidate, who is Congressman-elect Robinson, 250 clubs were secretly organized in western Pennsylvania by federal office holders. Their delegates left for Scranton last night. It is really a fight between Quay and the federal office-holders on one side and Chris. Magee on the other as to who shall represent the party in this state, with Dalzell's ambition to succeed Quay in the senate in the background.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, September 23.

—The way that federal office-holders organized gangs of heelers for the Scranton convention, presented them with free railroad tickets and beer ad lib., as well as paying their hotel bills, etc.—Pittsburgh Post, September.

—Senator Quay came up from his Atlantic City retreat to-day, and the fact of his coming was known only to a few. Gov. Pattison's proclamation called him to the city, and republican leaders from every direction visited room 34 at the Continental as part of that political sympathy that invariably brings the leaders together when the senator is about the city. Chairman Porter, Congressman Reyburn, Marshall Leeds, Collector Cooper and ex-Collector Martin realized early that the situation was something more than serious. Among Senator Quay's callers were Gen. Frank Reeder of Easton, Controller of the Treasury Gilkeson, the close bosom friend who runs Bucks county; Gen. Hastings, whose concern in the result is shown by his engagement as a speaker; Hamilton Disston, Chairman Porter, Collector Warnum, Senators Crouse and Thomas, and Chairman Watres, whom the Senator met later at republican headquarters.

Collector Cooper had the largest end of the conference. He had no sooner emerged from Mr. Quay's room than he said: "Gov. Pattison's action is clearly partisan." That declaration was the keynote to the conference of the afternoon.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, September 28.

—Senator Quay summoned Assistant Postmaster Hughes to the hotel during the morning and about 12:30 o'clock that official and the ex-national chairman met in the state committee rooms.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, October 6.

—Ohio having expressed a desire that the republicans who are in office should contribute of their earnings to help elect McKinley, and Secretary Foster having advised the Ohio state association that Ohio men should do their duty by "the party that put them in office," the Pennsylvania republicans are now making known their wants.

Notwithstanding that Postmaster-General Wanamaker opposed that thing, a list of post-office department employes from Pennsylvania was furnished to the state committee, and one of those clerks yesterday received the following lines:

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE, }
CONTINENTAL HOTEL, Sept. 25, 1891. }

MY DEAR SIR—The importance of the present campaign should not be underestimated. This contest is but a forerunner of 1892. A democratic victory, or even a meager republican majority now, would seriously cripple us in the great tariff battle soon to open. Only a few weeks are left for active work. November 3 being election day, our vast organization must be gotten into line for its best effort on that day. We can not perfect such an organization as is necessary in an "off year" like the present, when there is always more or less difficulty in arousing the people and getting them to the polls unless we receive financial help. Knowing your activity and liberality in behalf of the party, we invite your earliest convenient subscription to the state committee, and we especially request that it be made as liberal as possible. Yours very truly, LOUIS A. WATRES, Chairman.

An officer of the department told a reporter who asked about this letter that Mr. Wanamaker had requested that no such demands be sent to clerks in his department, and intimated that the postmaster-general had informed Mr. Watres that, if he would designate the sum expected to be realized by "voluntary contributions" from his Pennsylvania clerks, he would send a check for the amount. Now, the question is asked whether Watres has not obtained the check, and is also trying to get the "voluntary contribution" in addition.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, September 28.

—The fact is that the county-house ring, the court ring, the government building ring and the city-hall ring got together before that convention and fixed up as late. * * Levi Meacham, Allen T. Brinsmade, Bill Gabriel, Howard Burgess and Mark Hanna simply ran the convention. It would have been better if such men as Brinsmade and Gabriel, holding government offices, had attended to their neglected offices, instead of being present in that convention to steal nominations for ring candidates.—Cleveland, O., Dispatch to New York Evening Post, September 29.

HEADQUARTERS

OHIO REPUBLICAN STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
122 E. State st. (Opposite Government Building),
COLUMBUS, O., Aug. 29, 1891.

—, Esq., Indianapolis, Ind.:

DEAR SIR—The republican executive committee of Ohio is now fully organized and actively at work. Funds are required for this work. The campaign in Ohio is more than a state campaign; it is national in both its importance and effect. The election of the Hon. William McKinley, jr., and his associates on the ticket and a republican general assembly this fall in Ohio, assures a republican success in the campaign of 1892.

You are the incumbent of place made possible by the success of the party in the past. The continued success of the republican party is of great interest and advantage to the whole country, and you, no doubt, appreciate it. A liberal contribution from you as an individual, will largely aid this committee in the furtherance of its work. In the ordinary business affairs of life promptness of payment is absolutely required. Such promptness in our business is equally important. We will be pleased to hear from you at once. Yours truly,

W. M. HAHN, Chairman,

W. S. MATTHEWS, Secretary.

—There has been a systematic effort to impress upon the government employes that they must put up their money for the republican party. Early in the summer Secretary Foster gave them some very broad hints in his speech to the Ohio republican association, and they have been followed since by men with subscription books and begging circulars, at first mild in tone and then approaching the threatening. The last circular was the following notice from Mr. McKinley's agent to come down with their cash:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 7, 1891.

MY DEAR SIR: A meeting of Ohio republicans who are interested in the success of our ticket this year, will be held at the office of McGrew & Small, 623 F street, N. W., on Friday evening October 9. Your presence is earnestly requested.

The necessity of electing Major McKinley by a decisive majority on the issue joined is imperative. The election of a republican legislature is of still greater importance. So the Major says himself, "Self-preservation is the first law of human nature." Don't deceive yourself by thinking you are safe in any event. Show your republicanism and fealty to the party by attending this conference. Very respectfully,

JAMES E. LOWREY.

The result of this call was the coming together of eleven timid Ohio employes of the government, who brought with them $25 in cash with which to placate the growing anger of the tin gods.

Mr. Lowrey is now in a very bad temper. He says that there are 7,000 Ohio employes of the government at Washington, drawing pay aggregating $500,000 per year, and that only thirty of them have contributed to the cause of tin plate and protection. The contributions, he declares, amount to only about one-fifth of one per cent.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 11.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

VOL. I, No. 33.

Published monthly. Publication office, No. 23 N. Meridian St., Indianapolis, Ind. Address,
THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Ind.

TWO NOTABLE events have occurred since the last issue of the CHRONICLE. In one of the cases against the Mahone blackmailers, the government prosecuting officer, after a year, brought to argument a demurrer to the indictment. The district court at Washington unanimously overruled the demurrer, taking the ground that every kind of solicitation of money in a government building for political purposes is unlawful. It is clear that the courts neither mean to legislate nor to interpret the law with a view to helping spoilsmen out of scrapes. The United States supreme court in the Curtis case, the New York court of appeals in the Buffalo cases, and now this district court have in strong and unmistakable terms upheld the civil service laws in their true spirit and object.

The other event is the dismissal by the postmaster-general of some clerks and carriers in the Omaha post-office. It seems that President Cleveland's postmaster appointed a number of these without any regard to the civil service law, and although they had never been on the eligible list. When President Harrison's postmaster came in he also decided that he was greater than the law, and he appointed persons not on the eligible list. The present civil service commission, neither being asleep nor afraid, overhauled him, and on its report the dismissals are ordered. The present postmaster furnished a perfect instance of a spoilsman's "brass," by an effort to "save" the men. It seems that he may have to refund the wages thus unlawfully paid. Of course, President Harrison will dismiss him. A suit should also be brought against the old postmaster to recover the illegal payments under him.

MR. JOHN M. BUTLER, of this city, having been to New York, said in an interview in the Indianapolis Journal:

There are a few extremely good fellows over there, most too good to live, but hardly good enough to die, who are howling about Platt, but they are not seriously disturbing Platt or the party. As I said before, I believe the signs point to a great republican victory in New York.

Mr. Butler is an eminent lawyer, and as such, after a brief consideration of the fact that the federal offices pertaining to the state of New York, including the custom-house, the post-offices, the sub-treasury and the internal revenue collectorships, were placed under the control of Tom Platt, a private citizen, to be used by him in an attempt to carry the recent election, he would say that such an act was wholly unconstitutional, and that a president who turned over offices to be so used was guilty of a gross violation of his official oath. If he pondered the subject further, and from the stand-point of a citizen, Mr. Butler would say that such a practice by a president was unrepugnant in every sense, and that it was an unlawful exercise of imperialism such as this government was formed to prevent. Further, Mr. Butler, still reflecting as a citizen, would say that this practice was dangerous to public order, and that at any time some able manipulator like Quay or Gorman in the presidential chair might think he had the country by the throat, and might try the recent experiment of Balmaceda in Chili, and might make this country incur an outrageous cost of lives and money to put him down.

BUT as a republican, Mr. Butler is instantly purblind and strabismic. He does not examine and judge the acts of his own party. Dorseyism and Dudleyism in Indiana apparently have never crossed his view. The stupendous violation of the promise of the republican platform, of which Plattism is one glaring instance, apparently is unseen by him. To say that he knows of these things, and is not goaded by his conscience into a protest which could but be powerful, would be to say that he is grossly recreant to his duties as a citizen. His position is that of a man of wide influence, whose judgment ought to be sound, but who can always be depended upon at critical moments to say that Plattism is harmless and to give color of respectability to any republican machine, however vicious. It is a good thing for the country that it has a large and increasing number of men who are "hardly good enough to die." They will live on, and will, in time, destroy Plattism, which is but another name for our buccaneering spoils system. And Mr. Butler and many other respectable citizens like him, will be ashamed that it was done, not only without them, but in spite of them.

UNHAPPY HEADSMAN CLARKSON can only expect jeers as he stands among his 40,000

decapitated postmasters and sees his state of Iowa, which has had his peculiar care in abundance, gradually placing itself in the democratic column. In Pennsylvania, when Quay had the support and sympathy of the administration last year, he was defeated; this year he lost that, but he has been successful. He has his heel again on the necks of the people of his state. Every good citizen may rejoice at the defeat of either party in New York. Taking the elections together, the result of the national election next year is extremely doubtful. This will make it impossible to ignore the subject of civil service reform, which both party machines would like to do. Every vote will be needed. Those members of both parties who have been trying to bring it about that the tariff shall be the only "issue," while the real prize to be fought for is the hundreds of millions of spoil in federal salaries, will have to abandon their ground. The chief business of the president of the United States is the management of the civil service. How he is likely to do that is the chief question to be determined in voting for a presidential candidate. The president's use of the federal service as spoil to divide among his relatives and personal and party friends is going to be broken up. Happily the opponents of this relic of absolutism, so detrimental to public morals, will be needed next year by both parties in several close states. Neither party can afford to alienate its share of this element.

"The reform of the civil service auspiciously begun under a republican administration should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions, which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

The more this promise is examined, the more magnificent it seems. It could not have been made stronger if written by the civil service reformers themselves. Indeed, it was written by George William Curtis. Having been inserted into the republican platform of 1888, after a steady four years insistence against a democratic administration that similar ante-election promises ought to be kept, there was a double reason for supposing it was put there to be carried out. President Harrison publicly made this promise his own. He has in fulfillment placed about seven hundred places in the Indian service under the reform system along with the thirty-two thousand already there. On the other hand he has supplanted more than 100,000 federal employes with his relatives or with his personal or party friends and all for personal or partisan reasons. He has turned out such men as Pearson, Burt, Graves, Saltonstall and Corse, whose sole object was to render faithful service. He appoints such men as Flanagan, of Texas. He neglects to require the Mahone blackmailers to be brought to trial. He ignores the most flagrant violations of law in Baltimore. He turned the federal service in Virginia over to Mahone, in Pennsylvania to Quay, in New York to Platt, to be used in attempts to carry elections. The time is approaching when the account must be taken, and these are examples of facts which must be put into the scales on the good or bad side respectively. Civil service reformers have long memories.

AMONG the publications of the month, Mr. Herbert Welsh has an article in the current Forum on "The Degredation of Politics in Pennsylvania," which is a statement of facts full of humiliation to that state.

The executive committee of the National Civil Service Reform League, some time ago put out a circular letter containing a brief statement of the present status of the merit system in the federal service. The salaries of the entire service amount to over one hundred millions a year, of which about forty millions are attached to places in the classified service.

Speaking of the merit system, the letter says:

"It is objected that this system is English and aristocratic. The system prevailing in England at the time of the American Revolution was the patronage system. Under that old system the chief offices were controlled by the great aristocratic families. The reform which was begun about 1854, was a movement on behalf of the common people of England, and was resisted by those families who had up to that time the monopoly of the offices. The present reformed system is most popular among the masses of the English people, who now have a fair opportunity of getting the offices under conditions that make them subservient to no man for his gift or influence. Under the reformed civil service, sons of poor men, without social or political influence, have an equal opportunity with the rich and prominent of getting appointments, and depend solely on their own character and ability."

The object of the letter is to call public attention to the need of an additional appropriation for the civil service commission. The commission needs a force of clerks of its own instead of clerks detailed to it from the departments, and it needs more clerks to enable it to mark all examination papers in Washington, a plan which would manifestly secure uniformity and, in places less fortunate than Indianapolis in local boards, fairness.

PRIVATE-SECRETARY HALFORD, when editor, but not manager, of the Indianapolis Journal, is said to have replied to the question why the Journal persisted in a certain palpably wrong course, "For the reason, I suppose, that only a mule refuses to change his mind." It is not certain that even this excuse can be given for the course of the administration towards Chili. Balmaceda was a president who tried, by using the public service, to perpetuate himself as a boss. His murder of citizens has no parallel except in the Turkish bow-string. His removal of the judges was about as if President Harrison should remove the judges of the United States courts. Such acts at once fixed Balmaceda's standing throughout the world as a violent usurper, bent upon breaking down the liberties of the Chilians. There was not a shadow of excuse for sympathy with him on the part of our government. We should have meted to him, as a de facto power, the strictest letter of international law, and our one wish should have been that the Chilians might succeed in putting this murderous boss under their feet. In fact, our government sympathized with Balmaceda. It assumed an attitude of hardened indifference regarding the people of Chili, and treated it as a foregone conclusion that the dictator was to succeed. Its protection of the persons executing Balmaceda's order to cut the cable yet waits an explanation to bring it within the rules of neutrality. When the dictator was overthrown and the blunder of our government became a glaring and humiliating fact, it might have made a frank acknowledgement by recalling its reckless minister. But seemingly on the principle that only the mule refuses to change its mind, it still keeps him in a place where the only effectual thing he does is to exasperate the people with whom we ought to be friends. An attack follows upon our sailors who are wholly innocent. This would occur in any city in the United States under the same circumstances. We are sending ships to Chili and are talking about her "insolence." Whatever the law requires for the attack upon our blameless sailors, that Chili must render. But that does not alter the fact that the people of this country are glad that the people of Chili overthrew their dictator, nor the fact that our government managed to throw its influence and sympathy in favor of a boss attempting to carry bossism to its legitimate end, nor the fact that Minister Eagan's office was given to him, not for his fitness, out of spoil allotted to him for partisan service.

THE DUTY NEXT YEAR.

A subscriber writes from Providence, Rhode Island:

Enclosed find postal note for subscription for one year. I send it gladly in view of the good fight you are making, but I never read the CHRONICLE without a feeling, almost bitter, that your influence should have been used in behalf of Harrison instead of Cleveland two years ago. I believe the treachery of the Hill democrats would not have defeated Cleveland had the reformers and independents in New York solidly supported Cleveland.

No doubt the course of Cleveland in regard to the civil service, especially in Maryland and Indiana, was obnoxious to the reformers in those states, but what have the latter gained by the change? You know as well as anybody. Look at the open and undisguised activity of federal officials in party politics, caucuses, conventions and campaigns over the whole country; the assessment circulars sent to federal employes by republican state committees of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio; the power of Quay, Platt, Clarkson, Belden with the President; the failure to extend the provisions of the civil service law; the complete looting of the federal civil service; the failure to punish violators of the law in Virginia and Maryland; the deliberate violation by the President of his letter of acceptance, and of the pledges of the convention which nominated him. * * * All of which would have been prevented had Cleveland been elected, and you have a record calculated to make a man feel bitter. The mischief has been done and republican defeat next year will not undo it. The reformers trusted in the promises of a bigoted, narrow minded, petty Indiana politician and a corrupt and rotten party, turned over to Quay, Dudley, Platt, Belden and the like, and they have their reward.

With the correction of the inference that this paper took part in the campaign of 1888 (it was not in existence), and adding also the fact continually forgotten that the reason of more weight than all others with those referred to by our correspondent for supporting Harrison, was to avoid a ratification of the acts of the late administration, we wish to examine whether it is true to say, regarding the action of any who may have supported Mr. Harrison on account of his pledges and the pledges of the republican party, because both the President and his party have since violated those pledges, that "the mischief has been done and republican defeat next year will not undo it." We claim that the end of the spoils system is nearer at hand, and that the merit system is stronger among the people at large than ever before, and that this advance is the "reward" of the reformers who believed in taking Mr. Harrison and his party at their word; that equally it is true that the republican President and the republican party have been seriously discredited by their broken pledges, and their "reward" has come in the shape of several defeats already and a rather gloomy looking future.

Every one has a right to assume that the promises of a platform and of a candidate will be kept until by actual performance they are violated and then he has no right to apologize for the violation. No personal devotion to a president, no affection for a party, should stay the exposure of the facts, nor the unbiased comment on those facts. If a party or a president has played a confidence game to win votes, or has shown pusillanimity in meeting the worse elements of the party and failed to keep the pledges made to win the better elements, let all the world know these facts and it is not civil service reform nor its advocates who will suffer. But the fatal mistake is to ignore, to excuse, to change the point of view, and to feel because one accepted in good faith the solemn pledges of a party or a man he has got to "stick" to both.

If the men who voted and worked for Mr. Harrison had blinked his short-comings and sighed over the "pressure" brought to bear upon him, had expatiated on how he was constantly "deceived" by his friends, and finally had maintained that he must not, as a working President, fall between two stools, but could do his sworn duty only as he could carry his party along with him, civil service reform and reformers would indeed be now discredited.

Such a position has been for years the great blunder in fighting the spoils system. Timid reformers in 1884 said the candidate could not withstand his party and a party so hungry and thirsty for spoils must be longer excluded from power; later the reform ranks were too full of apologists, who seemed to labor night and day to show that the President really had not promised much, and that while things could not be explained in a couple of states the fault, if fault there was, was in the inability of the sufferers to get their troubles to the presidential ear. Every spoils act of President Cleveland and his party when explained to the people without malice and without excuse helped the reform and only injured him and his party, and it was only when so large a number of civil service reformers could not withstand the temptation to explain away what seemed entirely plain to practical spoils politicians, that the cause was weakened. So far as we know the personal and political friends, and he has a good many, of President Harrison, among the civil service reformers who supported him, have never sought to excuse him or his acts. They have regretted the fact that he should seize the civil service as spoil to perpetuate party, or personal ascendancy, but they have never sought to shield him from the moral consequences of his acts.

But comparisons are profitless, except as they bear upon the practical question of what a man is to do next year, if he believes that the spoils evil is now the greatest evil to be crushed, and he desires the most of all to bruise the head of the serpent in the way to wound him most sorely. Suppose Mr. Cleveland is the democratic candidate, as now seems likely, and he and his party declare themselves in favor of the present law, say that it shall be enforced in letter and in spirit, and that its provisions shall be materially extended; and the republican candidate and platform try to ignore the question, or are less explicit and vigorous than in the platforms of 1884 and 1888; the wise civil service reformer does not dwell on the errors of the late administration and say because that administration failed once, he will continue to be timid and suspicious. Instead, he acts upon the supposition that Mr. Cleveland and his party have profited by experience, and that they will probably avoid the mistakes they made before. It is a very dull man who learns nothing by experience, and Mr. Cleveland is not dull.

On the supposition that the pledges of both candidates and both platforms are satisfactory, he certainly will not lose the opportunity to nail the present "chicken hawk to the barn-door," as a warning and a lesson. And if the democratic party should succeed and if its administration should break its promises as the republican administration has done, nevertheless civil service reform would have been advanced over what it would be to ratify or condone the division of over 100,000 federal places and salaries, amounting to hundreds of millions, as spoil.

THE DIVORCE OF MUNICIPAL BUSINESS FROM POLITICS.

[A paper read by Moorfield Storey before the National Civil Service Reform League, at Buffalo, September 30.]

Every American is brought up to believe two things: First, that we are par excellence a business people pre-eminently endowed with what we are pleased to call "sound business sense," and, second, that we invented and understand better than any other nation the art of self-government. These are fundamental articles in our national creed, comfortable household beliefs that are handed down from father to son and we cling to them with unquestioning faith. Yet how shall we reconcile them with the fact that our large cities are without exception badly governed, and in many instances disgracefully governed? When we are applying the principle of self-government most directly, where the people are nearest to their agents and feel their neglect or mismanagement most keenly, our "sound business sense" deserts us and we fail lamentably.

What are the causes of this failure? How can we secure good municipal government? No more important questions confront the American people to-day, and they must be answered.

These questions concern not merely the dwellers in the cities who suffer the immediate effects of bad government, but every citizen of this country, for a city which is governed by corrupt men is a plague spot that infects the whole body politic. Baltimore dominates the state of Maryland; New Orleans exercises a baleful influence over Louisiana. Nor is the evil stayed by state lines; a corrupt city government may poison the politics of the whole country. Tammany Hall rules the city of New York. It claims the power to elect and defeat Presidents, and so to shape the policy of the country. The candidate who refused to promise all that its leaders demand of office or public plunder may well owe his defeat to their opposition or their treachery, and so the result of a close election may be determined by men who care nothing for the questions at issue, nothing for the vast interests at stake, nothing for the welfare of the country, but who are mere political mercenaries ready to fight for the party which offers the highest wages, and unlike the free companions of the middle ages, ever willing to desert their standard in the midst of a battle, if desertion seems likely to be profitable. It is mortifying to think how many months and years of honest and earnest effort to educate the people upon such vital issues as tariff reform and financial honesty may be brought to naught by a miserable bargain made in the city of New York. It is humiliating to reflect that the national conventions of great parties may be governed in their choice of a candidate for the highest office in this country by the supposed necessity of conciliating men like Tweed and John Kelly. Indeed, the very existence of republican government may almost be said to be at stake. If the people of a single city, whose associations, traditions, education and interests are more nearly identical than those of widely separated communities can ever be, are unable to manage their common business with reasonable honesty and success, what hope is there that the experiment will continue to succeed on an enormously greater scale with communities as widely separated as Maine and California?

QUESTIONS OF PURE BUSINESS.

The officials who administer the government of a city deal with pure business questions. It is their duty to see that the air which we breathe is unpolluted, that the water which we drink is pure, that our sewers do not fill our houses with poison, that the streets upon which we walk are well paved and clean, that their use is properly regulated so as to preserve the respective rights of pedestrians and those who ride in public or private conveyances, that our lives and property are protected by efficient police, that fires are prevented and extinguished, that the new uses of electricity for light, power, and the transmission of intelligence are carefully guarded so as to give the public the service which it needs without undue risk to the citizen; that our schools are well conducted; that the spread of infectious diseases is checked; that we are not injured by unwholesome food and drink; that our feet are not obstructed by snow on the sidewalks, nor our heads crushed by ice from the roofs. From birth to death, at home, at school, in the street, in the theater, in church, eating, drinking, breathing, sleeping, walking, sick or well, at every moment of our lives, our health, our safety, and our property depend very largely on the excellence of our city government. Not merely the necessities, but the luxuries of life, libraries, art museums, parks, music, architecture, painting and sculpture, are within the sphere of municipal government. If that government is inefficient and corrupt, we feel it at every turn in our daily life; if it is efficient and honest, all our lives are made easier. If we give the subject a moment's thought, we can not but see how large a part of the business which concerns us all most nearly is entrusted to our municipal governments.

There is nothing in the nature of things which makes it impossible to govern a city well. If we cross the ocean and examine what some of us like to call "the effete monarchies of the old world," we shall find that the business of ruling a city is well understood. The streets of London and Paris, and even Liverpool, seem surprisingly clean to any one who is familiar with the streets of an American city. The sewers of Paris are models, and the efficiency of the French police is proverbial. The disastrous conflagrations which so constantly lay waste large sections of our cities and towns, are almost unknown on the continent of Europe. Illustrations might be multiplied, but Glasgow and Birmingham deserve more than a passing mention, for they are conspicuous examples of the successful application to municipal affairs of that "sound business sense" upon which we so unreasonably plume ourselves.

GLASGOW'S MODEL GOVERNMENT.

In Glasgow we have a city which in 1888 had about 560,000 people, in an area of some 6,100 acres, so that it may well be compared with several of our American cities. The population is extremely dense and dwells largely in tenement houses, so that the conditions are extremely unfavorable to cleanliness and health, and there is nothing in the character of the population which makes it especially easy to govern. It is possible in this paper to give only the briefest summary of the work which the city government does, and does well.

The public health is secured by a large force of trained inspectors, some of whom seek for cases of infectious disease; others search for nuisances, such as defective drains and unwholesome accumulations; others who are women go from house to house among poor families and make suggestions as to house-keeping methods, and others still are night inspectors who visit lodging houses to see that the laws against overcrowding are respected. Their labors to prevent disease are supplemented by admirable hospitals, of which the latest is a model. There is a sanitary wash-house, where infected articles are cleansed and from which disinfecting operations are directed at the houses where cases of disease have occurred. Nor should we overlook the house where families are received while their houses are being disinfected. The results of this system are excellent.

The street cleaning department sweeps 181 miles of streets nightly; cleans 11,000 private courts and passage ways at least once a day; waters the streets; removes refuse of every kind at least once a week; burns what can not be used for fertilizing purposes; sells what can be so used, and does all this work at a net expense to the citizen of 35 cents a head, the total cost, including interest on the city's outlay of $600,000 for plant, being $370,000, which was reduced by sales of manure and the tax levied on the owners of private courts to $190,000.

The city has dealt with its worst and most crowded neighborhoods, where in some places the population was 1,000 to an acre, by buying the property, opening wide streets, laying out parks and squares, and selling the land left after the improvements. This work has been done on a large scale at a very reasonable cost, and with great benefit to the moral and physical health, as well as to the appearance of the city.

Not only have old tenement houses been demolished, but new ones have been built, and the city owns and conducts not less than seven lodging-houses, furnishing some 2,000 beds, and accommodating annually nearly 700,000 lodgers at a charge per night of from six to nine cents, according as the lodger prefers one sheet or two. For this each lodger has a separate apartment, a woven wire mattress, the use of a large sitting-room, a locker for provisions, and a chance to cook his food on the kitchen range, while everything is beautifully neat.

This experiment not only has raised the whole standard of lodging accommodations, but pays a net income of four or five per cent. on the investment of some $500,000, after making a proper annual charge for deterioration.

Another department deserves mention. Some $600,000 has been spent in the erection of five public baths, in each of which are large swimming baths for men and women, in charge of competent swimming masters, and kept open with water at a uniform temperature throughout the year. To these are added private bath houses and wash houses, where a woman for two pence an hour can have the use of the most improved washing, drying, and mangling apparatus operated by steam, and at the end of her hour go home with her clothes washed, dried, and ironed. This system takes from the houses of the poor a prolific source of discomfort and domestic difficulties, for washing done by the wife in the family living rooms is a process which exhausts her strength and tries her temper, while it is exasperating to the husband and everyone who is compelled to eat or stay for any purpose in an atmosphere of steam and sloppiness.

The gas problem is also dealt with on business principles. The city owns the works, and between 1869 and 1870 so conducted them as to increase the consumption of gas 140 per cent., while the increase in population has been only twenty per cent.; and to reduce the price from $1.14 to sixty-six cents per thousand feet. The leakage has been reduced by one-half. Not only the street but private courts and passages and even the common stair cases in tenement houses are lighted at the public expense, with very marked results in diminishing crime and increasing the comfort and security of the people. The city lets gas stoves to citizens at a moderate price, which the poor who live in tenements find very convenient; and all this is done so economically that the city can operate the works, construct new ones, pay interest on its debt, charge off large sums for depreciation, and accumulate a sinking fund which in fifteen years has paid nearly $3,000,000 towards the cost of the investment.

The street railway question, which has embarrassed us so much in America, has been settled on a business basis. The city has built and owns the railways and lets them to a company. The lease made in 1872 expires in 1894, and the company pays as rental and interest on the city's investment, a yearly sum for a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal before the expiration of the lease; a sum for repairs and renewals equal to four per cent. on the cost of the road, out of which it is kept in repair; and in addition a rental of $750 a mile. The fares are fixed at a penny a mile and a penny for certain routes which in some cases are more than a mile long, and on which cars are run in the morning and at night for workmen at half price. The original lessees sold this lease for $750,000, and yet the purchasing corporation after some hard years began to pay dividends which since 1880 have been from nine to eleven per cent. a year. After 1894 the city will own the tramways in perfect order, and their cost will have been paid, some $1,700,000, so that hereafter they will be a source of large revenue to the city.

Equal intelligence has been shown in providing the city with the water of Lock Katrine, and the works have been so managed as to pay for their maintenance and partly for their cost, which will in course of years be provided for, while the rates have been reduced. The pressure is such that the expenses of the fire department have been so much reduced that the saving in this item alone more than equals the interest on the entire cost of the water-works.

WATCH THE CORPORATIONS.

This is a brief resume which shows what can be done by the intelligent application of business principles to the conduct of municipal affairs. The success of this experiment is peculiarly interesting to us. One of the greatest dangers which beset our system arises from the existence in our cities and states of large aggregations of capital, whose owners have interests at variance with those of the general public. A street railway monopoly or a great gas or water company is naturally anxious to make as much money as possible and to secure whatever privileges will aid in the accomplishment of this object. The public, on the other hand, which gives such a corporation its franchises, which permits it to use the streets and grants its various rights, is anxious in return to get the best possible accommodation at the lowest possible price. The attempts of the corporation to secure new privileges and the use of those already granted should be carefully watched in the public interest, so that the fulfillment of the obligations may be secured. On the other hand, there are always demagogues or honest fanatics or venal politicians who suggest unreasonable demands on the corporation, which the persons interested in the latter consider attacks upon their vested rights. There is inevitably a conflict of interest, and out of this grows the danger that the corporations will feel themselves obliged to gain their ends defensive or offensive by corruption, and that dishonest men will seek municipal office in order to be corrupted. When legislation is for sale, no man and no private or public right is safe, and it is important therefore to have as few great corporations which may be tempted to corrupt as possible.

Take another example. Birmingham is a city a little larger than Boston. Here we find liberal parks, but to those we are not unused on this side of the Atlantic; swimming baths "which offer larger swimming facilities than the people of New York City ever possessed within doors in public or private baths along shore or in town" (to quote from Mr. Ralph in Harper's Magazine) and every convenience for bathing is afforded at the most moderate cost. Here also are libraries, an art gallery and museum, enriched, it is true, by donations from private citizens but supported at the public expense. Here again the gas works belong to the city, and while charging reduced rates to the consumer, who now pays about sixty cents a thousand feet, they yield a handsome profit for the city on their large cost.

Birmingham also, like Glasgow, has bought up bad neighborhoods and laid them out again at large original cost, but so that the enterprise will prove pecuniarily very profitable, while its main objects, the prevention of disease and the discouragement of crime, have been accomplished and the death rate of the city has been reduced more than one-half.

The difficulties of draining a large inland city have been grappled with and overcome. The little river into which it naturally drained was wholly insufficient for a large population, and in consequence a new system was necessary. The city accordingly acquired a farm of 1,200 acres, into and through which all sewage is conducted by a conduit and system of filtration. In this way the sewage is purified and the farm fertilized, so that its products are sold for nearly $125,000 a year, a little less than half the cost of operating the system. All household waste is removed and treated so that what is useful is sold and the rest is buried or made by melting into paving material.

Here again street railways are owned by the city and rented at a profit; and the finances of the city are so administered that the burden of taxation is not severe, while the debts incurred in carrying out its great improvements are in a fair way of being paid.

Each of these cities are governed by a council consisting of a large number of members who serve without pay, and as the best citizens are elected to these offices it is considered an honor to serve the city. These cities succeed in getting able and honest men to manage their business, and in consequence it is managed well.

NEW YORK ONE OF THE WORST.

What do we do? Let us take for example the city of New York, the largest and richest city that we have, the center of our business intelligence and activity. What is true of New York is approximately true of our other cities, though misgovernment is more effectively organized there than in any other city except perhaps Baltimore. New York is governed by the political organization which from the name of its headquarters is called Tammany Hall, and this in turn is controlled by its executive committee. This organization is not interested in the great questions of national politics, the tariff, the finances, or any foreign or domestic question of national interest. It calls itself democratic, but in recent years its power has been more often used to defeat than to elect the democratic candidate for President. It is really, to use a slang phrase of its own invention, a "combine" of men who wish to live on the city of New York, and who consider it no sin to labor in their vocation. Their purpose is simply to get as large a sum out of the city treasury as they can, and their success has been phenomenal. The New York Evening Post has done a great public service by publishing the records of the twenty-eight men who compose the executive committee of Tammany. Its summary shows that they are all professional politicians, and that among them are one convicted of murder, three men who have been indicted for murder, felonious assault and bribery respectively; four professional gamblers, five ex-keepers of gambling houses, nine who either now or formerly sold liquor, three whose fathers did, three former pugilists, four former rowdies, and six members of the famous Tweed gang. Seventeen of these hold office seven formerly did, and two are favored contractors. From a corrupt tree must come corrupt fruit. Is it strange that the government of New York is bad? Is it not strange, is it not disgraceful, that such men should be suffered to govern the metropolis of our country, and through the bargains by which they sell the votes of their followers and buy city offices to very largely affect the government under which we all live?

Every city government is not as bad as that of New York, but everywhere, with the rare exception, inferior men are elected to municipal office, and any man, however little his education or his previous training may have fitted him for the work, is considered competent to deal with the complicated problems of municipal government. A succession of men more or less incompetent follow each other at brief intervals over the stage, and as a result, there is no consistent economical administration of a city's business. In Boston, as a gentleman who has recently been studying the operation of the various departments said, "the methods are such that no business house could adopt them and keep out of bankruptcy six months."

We are badly governed because we choose incompetent, dishonest or at best inexperienced men to govern us. We all admit the fact. We all lament it. What is the remedy? Is it possible that a great business people like ourselves is powerless to change this state of things? Must we look forward to an indefinite future of tame submission to saloon-keepers and actual or probable convicts? Is there no chance of a new anti-slavery movement in which we, the slaves, shall rise against such masters?

No one can answer these questions without first clearly apprehending the causes which have brought us to our low estate, nor are these difficult to discover.

In the first place the average American takes very little interest in the government of his city. He will work hard and contribute freely of his time and money in a presidential campaign, or in the effort to elect a governor or congressman, though these offices have less power over his daily life than the alderman who represents his ward. If elected a member of a club, committee, or a parish committee, or the building committee of some charitable institution, he will give the most conscientious attention to his duties. He will work hard as the director of a business corporation in which his pecuniary interests are trifling as compared with his stake of family health and comfort and security in the municipal corporation of which he is a member. He will take hours and perhaps days from his business in order to select the hangings, or carpets, or furniture for his own house, which are mere matters of taste, but he will not often give an hour in the course of a year to the intelligent consideration of his city's business. He will grumble at dust, swear at bad water or foul smells, vote for his party candidate if he can do so without too much inconvenience, complain of his taxes, and think that he has done his full duty. Every follower of Tammany voted for their chief on election day; 30,000 excellent citizens neglected to vote against him and Mr. Astor said that he had no political interest in New York.

THE CAUSE OF APATHY.

We must go deeper, however. What are the causes of this indifference? Can we hope to overcome it or must it be dealt with as a constant factor in our problem? It arises partly from the fact that municipal politics seem petty as compared with national politics, partly from the fact that they have been so many years in bad hands that a certain stigma in the minds of many persons is attached to men who are active in them, partly from the discouragement caused by repeated failures to dislodge bad men and the feeling that it is idle for a few disorganized citizens to contest the field with the well disciplined army which obey the "bosses," and in some cases from sheer laziness. It is not that Americans do not know what good government is or that they do not want it. It is not that they are content with their rulers, but they find it easier to pay a little more in taxes, to swallow a little dust, to breathe a little foul air, and to treat disease as inevitable, than to spend in working for the public time and money for which no one thanks them, and which are taken from lucrative business or from rest and recreation.

Another cause which blinds the eye of the citizen and paralyzes his energy is the idea which politicians so carefully cherish that political parties should carry their contests into municipal elections, that if a man in favor of tariff reform he must vote for the Tammany candidate for mayor, or if he favors the McKinley bill that he can not safely support a candidate for mayor who is selected from the democratic party. The superstition goes so far that men who joined the republican party in 1856 because they were opposed to the extension of slavery into the territories and who supported it because they believed in the abolition of slavery and the restoration of the Union, feel bound twenty-five years after all these objects are accomplished to vote for a republican candidate for sheriff whom they know to be entirely unfit for the office. If their arguments were extended in plain English it would astonish them. "I believed in the restoration of the Union and the abolition of slavery twenty-five years ago, and therefore, I vote for a man now who had nothing to do with either and whose business it is to keep our streets clean simply because he calls himself a republican, though I know that he is incompetent. In short, I am still so busy restoring the Union and freeing the slaves, that I have no time to think of clean streets or pure water."

A third cause of our trouble may perhaps best be illustrated by a comparison. A manufacturing corporation, whose stock-holders include republicans, democrats, prohibitionists and mugwumps, desire a president. Those who are interested choose some man of acknowledged ability, and without asking what his political opinions are say to him: "Become our president and we will pay you adequate salary; we will give you the assistance of the best directors that we can select from our own members; you shall have power to manage our business as you think best, subject to their advice, and if you succeed you shall keep the place as long as you like." The city seeking a mayor says to the same man: "Do you wish to become our mayor? You must first agree to pay a large sum to the campaign fund for expenses; you must then satisfy the heads of certain factions that they and their followers have something to gain by your election, as they are practical men who are not to be satisfied with vague expressions of good will and will want something very definite. You must then take the chances of a campaign in which all your sins and many which you have never committed will be marshaled against you in the daily papers, and you will be exposed to every kind of misrepresentation. If you are elected, we shall give you very small pay and a board of directors who will be incompetent to help you and entirely competent to embarrass and perplex you at every turn. You will receive plenty of criticism from every corrupt politician whose demands you either can not or will not gratify, but little or no encouragement or support from good citizens who are too busy with their own affairs, or too modest to give you much attention or assistance or even applause, and who treat your good works as a matter of course, while they are swift to visit on you not only your own sins, but the shortcomings of every city official; and when your term is over and you are beginning to learn the duties of your office, we will remove you in order to put some other unfortunate victim in your place." Is it surprising that the private corporation gets its president, and the city is obliged to look elsewhere for its mayor?

MUNICIPAL PROBLEMS AND POLITICS.

There are three motives which may induce good men to take public office: The desire for money, the desire for honor, and public spirit, or the sense of duty. We appeal to neither. Our salaries are inadequate even if we could promise a tenure of office during good behavior. Municipal office has ceased to be regarded as especially honorable, and however keen may be his sense of duty, it is difficult to persuade a public spirited citizen that he ought to seek municipal office and engineer his own campaign. Until the people whose business is to be done are sufficiently interested in having it done well to select good officers, elect them, and keep them in office by proper support, our citizens will continue to be governed by incompetent men and persons who make office profitable in illegitimate ways.

There is another thing which can not be neglected in enumerating the causes which contribute to misrule in our cities. They contain a large number of ignorant voters, mainly of foreign birth or descent, many of whom know nothing of our government or even of our language, and who are easily led by a few men whose influence is for sale and whose prejudices are easily inflamed. These men are ignorant, not wicked. They can be influenced for good as well as for bad. They do not want bad water, bad air, and squalid abodes. They do not wish to see their families die of infectious disorders, and if they could be made to understand the facts they would be ready to vote for everything which will improve their condition. Their numbers make them an element in the situation which must be considered and dealt with. How are these causes to be dealt with? How shall we reform our system so that the business of our cities may be done by competent men? These are the questions.

In the first place municipal business must be entirely divorced from national politics, and if party organizations are necessary to secure the elections of good mayors and aldermen, they must be organizations absolutely distinct from the national parties and made up on different lines. When the president of a railroad or a bank, or the treasurer of a manufacturing corporation is to be elected, the stockholders do not divide themselves into two hostile camps according to their views upon the tariff or the fisheries or their opinions upon the questions of twenty-five years ago and struggle for victory over each other. They recognize the fact that their interests in the corporation are identical, and they co-operate to find some man whose ability and experience fit him to superintend the corporation's business. If differences arise among them they are differences of opinion as to the comparative fitness of different candidates, but no one denies that the fittest man should be selected. There is a close parallel between the business of a great railroad corporation and the business of a great city. Both require great administrative and financial ability; skill in the selection of men, power of organization, and force of will. The ability to organize a force which will run trains for freight and passengers economically and efficiently is not in kind different from the ability to organize a force which will clean or pave streets regularly and well. The ability to secure the best results from a given expenditure of money in well-built railroads and strong bridges is of the same character as the ability to get like results from a similar expenditure in well constructed sewers or water-works. The men who can deal successfully with rival companies competing for his business can meet with equal success the demands of street railway companies or gas companies competing with each other to obtain franchises from the city. The same financial skill which preserves the proper ratio between the income and expenses of a business corporation will find ample opportunity to display itself in dealing with the finances of a municipal corporation.

Railroading, as it is beginning to be called, is a profession which offers to those who adopt it a definite career. The opportunities are great, but he who would seize them must fit himself for the work by special training. The Pennsylvania company has its own college at Altoona, where young men can learn the business of managing a railroad. The graduates of this college begin at the foot of the ladder and gradually climb up. The man who wishes to superintend a woolen mill or a paper mill begins as a hand, in his father's mill perhaps. In every private business men recognize the necessity of learning how the work should be done before they begin to do it. This is equally true of the business which is done for a city, but here we act as if no training were necessary. Why should not our cities offer young men who will learn how to do their business as honorable and certain a career as cotton mills and railroads offer? Should we not all rejoice if our municipal business was in the hands of men trained to do it well, and have we not energy and sense enough to secure so desirable a result? Let us simply as members of a great business corporation apply the same rules to the selection of our president and directors that are followed by stock-holders in smaller business corporations. Instead of letting a number of politicians associated with the national parties meet and nominate some of themselves as candidates for the offices of the city, why should we not have an entirely new departure? Why should not the business men of the city, irrespective of their political or religious opinions, form a municipal party for the simple purpose of electing competent municipal officers and keeping them in office as long as they do their work well? It would be easy to draw a platform for such a party upon which the whole city could stand. Here is a specimen plank: "Resolved, that we are in favor of having the streets properly paved and regularly swept." The party standing for this and this alone with an organization in each precinct would soon number every one who wished to have the city's business done on business principles, and against such a party the petty politicians who live by plundering the city would be powerless. The committee of fifty in Philadelphia has shown what can be done by a small organization of citizens aiming only at the public good. Once break down the superstition that national politics have something to do with city business, and it will be comparatively easy to unite all citizens who want clean streets, good water, pure air, good drainage and everything else that good government means, in a municipal party which will be powerful enough to insure good government.

INTERVALS BETWEEN ELECTIONS.

To make the distinction between national politics and municipal business complete, the municipal election should be held say in May, and the municipal year should begin July 1. The greater interval between the elections the more difficult it becomes to sell a congressman for a sheriff or a mayor for a president. And in this connection let me say that the plan so efficiently supported in Buffalo of separating municipal from the other elections by a whole year meets my cordial approval. The more completely municipal business can be divorced from national politics, the better for us all.

Experience has shown that the apathy which makes so many citizens neglect their duties can be overcome at intervals. The people are capable of a great uprising such as drove the Tweed ring into exile or prison, whenever things have reached such a pass as to become unbearable, but where elections are frequent men become negligent, both because they weary of the efforts necessary to victory in a political campaign, and because they console themselves with the reflection that if the election goes wrong it will be easy to correct the mischief next year. This tendency can in part be met by making the elections less frequent, thus giving municipal officers longer terms and making it easier to bring out the voters who may be willing once in three or four years to make a vigorous effort rather than be misgoverned for so long a period.

The next step is to make positions in the city employ attractive to such men as we need, men of ability and character. To fill the higher offices in a city government requires a great deal of time and hard work, and we can not organize our government upon the theory that a considerable number of the most capable citizens will sacrifice themselves for the benefit of the rest. In the long run we must pay for good work if we expect to get it. We can not compete with private employers unless we are all willing to pay as much. The work of governing a city is not especially agreeable, and the city can well afford to pay for the best talent that can be had. Large salaries are not so expensive as large stealings and poor work. The men who now pretend to serve our cities without compensation are often better paid than the men who receive the largest salaries that private corporations offer. The sound business rule is to pay good wages for good work, and to expect nothing for nothing. If we have not time to govern ourselves, we must pay some one else to do the work.

Money alone will not get such men as we need. There must be some assurance of permanence, some hope of promotion. We must offer a career, if we would tempt into our service the able young men who every year are choosing their professions. No man who can do anything else will accept employment where good service does not help him and where he is liable to be turned out at a moment's notice. If sound business principles could be adopted, a successful city officer would be called from one city to another as an able railway superintendent is called to continually better positions, and the profession of municipal administration would be extremely attractive. Is it impossible in America to create such a profession? Are we forever bound to our present unbusiness-like method of selecting our officers at random and turning them out as soon as they begin to know their business?

GOOD MONEY FOR GOOD WORK.

With citizens organized to insure good municipal government, it would be comparatively easy by proper effort to reach and influence the mass of ignorant voters, who now help the vicious bosses to govern our cities, but it is the part of prudence not to take too many chances against ourselves. We are struggling with a great many complicated questions, which it takes intelligence to understand. They are to be settled by gradually educating the people. Public opinion is the ultimate force in this country, if not indeed everywhere, but it takes time and effort to create and direct it. A colony of Italians, Scandinavians, Germans, or Irish, preserving their national languages and their national ideas, and living as foreigners among us are very difficult to reach, but their votes count just as much as the votes of the most highly educated men among us. We must make our naturalization laws more stringent. It is not consistent with business principles to admit men as equal partners in a prosperous firm, who bring neither experience nor capital, who know nothing of the business, and do not even speak the same language with the other partners. We certainly may insist that a man shall not vote here until he has been here long enough to understand our institutions and speak our language, and as we must have an arbitrary rule, it would seem safe to require fifteen or twenty years' residence. This may operate severely in a few cases, but the country will not suffer, and its interest demands that we should organize and educate the citizens that we now have until they are better able to govern themselves before we undertake to admit many more voters with the traditions, ideas, and interests of foreigners.

The tendency in this country is to concentrate municipal authority in a few hands. In Glasgow and Birmingham the best results are achieved by enlisting a large number of able citizens and dividing the work among them, some taking charge of sewers, others of lights, others of water, etc. It makes little difference which system prevails if only good men are induced to do the work. Make it in popular estimation as great a tribute to a man's business ability to make him an alderman as it is to make him a director of a bank or railroad and men will be glad to take positions in the city government. Make it, as it is to-day, rather a questionable distinction to be prominent in city politics, and except the few whose public spirit leads them to do a disagreeable public duty or whose ambition makes them take municipal office as the first step in public life, the men who hold city office will do neither their city nor themselves any credit. If your city officers are bad men we can not have too few aldermen or councilmen who intrigue for patronage or consider only what their votes or influence in the city legislature can be made to yield, the fewer we have the better.

Once persuade the people that the government of a city is a mere matter of business and induce them to treat it as such, and municipal reform is assured.

The experiment is worth trying. Let even twenty of the men in any city who are its business leaders meet and really consider what steps should be taken to secure economical municipal government. Let them agree to give, say, two hours a week each to the work. Let them take measures to organize their fellow-citizens of all classes in support of their movement, and let them show the same intelligence and energy that they exhibit in dealing with the affairs of business corporations in which they are directors. Let them select their candidates and agree to pay them what their time is fairly worth, to stand by them, and to keep them in office as long as they do their work well. Can any one doubt that such intelligent and organized effort would succeed? If there are difficulties, can not such men find means to overcome them? Whoever answers these questions in the negative must admit that republican institutions are a failure when applied to municipal government, or, at least, that we must submit to years more of inefficiency, corruption, plunder, and disgrace before that public spirit is developed which is necessary to their success.

If some humorous derider of civil service reform principles wished to perpetrate a huge joke on all the protestations in the republican platform in favor of the reform, he could hardly do better than hunt up the once famous Flanagan, of Texas, who asked at the republican national convention, "What are we here for, if not for the offices?" and reward the said Flanagan with some high office. Strangely enough, President Harrison, whom no one accuses of being a humorist, has, in solemn earnest, appointed this same Flanagan collector of customs at El Paso, Tex. — Civil Service Record.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE PASSED AT BUFFALO, SEPTEMBER 30, 1891.

The National Civil Service League congratulates the country upon the significant progress of reform during the last year. The extension of the reformed system to a part of the Indian service and its introduction into the navy yards; the executive revocation of the system of compulsory competition for promotion, and the executive order authorizing open competition with the actual adoption of such a system in the post-office department; the increase in the number of applicants for examination from all sections of the country, which has made it possible to equalize the quotas of appointments among the states, showing a general confidence hitherto unknown in the honest non-partisan observance of the law; the indictment of members of both political parties for attempting to levy political assessments upon public employes, and the defeat by the friends of reform in congress of the efforts to embarrass the commission and paralyze the operation of the law; the admirable statement and approval of the principles of reform by the court of appeals in New York in declaring the constitutionality of the reform law and confirming its applicability to municipal administration in Buffalo, all attest the steady practical progress of reform and the happy advance of the public sentiment upon which all effective reform depends.

The League declares its high appreciation of the great and patriotic service rendered to the country and to the interests of reform by the secretary of the navy in his prompt, comprehensive and thorough application of sound principles administration in the selection both of skilled and unskilled employes in the national navy yards, which have been hitherto scenes of the worse excesses of the spoils system. The League trusts that this great measure of reform will be secured permanently by an executive order which alone can make it a part of the general system under the law administered by the national civil service commission.

The League regards the recent displacement for political reasons of the collector of New York, an officer of acknowledged integrity, ability and efficiency by compelling his resignation, as a flagrant violation of the platform promises and executive pledges of the party of administration to respect not only the letter of the law but the spirit of reform. The League holds the declaration that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and the pledge that fitness and not party service should be the essential test in appointment, if they mean anything, to mean that diligent, honest and capable officers whose duties are in no sense political shall not be forced for political reasons to resign. Against this violation of solemn public pledges by the highest officers of the government the League, in the name of all honorable citizens, unqualifiedly protests.

The League condemns the failure to prosecute effectively the persons indicted for levying political contributions in violation of law, a failure which can not but encourage similar violations, because it will be held to indicate a willingness on the part of the administration to respectively connive at such offences.

The recent letters signed by the officers of the republican state executive committee in Ohio, and the republican state committee in Pennsylvania, levying a political tax upon public employes under terror of removal, plainly violates the spirit, if not the letter of the civil service act of 1883, which was designed to protect public employes against partisan extortion and illustrate the evil effects of the failure which we condemn. Any party which is not supported by the voluntary contributions of its members, and which resorts to practical blackmailing to obtain money for election expenses, strikes a fatal blow at the party system by confessing that it depends for success, not upon the conviction and confidence of those who compose it, but upon the fear of those whose livelihood it controls. We protest against these acts as strengthening an abuse which tends to destroy the legitimate function of party and the self-respect of public officers, which brings the American name and government in contempt, and, in this instance, which disgraces, also; the name of a party which is pledged to respect not only the letter of the law, but the spirit of reform.

The League reiterates its conviction that the power of removal should be vested in appointing officers, subject only to a sound discretion. But it holds as strongly that to secure that discretion from dangerous temptation every motive for its unjust exercise should be removed. The League, therefore, renews its recommendations as necessary conditions of reform that the laws prescribing fixed terms of office which were intended to prevent the odium of arbitrary removal should be repealed; that the widest publicity should be given to removals, and that public officers should be required by law publicly to record the reasons of removals made by their authority.

The interference of office-holders in elections is one of the oldest evils of free constitutional government. The dispensers of official patronage hold a power over primary political action which is not shared by the rest of the people, and which has been always grossly perverted to secure control of party caucuses and conventions. The attendance of office-holders at recent political conventions is a sign of neglect by the administration of one of the ancient safeguards of constitutional liberty.

The League returns the thanks of all good citizens to the United States Civil Service Commissioner, exposing to public notice and condemnation the scandalous abuses arising from active participation by federal office leaders in primaries of the republican party held in the city of Baltimore. It sees in the evils the natural results of choosing for offices whose incumbents are to enforce the civil service laws, professional politicians, indifferent or hostile to that law. It considers the prompt dismissal of every official shown to have violated the law an imperative requirement of the President's oath of office.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Point of View of a Crawfordsville Reader of the Chronicle.

"Enclosed I send you 50 cents for one year's subscription to the CHRONICLE. It is the most welcome paper that comes to my house and is generally read first, and from beginning to end without stop unless called from it by some interruption.

"I feel particularly indignant with Harrison. We had a right to expect as decisive action on his part in favor of the civil service generally, as Secretary Tracy has shown in the naval service. He has not done as well as Cleveland in spite of the platform on which he was elected, and his own speeches in favor of it. He is booked for defeat, so far as my vote goes, if he is renominated."

PLATTISM.

—The directory of the republican campaign subscribers in the possession of the party leaders must be a very poor one, for Chairman Wagner's appeals for money have been received by hundreds of democrats. Here is a sample of the call for funds now being sent out:

HEADQUARTERS KINGS COUNTY REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE.
ROOM 10, ARBUCKLE BUILDING,
BROOKLYN, Sept. 22, 1891.

MY DEAR SIR: The campaign committee is ready to receive voluntary subscriptions from all citizens having the success of the republican party at heart. The conduct of the campaign requires large expenditures of money for legitimate purposes, and under the laws we have no right to assess any person. I would be glad to have you call at the headquarters and to give you any explanation required and receive any advice you may choose to offer. A ready response is earnestly requested. Yours truly, ARNOLD H. WAGNER, Chairman.

One of Nathan's subordinates in the internal revenue office was shown this section about not assessing any one, but he merely laughed and shrugged his shoulders.—New York Times, October 23.

—Judge Lowery, of Ohio, calculated that the 700 Ohio persons in office in Washington, with aggregated salaries of $500,000, would give at least $25,000 to help McKinley and protection. They have, it is understood, "paid up" only $1,000. The result of his appeal is said to be "disgusting," only fifty clerks having subscribed. The subscriptions are very small, indeed. I do not believe that the clerks from any other state in the union are as niggardly as those from Ohio. Why, they won't give anything."

"I suppose it is," the judge answered, when asked if this indifference could be attributed to confidence in their ability to hold their places, "but I think some of them will learn they are mistaken. Probably 25 per cent. of those in office are democrats. They are active, and some of them have already made applications for leave. Everything I have written has been published here by some kicker, who runs immediately to the press. There seems to be an entire lack of party spirit among them."—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, October 19.

ROOM 48, WASHINGTON LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY BUILDING, CORNER OF NINTH AND F
STREETS, N. W., WASHINGTON, Oct. 15, 1891.

—In view of the importance of the pending political contest in the state of New York, and the necessity for every republican from that state, resident at the national capital, to do his whole duty under the demands of the hour, I am prompted, under authority from the state committee, to invite you to call at Room 48, Washington Loan and Trust Company Building, corner of Ninth and F streets, at your earliest convenience, between the hours of 8:30 A. M. and 6 P. M. This is for the purpose of consulting with you in regard to the best way for conquering the enemy in this fight. Please bring this note with you. Respectfully, &c., A. M. CLAPP, Agent of New York State Republican Committee.

The lady who received this note will not present it to Dairymaid Clapp, but will keep it to exhibit, by and by, if occasion should arise, to account for any injustice that may be exercised toward her in the way of punishment. The civil service commission can find a great many of these letters in the department. It is understood that a list of every employe from New York was furnished to Dairymaid Clapp. —Washington Dispatch to New York Times, October 21.

—As regards the duty of the United States district attorney to prosecute Mr. Van Cott or Mr. Hendricks, collector of the port, Mr. Platt, son of ex-Senator Platt [Tom Platt], in the absence of his chief, Mr. Mitchell, said that the district attorney's office did not undertake prosecutions of its own motion, but only on complaints filed.—New York Evening Post, October 14.

—Among the federal office-holders who were seen about Mr. Platt's preserves yesterday, were Gen. Dennis Burke, Deputy Collector Burr, Special Agent Pryor, Marcus A. Hanlon, treasury inspector, and Chief Clerk Rose of the appraiser's office.—New York Times, October 3.

—Platt appeared to be in a disturbed frame of mind last night. It has been his habit to keep very much in the background at headquarters. Last night, however, he stood in the main corridors of the hotel, laying the law down to his lieutenants. Bernard Biglin, William H. Bellamy, and Internal Revenue Collector Eidman were the center of a group of politicians which Platt addressed with emphasis.—New York Times, October 15.

—Mr. Platt's headquarters in the Fifth Avenue hotel had a good many visitors yesterday, including Collector Hendricks, Deputy Collector Biyor.—New York Times, October 16.

—ITHACA, N. Y., Oct. 14.—Mr. Fassett's speech was received with great applause. John W. Vrooman made a short, witty speech, and Col. Baxter [United States marshal] wound up the rally in the opera house.

—At the Lyceum opera house, Thirty fourth street and Third avenue, James M. Turner presided over a meeting.  Pending the arrival of Mr. Fassett, Col. A. E. Baxter [United States marshal] made a rally-round-the-flags speech to a supposed audience of grand army men. Col. Baxter paid a glowing eulogy to Roger Byron Towner, the Brooklyn man who published a falsehood about Mr. Flower and the union soldiers a few weeks ago. Col. Baxter said that he would not take Mr. Flower's word or oath about the matter, and that he considered Towner a patriot and one of the noblest men that ever lived.—Times, Oct. 21.

—Headed by Internal Revenue Collector Ernst Nathan, a machine has been built up. * * *

Now Nathan is absolutely bossing the present fight. He says the party has been harmonized. Yes, with a club. The opposing faction has been beaten down and out by Nathan. * * They saw how he observed the spirit of the civil service law by going to the state convention that nominated Mr. Fassett and by forcing his official subordinates to go. Every enrolled republican in the twenty-first and twenty-third wards knows that the employes in the internal revenue collector's office are used there at the primaries, and that one of them was sent out of town with the roll book of the twenty-first ward recently, so that the opposing faction could not have the names of thirty-five new members placed on it in time to have them vote at the primary.—New York Times, September 27.

—The conference began when Collector Nathan told Mr. Ziegler that the people wanted to make him mayor and that the republican organization stood ready to nominate him. * * A politician who stands very close to Nathan and his fellow-leaders saw Mr. Ziegler after the conference and asked him point blank if he would be guided by the organization in making appointments and dispensing patronage. Mr. Ziegler looked at him in surprise and said: "That is a matter that I had not supposed I would be asked to consider."—New York Times, September 30.

—Brooklyn republicans were rather blue yesterday over the prospect of electing any of their candidates. They had anticipated a lively, genuine campaign on the issues laid down by William Ziegler, but they could not but admit that the wisdom displayed by the democrats in nominating such a man as David A. Boody, aided as they were by the Nathan policy of putting forward such a man as Henry A. Meyer, had almost eliminated these issues from the campaign. No one pretended yesterday that Mr. Meyer could go on the stump and force those issues, and every one concluded that "Boss" Nathan had simply sold out his party.—New York Times, October 13.

—The Notorious Gibbs, whom Platt will need in this campaign, was restored to full leadership by the republican organization in the thirteenth assembly district last night. Gibbs was expelled from the county committee a year ago on the ground that his action with Hamilton Fish and others in the legislature of 1890 had made him a traitor to his party. Afterward, the state committee, at the direction of Mr. Platt, read him out of the party.—New York Times, September 24.

—As Mr. Platt surveys the results of his "harmony" policy in the legislative districts he will not find much to comfort him. He took the "Wicked Gibbs" back into favor in the thirteenth assembly district in this city, using the federal patronage to crush out all opposition to him, and the results are the defeat of Gibbs for the assembly and of Stewart for the senate. Probably no one act of Platt's did more to alienate independent voters in this city from Fassett than his championship of Gibbs. It gave the lie to all his professions of zeal for good government as opposed to the bad government of Tammany Hall, for Tammany has never produced a worse public servant than Gibbs.—New York Evening Post, Nov. 4.

—There will be some post-mortem politics at the monthly meeting of the Kings County Republican General Committee this evening, in the Criterion Theatre, Brooklyn. The machine which has run the party into such straits when nearly half the voters of the city are republicans, is not likely to mend its ways. Ernst Nathan, the dominating spirit in the party management, who is hand-in-glove with the democratic regime while holding an important federal office, sententiously says that the victory was lost because there were not votes enough, and then proceeds to plan how to make the party smaller by rigidly disciplining those who failed to support the unfit candidates nominated by his influence. Mr. Nathan, who has been dubbed the Mephistopheles of Brooklyn, does not openly present himself in the party councils, save at great campaign meetings, for he is usually in the background pulling wires. But occasionally he makes his way into the gallery of the meeting-place of the general committee and watches the proceedings.—New York Evening Post, November 10.

—The meeting of the Nathan Machine, which seems to govern the republican party in Brooklyn, last evening was as lively as was predicted in The Evening Post of yesterday. The arbitrary action of the chairman, William W. Goodrich, in declaring the meeting adjourned in face of the fact that a clear majority of the members voted against the resolution to adjourn, was denounced in no measured terms by groups of the members who lingered for an hour in front of the Criterion Theater, where the meeting was held, after it was over.

"This is the greatest outrage ever perpetrated upon a meeting assembled for free speech," declared one member, and he said he told Mr. Goodrich so when he left the hall.

"More arbitrary action I never saw," said another. "In the first place, Mr. Goodrich applied gag-law to Mr. Stubbett, and prevented him from expressing his views, and then, when other members wanted to speak, he declared carried a motion to adjourn, when less than one-fourth of those present voted for it. In fact, the members of the committee supposed the motion lost until they saw Mr. Goodrich putting on his overcoat to go away." New York Evening Post, November 11.

—It was highly appropriate that the highest official (Collector Beard) in the federal service in this part of the country should preside at the club meeting with which the republican campaign was opened, Saturday afternoon.—Boston Post, September 21.

WANTON REMOVALS.

—The news of the removal of Appraiser Stearns, which was published yesterday, created a great deal of comment at the custom-house.

Neither Collector Beard nor Appraiser Stearns had been notified of the change. The first Mr. Beard knew of the appointment, or that it was contemplated, was when he read the papers containing the dispatch, and he did not seem in ecstasies over it.

It is said that the removal of Appraiser Stearns and the appointment of Mr. Dodge was brought about by Congressman Cogswell, who has felt that it was not well to have a democrat in the place, while there were so many republicans anxious to get into the service of the United States government.

One of the great objections to Mr. Stearns was that he stood between his subordinates and those republicans who wanted their places and thus prevented political workers from securing what they deemed their just rewards.

Mr. Stearns, when seen yesterday regarding his removal, seemed in no way disturbed. "While I have been in the position of appraiser," said he, "I have tried to do my duty faithfully and well, and if I have been removed, I shall lay down the cares of office with a sense of having done my best while here. Really, at the present time I can say nothing about the matter, because I know nothing about it. I heard shortly after the change of administration that there was some attempt made to have me removed from office, but I have heard nothing at all in regard to the matter now for several months. If I am removed, it is entirely without any notification up to the present time."

Collector Beard said Mr. Stearns had proved an unusually competent official. "He has a remarkable knowledge of the details of his department and is an excellent executive. I am sorry if the report of his removal is true, for I think very highly of Mr. Stearns and thought the department was very well satisfied with him as appraiser. He has made a splendid record, and may be well proud of it, and if he is to go I am sorry, though I think Mr. Dodge may fill the office well."

"Mr. Stearns has been connected for eighteen years with the custom-house. He was appointed a measurer in 1872; in 1874 he was appointed a liquidating clerk in the warehouse department, where he remained until Jan. 27, 1886, when he was appointed appraiser by President Cleveland, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of the then appraiser. He has filled the office of appraiser ever since."

He has made very few changes in his department, not allowing politics to enter into it at all. There was a great deal of pressure brought to bear by party men during the administration of Mr. Stearns under Mr. Cleveland to "clean out" the republicans in the office and put in democrats, but he resisted it and retained all the examiners he found in office when he went in. All the changes made were of openers, packers and porters, and most of these were to fill vacancies caused by death or resignation. A few removals were made to get rid of incompetent persons or those whose usefulness had long been a thing of the past.

Mr. Dodge is a resident of the town of Hamilton in Essex county. He is a distant relative of "Gail Hamilton" Dodge who in turn is a cousin of Secretary James G. Blaine of the department of state.

Mr. Dodge was appointed a clerk in the naval office in 1873 and remained there until 1885, when he was removed. He was one of the first appointments of President Harrison in 1889, having been named for the office of assistant appraiser, which position he is now holding.—Boston Post, July 4.

—"Only last week, the postmistress of Olneyville, R. I., who had been in the office for twenty years—who was appointed postmistress by Cleveland—who had given entire satisfaction, and who had recently been especially praised in the official report, was removed to make way for an active republican who had no experience whatever in the department."—Private letter from Providence, R. I., Oct. 15th.

RECENT PARTY PLATFORMS ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The Ohio democratic convention, July, 1891, was entirely silent on every phase of a reform of the civil service.

17. We denounce the corrupt and shameless domination of Senator Matthew S. Quay in the politics of the state, and arraign and condemn the republican party for its servile acquiescence in the leadership of a man who has utterly failed to defend himself from grave charges against his official conduct and political record.—Pennsylvania Democratic State Platform, September 3.

Thirteenth—We re-affirm the republican party's favor to thorough genuine reform in the civil service, and commend the national administration for giving effect thereto under existing law. And the flagrant and persistent abuses in the state civil service by the democratic administration are held up to condemnation.—New York Republican State Platform, September 10.

"We believe that public office is a public trust, and that appointments should be made for fitness, capacity and integrity, and in the spirit of civil service reform. The republican administration has shown the hypocrisy of its pretensions in favor of this reform by destroying the efficiency of the census bureau for the sake of furnishing political spoils, by neglecting to bring prosecutions for the punishment of violations of the civil service law, by ignoring the recommendations of the civil-service commission for the dismissal of officials who have openly defied the law, by reviving the active participation of office-holders in partisan politics, and the assessment of government employes for partisan purposes.—Massachusetts State Democratic Platform, September 29.

First—The further extension of civil service rules to those in the Indian service.

Second—The application of the principles, if not the rules, of the civil service to the appointment and tenure of Indian agents.—Indian Rights Conference at Lake Mohawk, October 9.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

VOL. I, No. 34.

INDIANAPOLIS, DECEMBER, 1891.

TERMS: { 50 cents per annum.
5 cents per copy.

Published monthly. Publication office, No. 23 N Meridian St., Indianapolis, Ind. Address,
THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Ind.

THE report of the census has crowded out much other material this month. The report, although widely noticed by the press, is reprinted entire that it may be at hand to readers of the CHRONICLE for future reference.

THE eighth report of the civil service commission has been printed. It shows in what directions there has been in the past year improvement in making the merit system effectual, and with directness and candor the commission also states what is yet unsatisfactory and what remains to be done.

THE correspondence between the civil service reform association of New York, and the treasury and post-office departments, regarding the circular sent out by the state republican committee to federal employes, asking for contributions, has been published by the New York association. The departments claimed for Collector Hendricks and Postmaster Van Cott that the circular was sent out without their knowledge, and that Mr. Van Cott has (since the election) sent in his resignation to the state committee. It was not to be supposed that Secretary Foster or Postmaster-General Wanamaker would do otherwise than try to shield these officers, but by the side of the letter of Mr. Curtis they make a sorry appearance; it is to be noted, however, that the offenders and their superiors are subdued and apologetic, and not as in former days impudent and defiant.

The Pennsylvania civil service reform association also prints a correspondence regarding political assessments of the city employes before the recent election in Pennsylvania.

THE following is the President's message relating to the civil service:

The report of the civil service commission should receive the careful attention of the opponents, as well as the friends, of this reform. The commission invites a personal inspection by senators and representatives of its records and methods; and every fair critic will feel that such an examination should precede a judgment of condemnation, either of the system or its administration. It is not claimed that either is perfect, but I believe that the law is being executed with impartiality and that the system is incomparably better and fairer than that of appointments upon favor. I have during the year extended the classified service to include superintendents, teachers, matrons and physicians in the Indian service. This branch of the service is largely related to educational and philanthropic work and will obviously be the better for the change. The heads of the several executive departments have been directed to establish at once an efficiency record as the basis of a comparative rating of the clerks within the classified service, with a view to placing promotions therein upon the basis of merit. I am confident that such a record, fairly kept and open to the inspection of those interested, will powerfully stimulate the work of the departments and will be accepted by all as placing the troublesome matter of promotions upon a just basis.

I recommend that the appropriations for the civil service commission be made adequate to the increased work of the next fiscal year.

The President's mind is apparently cleared of all doubt. The question at once arises, how can the President, believing that the merit system "is incomparably better and fairer than that of appointments upon favor," seem to think he has done his duty by taking a paltry seven hundred places in the Indian service out of the reach of favoritism, and leaving many thousand places to which this incomparable system could be applied, to be distributed as spoil? The President can not give a reason why he does not extend the system to all letter-carriers in free-delivery cities, to all post-offices and custom-houses, of ten employes, to the internal revenue service, to the weather bureau, to the pension agencies, to all government laborers, and to other classes of employes.

IN the appointment of Steve Elkins to be secretary of war, the President has given the country another instance of how much he will dare and do when he wants to make the offices "count." It took a bold man, under the circumstances, to make Wanamaker a cabinet officer, but to "back" with the whole power of federal patronage such thoroughly discredited political adventurers as Mahone two years ago, Quay last year, and Platt this year, seems the extreme of foolhardiness. Yet, to borrow from the gamblers, in the elevation of Elkins the President sees all of his other moves, and goes them at least one better. Elkins has never been convicted of anything in court. He combines characteristics of Dudley, Quay, Platt and Sim Coy. He is simply a schemer. His elevation to the head of the war department is beyond measure repulsive to the American people.

IF the election of Mr. Crisp tends to give elements of the democratic party, led by

Hill and Gorman, an advantage over the elements led by Mr. Cleveland, it is to be regretted. The Hill and Gorman section has and lives by but one principle and one practice, the spoil of office and of public contracts. For the party to turn back to such leadership is to return from comparative civilization to barbarism.

THE signs relating to the management of the city service are not re-assuring. In spite of talk of "a business administration," the god of spoil seems to be quietly getting the upper hand. One is impressed with the number of ward heelers who have got into the service, men who always have to be provided for, now in one office, now in another. There are too many trials of employes for drunkenness, or sleeping on duty, or other serious offence. The insurance people have taken the alarm on account of the results of favoritism in the fire department. The engineering department is apparently getting ready to do a good thing for the boys. All this proves again what has been proved millions of times that opportunity for the exercise of favoritism should be cut off to the utmost extent. To this end all but the highest appointments should be thrown open to free competition, except laborers who should be employed upon the system now in use in the navy yards.

TAMMANY AND THE CHILDREN.

A fresh field of corruption inflicted by Tammany upon the subjected and paralyzed city of New York is being brought to light in recent issues of the New York Evening Post. Mr. Wilmer, a school inspector of the fifth district of the city, thought it in the line of his duty to rid the school-houses in the district of the saloons and houses of ill-fame that hemmed them in. The law reads: "A license will not be issued for a new place adjoining a place already licensed, or in the immediate vicinity of a school-house." First he tried to get Tammany's Excise Board to define "immediate vicinity," and he failed. Then he asked the police department for a list of the saloons and houses of ill-repute within two hundred yards of the school-houses of the fifth district. One report was:

"Within 200 yards of grammar school No. 10, at No. 180 Wooster street, twenty-three bar-rooms; within the same distance of grammar school No. 47, at No. 36 East Twelfth street, fifteen bar-rooms. Reported houses of ill-fame, five."

Another report was: "Grammar school No. 40, at

No. 225 East Twenty-third street, bar-rooms ten; Primary school No. 4, at No. 413 East Sixteenth street, bar-rooms, eighteen; Primary school No. 23, at No. 322 East Twentieth street, bar-rooms, eleven; Primary school No. 29, at No. 433 East Nineteenth street, bar-rooms, thirteen."

Then Mr. Wilmer wrote the police department for the number of saloons and houses of ill-fame, their owners and licenses, but this request was ignored. Finally Tammany's Mayor Grant, in making the appointments for school inspectors, omitted the name of the troublesome and pernicious Mr. Wilmer. Fortunately the Post is doing what Tammany most dreads, and that is it day by day prints the facts and gives a plat of the school buildings and the surrounding saloons in the different districts. As the New York Tribune says:

Tens of thousands of children are daily forced into contact with the vilest grogeries and the creatures that haunt them. They have no means of escaping the contamination. Saloons on both sides of the school-house, saloons on the nearest corners, saloons across the street press demoralizing sights upon their eyes and demoralizing sounds into their ears. Familiarity with vice and degradation is inevitable, and it is a short and almost certain step from familiarity to companionship. The poison of such an atmosphere is absorbed into body and soul. What chance has a child against it? Citizens are onerously taxed that their children may laboriously learn a few things out of books and draw in moral infection with every breath. This horrible state of affairs exists because Tammany can not exist without it. The mayor and his advisers know the fact and the reason perfectly. Commissioner Koch, whose character was clearly revealed when he went into court to plead to an indictment, and Commissioner Fitzpatrick, who escaped with him at the same time on a technicality, are doing the work they were appointed to do in the way in which they are instructed to do it. Commissioner Meakim is entitled to the credit of being obnoxious to his colleagues and in some danger of losing his place. But the majority of two is sufficient. And there is no popular agitation. Tammany goes unrebuked, re-elects its candidates, tightens its grip, expands its ambitions, and illustrates its depravity by an occasional cheap pretense of virtue, while sedulously implanting the seeds of vice in the rising generation. The harvest will be gathered in due time; and what a harvest it will be!

What the grip of Tammany is, the random facts from time to time quoted in the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE show. It has been further shown that Tammany does not belong alone to the democratic party, but that the dominating part of the republican machine of New York trades its candidates and principles with Tammany, according as it can obtain a little of the vast spoil. The responsibility for the continued existence of this monstrous engine of degradation is fixed in part upon the selfish greed and love of ease of the citizens of New York, but it is fixed beside upon New York democrats, whose zeal for reform is national, and upon such an organization as the republican Union League Club; for these all go their separate party ways, and furnish the money for these republican and democratic creatures of Tammany to trade and betray for spoil. And it is under their party banners, with bogus war cries and by means of their respectable cloaks to hide under, that these mercenaries can glut themselves with the spoil of New York City. And again we beg to ask any citizen of New York, What is any man, whether Grover Cleveland or Benjamin Harrison, or James G. Blaine; what is any "issue" of the tariff or currency compared with the destruction of a monster like Tammany, simply by the withdrawal of its spoil. Ballot reform will weaken it, but deprivation of spoil will kill it.

ELKINS.

In securing Elkins's appointment it is not at all probable that Mr. Blaine took the trouble to remind the President of the star route scandals, of the Maxwell land grant steal, or of the gigantic claim against Brazil that Blaine and Elkins endeavored to enforce. Elkins's part in the notorious Jewett claim is easily ascertainable if reasons were to be sought for questioning the propriety of putting him in any office. This was a claim to which the attention of Secretary Bayard was directed during the administration of President Cleveland. It came to his knowledge as a part of the business of the state department left unfinished by Mr. Blaine.

James C. Jewett, of New York City, claimed to have discovered deposits of guano in the Island of Fernando de Noronha, within the dominions of the empire of Brazil. Jewett obtained a permit from Brazil to remove portions of these deposits for experiment, with a conditioned promise of a contract under which he should receive a certain percentage. He fitted out two small vessels for purposes of exploration, but his agreement with the Brazilian minister of agriculture excited so much hostility in Brazil that the minister was forced to resign, and his successor canceled all the agreements with Jewett and officially informed the United States of his action.

Jewett's actual losses, according to his own figures, were $27,330. He presented to the state department a claim against Brazil for more than $50,000,000. The claim was, of course, a gross exaggeration of any possible right of recovery of such damages. Secretary Evarts twice rejected his claim. When Secretary Blaine came in he reopened the case. Jewett retained Mr. Stephen B. Elkins as his attorney. On August 8, 1881, Mr. Blaine, in a dispatch to Minister Osborne, in Brazil, reversed the instructions of his predecessor and wrote to Mr. Jewett stating that he had taken this course "at the request of Stephen B. Elkins, Esq., your attorney." To Minister Osborne Mr. Blaine said emphatically, speaking of the rescinding of the Jewett contract and the claim for $50,000,000 damages, "I am not sufficiently informed as to the law of Brazil to know how far its formal requirements as to the mere question of right and title would nullify this action by its government, but I do know that in justice and in equity a responsibility has been incurred which can not be escaped."

Notwithstanding the efforts of Mr. Blaine in behalf of "Stephen B. Elkins, Esq., your attorney," this preposterous claim slept during Mr. Frelinghuysen's administration, and Mr.

Bayard, after a careful examination of the facts, declared: "Such a claim, so stated, shocks the moral sense and can not be held to be within the domain of reason or justice. It would be an act of international unfriendliness for the United States to lend themselves in any way or to any degree in urging, much less enforcing, such a demand upon a country with whom we are, or design to remain, on terms of amity. I, therefore, return the protest as inclosed by you and decline to transmit it to the United States minister at Brazil or to instruct him to present it officially or otherwise."

This ended the business, unless, perchance, it has been reopened since Mr. Blaine began business "at the old stand" for the benefit of "Stephen B. Elkins, Esq., your attorney." The confirmation of Mr. Elkins as secretary of war may give him opportunity to throw the case into the hands of a lively man, and with the recovery of the $50,000,000 from the republic of Brazil he ought to feel fully repaid for his rebuke at the hands of so "unpatriotic" a secretary as Mr. Bayard.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, December 17.

—The critics who represent Stephen B. Elkins as having forced himself into the cabinet of President Harrison are as far astray now as the prophets who were swearing six weeks ago that this nomination would never go to the senate.

The choice was unquestionably the President's own. It was made with full realization of the adverse comment it would call forth. To those who are in the inner White House circle, it has been evident for a long while that President Harrison was spending a good deal of time looking into the public and private record of Mr. Elkins, and this has satisfied many of them that the man of many homes and many enterprises was booked for something worth having.

This choice was impelled by two motives—gratitude and hope. Mr. Elkins has in more than a few ways done favors for the President personally, and for his son Russell, which could not be ignored. Just how to show the proper appreciation of this was a question. Elkins was rich and on the inside of many big schemes, while the President was poor and had nothing in prospect; so recognition in a financial way was out of the question. Elkins was not the sort of a man for one of the greater diplomatic posts, and the lesser ones he would not have accepted at any price. All that seemed open to him, therefore, was a place at Washington, in which his restless activity of mind and body could be turned to some account.

On the other hand, the President understood that Elkins was by nature a manager, and the lack of enough material of that sort in the cabinet, on the eve of a national election, had been brought in various ways strongly to the notice of all who were interested in the President's renomination. Blaine, Tracy, and Foster were useful men in their several places politically; Rusk contributed a certain positive element supposed to be attractive to the farmers of the northwest; but Wanamaker was engulfed in a sea of public contempt; Miller was a negative force, and Noble had as many whims as a woman, coupled with manners which antagonized nearly everybody who met him on an equal footing. It was as a political adjutant that Elkins was given the preference over Cheney and Estee and all the other equally good republicans talked of for the place.

The friends who are now approving the President's selection of a secretary are suddenly confronted with a rather menacing array of reminiscences, some of which they find it hard to explain away. They discover that there still lingers in the memory of many people the letter written by the malodorous Dorsey to Representative Springer in the spring of 1884, concerning witnesses who might be brought before the house committee investigating the star route scandals, in which these words occurred:

"S. B. Elkins, United Bank building, New York, has probably a larger knowledge than any other person of all the star-route matters and the moneys paid. George E. Spencer demanded of the late J. W. Bosler and myself $12,000 to pay Mr. Elkins for the purpose of avoiding indictment and prosecution, and I replied that I would not pay a penny and never did."

They are reminded, also, of the McMains charges of the same year, overhauling Mr. Elkins and some other persons for their conduct with reference to the Maxwell, Mora and Una del Gato grants, together with other valuable tracts of land in New Mexico.—Washington Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, December 18.

John McCoy and his home rule club in the fifteenth assembly district have again broken away from Tammany Hall.

McCoy is now in revolt against William J. Dalton's leadership. Dalton is the deputy street cleaning commissioner, a follower of ex-Senator George W. Plunkett. He was imported from the seventeenth district (Plunkett's own) to take charge of the fifteenth. McCoy's chief ground of complaint is that Dalton imported a brother-in-law from another district, and, after he had resided in the fifteenth for three weeks, had him appointed to the police force. After his appointment, Dalton's brother-in-law, whose name is Halligan, moved out of the fifteenth back into his old district.—New York Evening Post, July 21.

SIXTH REPORT

Of the Special Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League,

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE CONDITION OF THE FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE AND OPERATION OF THE REFORM LAW.

To the Executive Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League:

In the last republican platform, it was declared "The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable." This declaration was embodied in the platform as a specific pledge; and the construction of this written agreement, made with the voters of the country, is not difficult. The law provides (Civil Service Act, sections 1 and 2) that the President shall appoint three commissioners whose duty it shall be to aid him in preparing suitable rules, providing for open competitive practical examinations, all places classified by the rules to be filled by selections from those graded highest, with a period of probation before appointment. These rules are entirely under the control of the President and the commissioners appointed by him, and it is within his power under this act to extend them to any grades of the service to which they are applicable. The promise of the republican platform, therefore, was not that new laws should be enacted, but that the system should be extended by the President. Nor, within certain limits, could there be any question as to the offices to which the civil service system was applicable. The object of the system was to take subordinate administrative places out of the field of political controversy and to make appointments to these places depend upon the fitness of the appointee, as proved by competitive examination and probation, and not upon patronage and political favor. It was applicable, then, to non-political administrative offices.

If there was any branch of the service which should have been kept free from party controversy, it was the census bureau. It was the plain duty of those in charge of this bureau to give to the people the exact facts as to all matters inquired of, unwarped by political bias.

In every decade the government spends millions of dollars upon this census, and the importance of accuracy and thoroughness in the work can not be overestimated. The census is at once a record of our progress as a people, a picture of our condition in each successive ten years of our national history, and the basis of instructive comparisons with the condition and progress of other nations. The representation of the several states in the popular branch of congress rests upon its statistics of population. No one will dispute that unfairness, incapacity, or blundering in the census is a grave public misfortune, and that the officers charged with a work of such importance should use every precaution to prevent the belief that their work is partial or incomplete.

The census ought to be as free from partisan color as the judiciary. Otherwise, no one can rely upon the accuracy of its conclusions. To gain the confidence of the people, it ought to be not merely fair and just, but it should be removed from the appearance of corrupt or partisan influence. The good sense of our ancestors made it an illegal act for a trustee to put himself in a position where he could make a profit out of the trust funds in his control, even though actual fraud could not be shown. An evident analogy makes it an improper act for one political party so to monopolize the taking of the census as to be in a position to profit from the result. If an administration has a free choice between a non-political and a political agency for taking this enumeration and chooses the latter, composed of officials of its own political faith, the presumption is against the fairness of a census so taken. The results of such a census will be apt to reflect something of the bias of those who take it. And, even if it were fair, many would not believe it to be fair. Suspicion is cast on such a census in advance of enumeration; and, if at the close of the work many inaccuracies are shown, resulting in some cases in the advantage to the party by whom it is taken, the work is sure to be discredited.

It had already been demonstrated, by actual experience, that the patronage system as applied to this branch of the service was liable to grave abuses, and frequently resulted in the appointment of incompetent officials, and that the reform system was well adapted to a bureau of this kind. This is manifest from the previous experience of the census bureau itself, as well as from an examination of the methods pursued in the taking of statistics in the state of Massachusetts, and from a comparison between the patronage and merit systems in the taking of the census in England and Scotland.

The defective results in the census of 1870 were directly traceable to the patronage system. Francis A. Walker, under whose supervision this census, as well as that of 1880, was taken, says in a publication of the American Statistical Association (December, 1890): "The local supervision of the census in the southern states was, by the defeat of General Garfield's bill, thrown back into the hands of the marshals of the United States courts. * * The whole battle against the Garfield bill had been fought on the question of patronage. It was for the purpose of retaining this large body of more or less lucrative appointments in the hands of the dominant party that the United States marshals rallied at Washington during the winter of '69 and '70 to defeat the house measure. They wanted to use these thousands of offices as a means of strengthening their hands in their respective districts, to fight the Ku-Klux and the illicit distillers, to build up the republican party and consolidate the negro vote, and, in general, this was precisely the use to which these offices were put. * * The result was an enumeration which we know now, from indisputable evidence, to have been in many parts of several southern states inadequate, partial and inaccurate, often in a shameful degree."

And not only are the disastrous results of patronage appointments shown by the census of 1870, but the improvement produced by the elimination of partisanship from the census is shown in the comparatively satisfactory results and general confidence in the census of 1880.

In respect to this census it is true that no competitive system was adopted. This was before the passage of the civil service law, and before the introduction of these methods into our federal service; but the essential element of the civil service system—namely, the exclusion of political consideration in appointments—was largely observed. Mr. Walker tells us in the same article, "supervisors were appointed from either party with the utmost impartiality, and as they were themselves selected without regard to partisan services, they were instructed that it would be considered an offence and abuse of trust if, in their own appointment of enumerators, they allowed partisan motives to appear."

The following extract from the letter from the chief of the bureau of statistics to the civil service commissioners of Massachusetts, dated Nov. 27, 1885, shows the success that attended the application of civil service methods to the taking of the decennial census in that state:

"I am very happy to inform you that, as a whole, the force supplied by you is very much superior to the one we should have been likely to have secured through the old method of personal application and the indorsement of friends. * * * In intelligence, in capacity, in attainment, and in attendance upon work, our present force reflects the greatest credit upon the civil service system.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"CARROLL D. WRIGHT."

In England, after nearly all the places in the civil service had been included in the rules prescribing competitive examination, the positions in the census bureau were left out and remained a part of the government patronage. The results of this omission, as shown in several investigations, were deplorable. The report concerning the civil service in Great Britain, communicated to the two houses of congress at the beginning of the session of the 40th congress (pages 155 and 156), says, concerning an official inquiry made in England in regard to the census of 1871: "The head of the office gives a sad account of the motley imbeciles put upon him by the members of Parliament taking the census. 'They were a heterogeneous mass, from fourteen to sixty years of age, who had tried many occupations and failed in all.' When the registrar was ordered to take the census in 1871, he says he supposed he was to be allowed better clerks, obtained through open competition under the order of 1870, but he was deprived of them.

"The lords of the treasury decided against me, and their lordships took to themselves the patronage and divided it among members. Their lordships acting on the old system, and following the recommendation of influential adherents, nominated no fewer than two hundred and sixty-one census clerks.' He found that inquiry into their character and history 'was productive of pain and confusion,' and he gave it up. But he forced this miscellaneous herd of official favorites into a pass examination before the commission which rejected fifty-seven per cent. of them, and with the residue, the registrar succeeded in taking the census of 1871, and wonders that he could do it. He says, 'Nothing could be worse than the system of nomination of clerks by the treasury.'

The report of the "committee appointed by the treasury to inquire into certain questions connected with the taking of the census," made on the 23d of May, 1890, together with the evidence upon which this report is based, also demonstrates the superiority of the merit system.

In Scotland the competitive examinations were adopted in the census of 1881. The result is shown in the testimony of Mr. Stair Agnew, the registrar-general (see pp. 83 and 84), who thus describes the manner in which the clerks in this office were supplied:

"A. 1922. It was arranged that all the names that were sent to me as applicants should, after inquiry by myself as to their general fitness, be sent up to the civil service commissioners, who held a competitive examination, and selected those at the top of the list. I should state that the patronage was in the hands of the treasury at that time, but it was arranged by myself with the secretary of the treasury that I should directly send up the names to the civil service commissioners.

"Q. 1923. But, in the first place, was any person at liberty to send in his name, or were the persons whose names you received nominated by the treasury?

"A. Any person was at liberty to send in his name, either to myself or to the treasury.

"Q. 1927. In fact, it was an open advertisement?

"A. Yes.

"Q. 1932. Did they give you satisfaction?

"A. Yes.

"Q. 1938. They did their work intelligently?

"A. Very much so.

"Q. 1942. And you propose to follow the same principle in the coming census?

"A. I should be quite satisfied to do so."

In England, on the other hand, the clerks employed were nominated by the treasury patronage, and underwent "a rough examination by the civil service commissioners;" but the results seem to have been lamentable. Dr. Ogle, the superintendent of statistics, in England, thus testifies (p. 11):

"A. 238. The clerks who have been sent by the treasury to the census office hitherto have contained a number of gentlemen who have fallen out of their occupations, and are anxious to get something to do; and, as a rule, a very large proportion of them have turned out to be absolutely unfit for any work at all, certainly for any work that requires either honesty or intelligence. A very great deal is work which practically can not be checked. Anything that we could check, anything that was checked, we found was oftentimes done so badly that it was hardly worth having had done at all; and the inference is that the unchecked work must have been very imperfectly done.

"Q. 248. You get them now from the patronage secretary of the treasury?

"A. That is how we have had them hitherto. At each census there has been a protest against this mode of appointment, owing to the experience of the past one.

"Q. 249. Would any rough kind of examination by the civil service commissioners help you?

"A. There was one, but it was quite ineffectual.

"A. 261. I am afraid myself that no mere pass examination will meet the difficulty."

It is true that good men are occasionally obtained, and fairly good work done under the patronage system. Thus in Ireland, where the system is a mixed one, the clerks being the copyists of the civil service, and the temporary clerks appointed by the lord-lieutenant, and submitted to an examination by the civil service commission, the apparently suitable persons being selected first, and the poorer men gradually weeded out by examination of the registrar general, Dr. Grimshaw declares:

"A. 564. I think the thing was fairly done on the whole. We certainly got a very fair set of men. Very few of these men misconducted themselves during the course of the work."

The committee report (p. viii) that they trust it may be found feasible to introduce a system of transfer from other branches of the civil service. And, if this should not be the case, they would regard with satisfaction the adoption of a method of appointing the requisite assistance, by open competition, at an examination to be conducted by the civil service commissioners. Open competition was accordingly held in London, in February, 1891, for filling temporary clerkships in the census office, the examination being on the following subjects:

- 1st. Handwriting.
- 2d. Orthography.
- 3d. Copying manuscript.
- 4th. Copying figures and tabular statements.
- 5th. Arithmetic.
- 6th. (Optional) Geography.

Candidates were notified that the employment was purely temporary; that every person employed would be liable to dismissal at any time at the discretion of the registrar-general; that, on the cessation of service, no claim for further employment would be entertained; that no pension or gratuity would be given on retirement or dismissal; and that the successful candidates must be prepared to commence their services when required.

It thus appears that experience in England as well as in our own country has demonstrated the advantage of appointing men to this bureau under the competitive examinations conducted by the civil service commission.

If, then, the promise of the republican platform had any significance at all, it meant that the President would extend this competitive system to the clerks of the census bureau, when that bureau should be established. Mr. Harrison, in concurring with and adopting the platform, distinctly made this promise his own, and emphasized it by the declaration that, "in appointments to every grade and department, fitness, and not party service, should be the essential and discriminating test," and in the statement that "further extensions of the classified list were necessary and desirable."

The act of March 1, 1889, providing for the taking of the census, gives the secretary of the interior the power to appoint the clerks of the census bureau, and provides that all examinations for appointment and promotion shall be in his discretion and under his direction. The secretary is himself an appointee of the President, and subject to his control. It would have been easy for the President, if desirous of extending the reform system, to have had appointments in this bureau made without regard to political considerations. This might have been done by the appointment of clerks in the bureau through competitive examinations under the control of the civil service commission. Such a course would, in the hands of the present commissioners, have given an absolute guarantee of the fairness and non-partisan character of the appointments. If the president and secretary are unwilling to do this, they could have instituted competitive examinations for this bureau alone, publicly announcing that the places were open to all and that political influence would not be regarded in making appointments. The President was indeed solicited by the civil service commissioners to cause a system of competitive examinations to be adopted for the clerks in this office; but he declined to have this done, and, in the words of the superintendent of the census (see report of November 6, 1889, page 4), the examinations required by the rules were not competitive, but merely tested the qualifications of such candidates only as might be designated for examination by the superintendent of census. It thus appears that the superintendent was permitted to retain in his own hands the power of making nominations without which admission to the census bureau was impossible.

The well known opinions of Mr. Porter, who was selected by the President to administer this office, made it certain that these appointments would become in great measure matters of political patronage.

Mr. Porter's opposition of civil service reform methods clearly appears in his testimony before the house committee on reform of the civil service, September 9, 1890. He said (p. 125), that civil service methods were "creating a system of barnacleism." Again: "There was some effort (p. 112), to have the census brought under the control of the civil service commission. The main objection I urged at the time was on account of the temporary employment." Mr. Porter further stated that in the census bureau appointees were, as a rule, recommended by republicans (p. 124).

The act of March 1, 1889 (Sec. 4), provides that the secretary of the interior shall, upon the recommendation of the superintendent of the census, designate the number of supervisors, who are to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the senate, and directs that "each supervisor shall designate to the superintendent suitable persons, and with the consent of the superintendent shall employ such persons as enumerators within his district, one for each subdivision, who shall be selected solely with reference to fitness and without reference to their political party affiliations." It will thus be seen that the act itself endeavors to incorporate the principle underlying civil service reform, which is that in these subordinate, non-political offices appointments shall go by merit, and not by political favor. If this provision had been fully enforced, complaints of the partisan character of the census could not justly be made; but, unfortunately, the supervisors were themselves largely appointed upon political considerations, and the result was that the appointments of enumerators was in many localities a matter of political patronage. Republican members of congress nominated great numbers. Sometimes the recommendation of democratic members or other influential politicians procured the appointment of a few, the object being apparently to add to the political strength of the office. The great mass of officials, clerks, supervisors and enumerators came from the republican party. Whatever the motive was, such a line of conduct was sure to discredit the result. Even had it been true that it was not possible to select the enumerators under civil service reform methods, it was certainly possible to select both clerks and supervisors without reference to political considerations; and the appointment of supervisors in this way would to a large extent insure the selection of non-partisan enumerators, as the law required. A careful inquiry made by your committee as to the character of the enumerators appointed shows that, while in some places political considerations had no weight and the work was, on the whole, well performed, yet the supervisors were influenced in many other cases by partisan considerations. Men were often chosen without reference to their fitness on account of their political services; and in such cases the work was often badly done, and in many instances thoroughly discredited.

As far as can be learned, the census was fairly well taken in Massachusetts. It was under the charge of a man who superintended the state census of 1885. Appointments were not made there for political reasons. The same is true of the first district of Maryland, where the supervisor was a well-known statistical expert.

The report furnished us by the secretary of the civil service association at Bangor, Maine, informs us that in that city the census seems to have been conducted in an impartial manner, and the men employed appear to have been selected for their efficiency.

The secretary of the civil service reform association of Newburg, N. Y., also reports that in that place the enumerators were apparently competent, and the result satisfactory, so far as known. The same report comes from the mayors of Atlanta, Ga., and Peoria, Ill.; and in Memphis, Tenn., while the result is unsatisfactory, this is not attributed to the enumerators, but to other local conditions.

From the secretary of the civil service reform association at Madison, Wis., your committee learned that the character of those employed in the enumeration was extremely various, some competent and some quite the reverse. One of the enumerators was so illiterate as to be unable to spell the most ordinary words and names, such as "Samuel," "Canada," "lawyer," etc. Others are supposed to have been appointed solely as matters of patronage, their appointments being controlled by the republican member of congress and the postmaster of Madison. The result of the census was most disappointing to the citizens, and the accuracy of the count is seriously questioned by men of both parties. The increase of population in ten years, as shown by the federal census, was 30.9-100 per cent. Comparing the vote cast for governor in 1880, the presidential year, with that cast for governor in 1890, a non presidential year, there is an increase of 57.45-100 per cent. Democrats speak of it as a significant fact that Mr. Lafollette (the republican member of congress) boasted that he had the name of every voter in the district.

The secretary of the civil service reform association at Norwich, Conn., says of the enumerators: "They are the men who are ready for odd jobs, given in the way party jobs usually are. I do not believe that a high degree of confidence is felt in the accuracy of the count from such information as I can gather. So far as the statistics of industries and general business are concerned, I am strongly of the belief that very little confidence is felt in their accuracy."

The civil service reform association of Buffalo send us the following:

"The census in Buffalo was not satisfactory to any of our citizens. The announcement of the result was much delayed, and was given out in a fragmentary and uncertain manner, necessitating several successive changes in figures. It was evident that in some of the enumeration districts the work was not done promptly and correctly, and these delayed the whole enumeration. The newspapers without regard to party condemned it. The mayor and the merchants' exchange formally expressed their dissatisfaction, and asked for a recount. * *

"The population of the city was first announced as about 252,000, then, after a special agent had been here, as about 257,000, and recently this has been changed to about 255,500.

"We are not prepared to say that the defects in the local census are wholly due to the incompetency of the enumerators. Indeed, some other contributing causes were apparent. Yet there is a general impression that, as a whole, the work of the enumerators was not well done, and as a body they were not equal to their task.

"The enumerators were nominally appointed by the local supervisor of the census, but actually they were forced upon him by the usual methods which control such appointments where they are not otherwise regulated by law. Personal considerations and partisan pressure undoubtedly dictated many of the appointments, and combined with other influences in bringing about others. It would not be fair to say that the fitness of the applicants was disregarded; but it was not the sole consideration. We have no hesitancy in asserting that the census in Buffalo would have been better taken if the enumerators had been selected on the basis of merit and fitness for their work, ascertained by suitable inquiries into these qualifications without regard to any other.

"We append, without further comment, a copy of a circular letter signed by the local supervisor of the census, which has been published in the newspapers. This was sent to some, and probably all, the enumerators. It has been stated that this letter was merely a personal communication from Mr. Douglass, not official, and that at the time he had no control over the enumerators, and did not in any way attempt to coerce them, and that he explained his position personally to some of them. We give you this explanation with the letter:

"OFFICE OF SUPERVISOR OF CENSUS FOR THE 11TH DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Oct. 28, 1890.

"To ———, Esq., Census Enumerator, Post-office ———, County of ———.

"My Dear Sir—As it is of the utmost importance that a republican member of congress be elected in this district, I shall feel personally obliged if, on the day of the election, you will work specially for Benjamin H. Williams, the republican candidate.

"Very truly yours, SILAS J. DOUGLASS."

Mr. C. R. Lane, formerly secretary of your investigating committee, informs us as follows, in regard to the enumeration in Indianapolis:

"First. The enumeration was conducted by partisan enumerators. * * * The appointees, as a rule, have been of fair character, but there are notable exceptions. One, a negro lawyer by profession, a disreputable man by nature and training, and an acknowledged gambler, was appointed on a promise just before the spring election, in order to hold his vote; and he was heard to boast that the appointing power did not dare to leave him off the list. He is a man whom respectable men would not admit to their houses except under protest. All appointments were delegated to a member of the local republican county central committee, for this county and Wayne county, to my positive knowledge. * * * The recommendations of this committee-man were followed almost without exception. It is perhaps worthy of remark that the committee-man found himself involved in infinite annoyance, and was heartily sick of his job before it was completed. He found himself laboring with no reward either of money, comfort, prestige, or conscience.

"Third. The results of the enumeration are satisfactory, this city showing a heavy rate of growth. Still, the satisfaction was obtained only after a vigorous onslaught of the press and privately by the alleged oversight of hundreds. Private enterprise was stirred up to assist in having every possible name enrolled. Every complaint was investigated, and the name added to the list, if not already there."

Your committee have received from Mr. Merrill Moores, the member of the republican central committee referred to in the foregoing communication, a letter from which they make the following extracts:

"Mr. Conger was appointed supervisor for this district. His home is at Flat Rock, on the south line of Shelby county, a good many miles from here. He has been a client of mine, and is a good fellow. One day he came into my office and said he was bothered with a lot of applications for appointment as enumerator, and that he had called upon nearly everybody he knew in town for advice, and most people he had talked with had said, 'Go to Merrill Moores; he knows more of these fellows than anybody else.' He wanted my advice as to the competency of the applicants. Of course I gave it to him. * * There were five democrats appointed, and I think they were all who applied. This was, perhaps, because democrats thought they would stand no chance; but the fact remains that there were no more applicants. The number of applicants was less than the number of districts in the city; and it was necessary to hunt up enumerators who were known to be competent, and persuade them to apply. * * I asked one or two of them in very bad districts to give me a list of the voters for their districts; but no poll was ever made, and no enumerator was asked as to the politics of any man in his territory, and I know, as a fact, that no statement of any sort of the politics of any man was made by any enumerator to any of our party. I paid myself for the list of voters, and obtained it for my personal use." * *

The secretary of the Geneva (N. Y.) Civil Service Reform Association informs us regarding the enumerators: "They were all republicans; but, from what information we could gather, they seem to have been appointed, not with the view to benefit the republican party, but with the sole view of enhancing the political fortune of the member from this district, Mr. John Raines. Mr. Raines's friends were provided for. Any one that opposed him was ignored. Consequently, there is a very bitter feeling against Mr. Raines in his own party, which came very near defeating him when he was up for re-election last November, although the district is strongly republican. * * * It was known that the enumerator received instructions to make a list of voters, and classify them as to party connection."

A copy of a letter from Congressman Raines to one of the enumerators appointed in this district was sent to your committee. It is as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR—As it is quite likely that you will in a few days be appointed enumerator for your district, I write you this in the strictest confidence. I would like very much that you should take the trouble, before you make your report to the supervisor of the census, and after you have taken all the names in your district, to copy in a small book the name and post-office address of every voter on the list. After you have done so, I wish you to send the book to me at Canandaigua. I ask you to do this as a personal favor, and to make no mention of the matter to any one. What I want is a full list of all the voters in your enumeration district. Will you please treat this matter as strictly confidential?

"Very truly yours, J. RAINES."

A letter was addressed to Mr. Raines as to the facts regarding this matter, and a copy of the letter was enclosed. He called upon the chairman of your committee, and stated that he could not say whether this was an exact copy of the letter sent, but that, if it were so, as might be the case, he had sent the letter in ignorance of the law, which required enumerators to keep secret the results of the enumeration, and that the census bureau was not responsible, but only the individual enumerator. He further stated that his purpose probably was to get this list for the purpose of distributing documents.

From the chairman of the civil service reform association of Bloomington, Monroe county, Ind., we learn that the enumerators were selected there, by and upon the recommendation of the chairman of the republican county committee. They were engaged in making poll lists for the republican party. Similar statements were made in regard to other counties and states.

In connection with these lists, your committee would call attention to section 8 of the act of March 1, 1889, which requires that each enumerator shall subscribe an oath that he will not disclose any information contained in the schedules, lists, or statements, to any person or persons except to his superior officers; and section 13 provides, that, if he shall, without the authority of the superintendent of the census, communicate to any person or persons not authorized to receive the same any information gained by him in the performance of his duty, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $500. If enumerators were allowed to remain ignorant of this law, the superintendent of the census deserves the greatest censure; if they were permitted to violate it wilfully, he is an accessory to the crime.

Hon. J. D. Alderson, M. C., of West Virginia, writes that the supervisor in his district has always been a prominent and active republican, was the nominee of his party for prosecuting attorney, and beaten by some five hundred more than his party's lack of majority. "I do not know a single case in which a democrat was appointed by him as enumerator. He was a candidate for the republican nomination for congress in 1890, but was defeated. We have all understood that his appointments were partisan, and made with some view at least to his nomination to congress; but there were too many pins for the holes, and he was not nominated, although many of his appointees were delegates to the convention in which he was defeated. In my own county the republican executive committee held a meeting, and voted for persons to be recommended for appointment as enumerators. Mr. Mann appointed some of the persons agreed upon, others not; but his appointee, in every case, was a republican."

It may be here remarked that the supervisors in all parts of the country were nearly always republicans, and generally republican politicians.

The following letter from Hon. H. Clay Evans, M. C., states what seems to be the grounds upon which many of these supervisors were appointed: "Mr. Park was appointed upon my recommendation, and it is not my custom to recommend either political or physical enuchs for appointment to office; and I presume he has followed a like rule in his appointment."

Undoubtedly the worst effects of the patronage system of appointments are apparent in the city of New York. One C. H. Murray, a republican politician, was made supervisor of the census of that city. The following circular letter from him, which has many times been published without question of its authenticity, shows the manner in which enumerators were selected:

"Dear Sir—You will please forward to this office a list of the applicants that the republican organization of your district desires to have named as census enumerators. This list must be sent here on or before April 1."

Of this method of appointment, President Walker, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who was superintendent of the ninth and tenth censuses, says, "If the selection of the enumerators was made upon any such bases as is implied by that, the census could not have been otherwise than bad." Such a method is a direct violation of Section 5 of the act providing for the present census, which prescribes that enumerators "shall be selected solely with reference to fitness, and without reference to their political party affiliations." Such a method is also a violation of the supervisor's oath of office. The manner in which the appointments were made pursuant to the plan outlined in this letter appears from the statement to a representative of this committee of M. A. Greaves, who was personally present at the meeting on March 28 at 2250 3d avenue, republican headquarters. All applications had been filled out in advance. Mr. Frank Raymond, a republican leader of the 23d assembly district, presided. Taking the applications, he seated himself at a table, with a couple of party workers beside him, who examined the republican roll and checked off the names as the appointments were made. The process was simple: Mr. Raymond would call a name, the man called would go to the table, and Mr. Raymond would ask him, "Are you upon the roll?" His answer was always in the affirmative. The next question was, "What district would you like?" The applicant would choose a district, which, if it had not been already selected, would be assigned to him.

It is evident enough that among men thus appointed there must have been a considerable number who were utterly unfit for the work. And it is not surprising that among these men Police Inspector Byrnes should recognize well known criminals. Mr. Byrnes states: "I know that some of the enumerators in this city were thieves. This very morning one of these enumerators came here to call upon me. He had been three times an inmate of the state prison. He was appointed upon the recommendation of a republican judge. This thief's name is known to all the city detectives, and his picture occupies a prominent place in the rogue's gallery. He did not take the oath in his own name, and his dealings with the census bureau were under an alias." The danger of employing such men as census enumerators is very evident. Private houses were opened to them with the understanding that the government was satisfied with their trustworthiness.

And, even in cases where the enumerators attempted to do their duty, obstacles were interposed, at the supervisor's office, which often made this impossible. For instance, Mr. Alfred B. Thieme, an enumerator residing at 37 Ludlow street, states that he could not get a sufficient number of blanks, and that many other enumerators were in the same predicament. His district was a tenement-house district, and very large; and it was difficult to extract from the people the necessary information. He wrote to the supervisor asking for an extension of time and was refused. He had to leave out several tenement houses. He returned three thousand names. Sheets were lost in the supervisor's office. Mr. Thieme believes, from his knowledge of this district, that there were four thousand people in it. He knew of other men who were refused an extension of time under the same circumstances, and their returns also were incomplete.

John W. Fulton, another enumerator, states that he returned all the people in his district that were in town, but that in block after block the houses were mostly closed, and hundreds were missed. He had no time to hunt up representatives of the absent families, nor was he inclined to do so at two cents a name. He was told to do the best he could about his schedule.

Mr. Samuel C. Sloan, a permanent boarder at the Madison square hotel, sends us an affidavit to the effect that there were thirty or forty permanent guests in this house, and at least ten domestics; that the census enumerators called but once, and took only two names, those of the proprietor and clerk; that Mr. Sloan notified Superintendent Murray forthwith, but that his complaint was never noticed and the census-taker never appeared again. This affidavit is also confirmed by an affidavit of Charles B. Fisher, the proprietor.

The probable inaccuracy of the census taken in the city of New York first became apparent from an examination of the vital statistics prepared by the health department of that city. Very few persons who have been residents of the metropolis during the last ten years can question the improved sanitary condition of the city. The direct supervision of the plumbing, drainage, and ventilation of new houses under the laws of 1879 and 1881, affecting about six thousand tenement-houses and many other dwellings constructed since that time, the almost total demolition of vaults and cesspools, throughout the city, and the more rigid control of contagious diseases, led to the belief that the death-rate had considerably decreased.

There is a certain class of diseases known to physicians as "preventable. These are diarrhoea and zymotic diseases, the latter including small-pox, measles, diphtheria, meningitis, scarlet, typhoid, typhus, malarial and puerperal fevers, etc. These generally result from bad air, bad water and bad drainage—causes which can be greatly diminished by improved sanitary conditions. And, in fact, if the present census be assumed to be correct, and the population on June 1, 1890, be regarded as 1,513,501, as reported, the death rate from zymotic diseases has decreased during the past decade from 8.31 per cent. to 7.29 per cent., and the death rate in diarrhoeal diseases from 3.59 per cent. to 2.77 per cent. The death rate from consumption has also diminished. This shows the improved sanitary condition of the city. But during the same time the general death rate has advanced from 27.44 per cent. to 27.54 per cent., so that by the federal census we have the startling coincidence of an improved sanitary condition and an increased death rate. If the federal census were true, there was also a considerable increase of the percentage of registered voters and of names in the city directory in proportion to the population.

In addition to this, the count of the city, as first added up and published, gave a population more than 100,000 greater than the aggregate afterward published.

These things led to the belief that the count was inaccurate; and the police authorities, by order of the mayor, had the population of the city recounted. The result showed a population nearly 200,000 greater than that shown by the federal enumeration, and the mayor accordingly asked the census bureau for a recount. This was not granted. The request was then made to the secretary of the interior; and the books containing the names, as taken by the police authorities, were sent to Washington, where Mr. Kenny, their custodian, offered to the secretary of the interior to take them for his inspection to any place the secretary might designate, and to keep them there for comparison with the federal schedules as long as might be necessary, the books still remaining in Mr. Kenny's custody. The secretary refused to receive them unless they were absolutely surrendered to the exclusive custody of the federal authorities, which Mr. Kenny was not authorized to do. The New York authorities, considering it impracticable to procure copies of the entire federal enumeration, which would involve vast expense, determined to take one of the wards of the city and make the necessary comparison, and a copy of the federal enumeration in the second ward was demanded, this being one of the smallest wards in the city, and one in which the comparison could be most easily made. A copy of the federal list for the second ward was furnished. It contained 826 names, and 8 of these were found upon inquiry to belong to the first ward. The police enumeration for the second ward contained 1,340 names—a difference of 414, or more than 41 per cent. above the federal enumeration.

The board of health had previously taken an enumeration of the inhabitants of this ward during the first part of September. It was made rapidly in a single day, but it showed a population of 274 more than was reported in the federal census.

The New York authorities now procured from the persons whose names appeared in the police enumeration, but who had been omitted from the census affidavits, showing their residence in that ward on the first of June last. Affidavits were furnished showing the residence of some 328 of these persons. The chairman of your committee has inspected a number of the books containing the police enumeration, as well as a copy of the federal enumeration and of the health enumeration of the second ward. The work done by the police presents a neat appearance, and is in each instance verified by an affidavit. There are no doubt inaccuracies in it; and some of the affidavits of the residents afterwards taken are irregular in form. But a comparison of the two lists certainly indicates that a very large number of the residents of this ward were omitted in the federal enumeration. For instance, your chairman ascertained that in the two squares bounded by Broadway, John, Nassau, and Liberty streets, there were no less than twelve houses wholly omitted from the census, in which it appears, both from the police reports and by the affidavits, that there were thirty-eight persons residing on the first of June last.

The chairman of your committee called upon John Kiernan, the enumerator of this district, and inquired concerning the manner of his appointment, and was told he secured it through the "regular channel," as an enrolled republican of the third assembly district; that he got it through Charles Wagner, the brother of the candidate for the assembly; that one Reed was first appointed, also through the "regular channels," but soon found that it did not pay, and gave up the job after he had taken about fifteen names. Mr. Kiernan exhibited his commission, which was evidently the same one that had been issued to Reed in the first place, the name of Reed having been erased and his own inserted. Mr. Kiernan said that Reed threw down his book and was never required to report. The schedules taken by Reed and given to Kiernan, who proceeded to verify them; but some of the persons thus taken refused to give Kiernan any information, saying that they had already been enumerated. The names upon these schedules were not included by Kiernan in his returns. On December 8th, Kiernan telegraphed to Superintendent Porter, "Schedules containing about fifteen names which were not included in my returns, will be mailed to you early Monday morning." Kiernan stated that he had been unable to find these,—they had been lying somewhere around the house, but he could not find them. In this he was corroborated by the other members of the family, who said they had looked everywhere around the house, but that these schedules could not be found.

Nothing more seems necessary to show the untrustworthiness of a census taken by men appointed through the "regular channels" of political machinery.

And it seems that in a number of cases the names reported by Mr. Kiernan did not appear in the federal lists. Whether the schedules containing these names were lost or destroyed, or in what manner the discrepancy occurred, is not known. Among these houses were the following: 102, 152, 140 Nassau street, 35 Park Row, 25 Ann street, 50 Nassau street. Many others can be given. These facts appear from a comparison between the telegram sent by Mr. Kiernan to Mr. Porter, and read to the census committee of the house of representatives, with a copy of the federal enumeration of the second ward.*

Indeed, there is strong reason to doubt the completeness of the enumeration made, not only in New York City, but throughout the entire country. Numerous corrections and additions have been made, and in cases where a recount was ordered, the enumeration was sometimes found to be greatly defective. Thus Multnomah county, Oregon, had a recount, the result of which showed a population of 75,657, whereas the first enumeration gave only 61,000.† In several other cases, the enumeration was found to be incomplete when compared with the results of subsequent recounts by the local authorities. For instance, in the city of St. Louis over 12,000 names, and in Augusta, Ga., 4,150 (or over 12½ per cent. of the whole) appear to have been omitted. Of course, there is always a question which of the two enumerations are the more trustworthy, where two have thus been made; but, since the total result falls far short of what is to be expected from the statistics of emigration, vital statistics and other evidences of growth, it is not unfair to presume that in many places where the first returns are still uncorrected they are probably inaccurate and unreliable.

The bulletin of October 30, 1890, announces that the population of the United States was 62,480,540. In this bulletin the superintendent of the census considered it necessary to explain this result.

"Upon their face these figures show that the population has increased between 1880 and 1890 only 727,345 more than between 1870 and 1880, while the rate of increase has apparently diminished from 30.08 to 24.57 per cent. If these figures were derived from correct data, they would indeed be disappointing. Such a reduction in the rate of increase, in the face of the enormous immigration during the past ten years, would argue a great diminution in the fecundity of the population or a corresponding increase in its death-rate.

"These figures are, however, easily explained. It is well known, the fact having been demonstrated by extensive and thorough investigation, that the census of 1870 was grossly deficient in the southern states, so much so as not only to give an exaggerated rate of increase of population between 1870 and 1880 in these states, but to effect materially the rate of the increase of the country at large.

"There is of course no means of ascertaining accurately the extent of these omissions, but in all probability they amounted to not less than 1,500,000. There is but little question that the population of the United States in 1870 was at least 40,000,000 instead of 38,558,371, as stated. If this estimate of the extent of the omissions in 1870 be correct, the absolute increase between 1870 and 1880 was only about 10,000,000, and the rate of increase was not far from 25 per cent. These figures compare much more reasonably with similar deductions from the population in 1880 and 1890."

The superintendent therefore justifies his own figures by assuming that the omissions in the census of 1870 were not less than 1,500,000. He evidently sees that, unless this can be established, the results of the present census will be discredited. But in this explanation Mr. Porter makes no mention of the great increase of immigration in the past decade—some two and one-half millions greater than in either of the preceding ten-year periods. This would make a difference of some 3½ per cent.; and Francis A. Walker, who superintended the taking of the ninth and tenth census, showed very clearly, in an address delivered before the National Academy of Science at Boston, on November 11th, that a discrepancy of 1,500,000 in the census of 1870 could not exist. That there were inaccuracies was not denied; but these losses occurred in districts where the colored people greatly outnumbered the whites, and where they had no regular abodes and often no family names. The percentage of growth in the whole country by decades and by periods of twenty and thirty years is as follows:

*As the enumerators in New York City were appointed through the machinery of the republican party, and as the city had a large democratic majority, and the result appeared to be an underestimation of the population, it was inferred that the error was intentionally made for the purpose of reducing the representation of New York in congress. This inference, whether correct or not, was natural and inevitable, and will always be made whenever political considerations invade the census bureau.

†The president of the board of trade of Portland writes us that some of these enumerators were "political hacks," others too old to do the work, others mentally incompetent.

Census.	10-year period.
1810	36.3
1820	33.1
1830	33.5
1840	32.6
1850	35.8
1860	35.6
1870	22.6
1880	30.8
1890	24.6

The percentage of increase in the colored population (where the census of 1870 was defective) is as follows:

Census.	Total per cent.	10-year period.	20-year period.	30-year period.
1790	19.3
1800	18.9	32.3
1810	19.0	37.5	82.0
1820	18.4	28.6	77.0	134.0
1830	18.2	31.4	69.0	133.0
1840	16.8	23.4	62.2	108.6
1850	15.7	26.6	56.3	105.4
1860	14.1	22.1	54.6	90.7
1870	12.7	9.9	34.1	69.8
1880	13.1	34.8	48.1	80.8

Taking the twenty years' periods, these show a constant decline in the percentage of increase of the colored people.

From 1860 to 1880 the fall is from 54.6 to 48.1 per cent. Now, if the census of 1870 be omitted, and the ratio in that year be fixed at the higher figure, the number of colored people would be 5,624,505. If the lower ratio, 48.1, be taken, the number would be 5,390,894. If the 30-years' period be adopted, the extremes to be followed were 90.7 for 1860 and 80.8 for 1880. If the former be taken, the number of colored people in the country in 1870 would have been 5,489,196. If the latter figure be taken, the number would be 5,206,992. The real figures could hardly have been higher than one of these estimates. The census of 1870 returned the colored population at 4,880,009. The true colored population, if the census be omitted, must have been between the limits of 5,206,992 and 5,624,505. Taking either of these figures, the inaccuracy of the census of 1870 would be less than one-half the one and one-half millions which Mr. Porter claims, and the figures derived from the present census remain still unexplained.

In the face of the inaccuracies conceded and the omissions proved, it is far more likely that the present census is incomplete than that there has been the great diminution in the fecundity of the population or a corresponding increase in its death-rate which its figures necessarily imply.

Your committee consider the following propositions have been established by the results of their inquiries:

1. That the refusal to apply the civil service reform system of open, non-partisan competitive examinations in appointments to the clerical force of the census bureau was violation by the President of a promise contained in the republican platform in 1888, and indorsed in his letter of acceptance.

2. That by the appointment of enumerators on political grounds, in open violation of Sect. 5 of the census act, great numbers of incompetent men have been engaged in taking the census, and that in many places attempts have been made to use official positions for the benefit of the party in power.

3. That while in some places the results of the work appear to be free from partisan color and to be accurately and well done, yet in many places the work has been carelessly and badly done, and is open to the suspicion that partisan considerations have not been absent, and that finally, there is a widespread distrust of the accuracy of the census, which greatly impairs its value to the country, and which is caused in great measure by the fact that the census bureau has been conducted upon the spoils system.

Your committee desires to express its belief that no census will hereafter receive the confidence of the people until it has been wholly removed from partisan influences; and they trust that in the future such successful examples as have already been made of the merit system will be followed in all federal enumerations.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

Charles Oehl testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You are a clerk in the office here? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Have you been identified with the Johnson or Henderson factions? A. I haven't been identified with either of them.

Q. But they have these two factions in your ward? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the two factions are going to fight for supremacy next Monday, are they not? A. I suppose so.

Q. And to whom did you contribute, if at all, to what faction? A. I contributed to the club of which I am a member.

Q. Was $5 the sum you contributed? A. Well, I gave that free gratis to them.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) You gave this, you say, through the president of the club, who is a Mr. Pierson? A. Yes, sir; for the benefit of the club, to help to keep the club up; mostly for social enjoyment; that is, to benefit the mind, and discussing the things of the day, etc.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) How much did you contribute last fall? A. I didn't contribute anything.

Q. You made no contribution last fall? A. I gave a few dollars voluntarily.

Q. I mean voluntarily entirely, but how much did you give voluntarily last fall; was it $15? A. Fifteen dollars; I think it was about that.

* * * * *

Henry Martin testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) You are a letter-carrier? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Now, as a matter of fact, do you know whether on that day or some other day soon after that there was a meeting of six or seven employes of the post-office, among them being yourself and Glass and Reed, at the rooms of the Fairmount Club, where there was a discussion as to the amount of money there would be needed for the primaries? A. No, sir.

Q. You don't remember anything of any such discussion? A. Nothing about anything like that; no, sir.

Q. Well, what do you recollect about it, about that or any other discussion taking place at that time? A. Well, we were going to buy a pool table; we wanted to get a pool table in the room for the enjoyment of the members, and that is what we were talking about.

Q. At that time? A. Yes, sir.

Q. On that occasion? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, as a matter of fact, did any of these persons whose names I have mentioned subscribe anything towards the expenses of the primaries? A. No, sir; not as I know of.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of Mitchell? I don't know what his first name is; he is employed in some capacity on the elevator. A. Yes, sir; I know him. I am not personally acquainted with him; that is, I don't know him well.

Q. Do you know whether he was present on that occasion, at that meeting? A. Well, I don't know whether he was or not.

(See testimony of W. A. Mitchell, September CHRONICLE.)

Q. Do you know whether he has contributed any money towards the primaries? A. I think not.

Q. Whether he has contributed anything to the primaries? A. No, sir; none of us contributed any money for the primaries.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Well, for the purchase of this pool table? A. Not yet, no sir; we are going to get a pool table for the enjoyment of the members of the club. I suppose there ain't anything wrong about that?

Mr. Bonaparte: I suppose not. A. We want some kind of enjoyment.

Q. Now, you say for the primaries there has not been any discussion about taking up a contribution at all? A. No, sir.

Q. You have given something toward the expenses of the primaries, yourself, haven't you? A. No, sir.

Q. Nothing at all? A. No, sir.

Q. And you haven't received anything from anyone else for them? A. No, sir.

* * * * *

Note—At this point, W. A. Mitchell was recalled, and the following questions put to him in the presence of the witness:

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Do you know Mr. Martin? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, was he the person whom you testified had acted as treasurer for that fund that was subscribed? A. Somebody said that he was willing to give it to him.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) He was the man to whom you gave your $5. A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Was there anyone else who acted as treasurer on that occasion? A. That, gentlemen, I couldn't say.

Q. You don't think there is any mistake, is there, in your mind as to its being this Martin and not somebody else? A. That is the gentleman I gave it to.

Mr. Bonaparte: That will do.

(Whereupon the witness Mitchell retired.)

Q. (Roosevelt.) Have you anything to say in answer to that?

Witness. In answer to what?

Mr. Roosevelt. To his statement.

A. I have nothing to say about that; that's all right.

Q. Do you deny it? A. I don't deny that he gave me $5.

Q. You don't deny that? A. No, sir; he gave me $5.

Q. What was that for? A. To buy a pool table; we were going to buy a pool table.

Note.—The witness W. A. Mitchell was again recalled.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What did you give that for; what was the object of the gift of that $5 to Mr. Martin? Didn't you testify that it was for legitimate expenses of the primaries? A. Yes, sir; that's what I said.

Q. Was there any talk about its being for any other purpose but that? A. They were talking about buying a pool table.

Q. Did you subscribe the $5 for the purpose you testified; you testified that you subscribed for the primaries? A. Yes, sir; I did; but I was willing to give it, though, for the pool table; we have got to have a meeting about that yet; which way it will go.

(Whereupon the witness Mitchell retired.)

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) I think that is all, unless you want to make some further explanation. A. I have no further explanation to make.

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) But you didn't have any talk that night about the primaries at all? A. No, sir.

John H. Ashton testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What is your position? A. I am fireman in the post-office.

Q. Appointed by Mr. Johnson as custodian of the public buildings? Appointed by the secretary of the treasury.

Q. How long ago since you were appointed? A. This November past a year ago; what date I disremember.

Q. (Mr. Bonaparte.) Do you know a man by the name of Frederick Hammond? A. Yes, sir.

Q. He was at one time employed in the government service, wasn't he? A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Did Mr. Hammond show you a subscription paper for the expenses of the primaries next Monday? A. Yes, sir; he didn't show it to me; he didn't tell me what it was for; he had it in his hand.

Q. He was holding it in his hand? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You say he didn't tell you what it was for? Just tell us how you knew it was for that purpose?

Witness: How I knew it, or him?

Mr. Bonaparte: Well, how did you know it in the first place, and then how did he know you knew it?

A. I didn't know for what purpose he had it.

Q. What did he say to you about this paper? A. He came to me and if I remember now he asked me if I contributed anything, and I told him no; I told him that the engineers or some of them in the building generally came down stairs and had a talk when anything like that was going on; so nothing more was said and he went away. That is all that was said.

* * * * *

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) Now, did this man Hammond tell you at the same time that he showed you the paper that he had collected a certain number of subscriptions? A. They were marked, you know, on there, "five."

Q. You mean that there were five subscribers or $5? A. No sir, $5.

Q. Opposite the various names, was that? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember whether these names were among those that were down there, John F. Thomas, superintendent of the registry division? A. I seen his name there.

Q. George Sears, was that down? A. Yes, sir.

Q. George W. Johnson? A. W. W. Johnson, I seen his name.

Q. That would be the postmaster? A. Yes, sir; and George W. Johnson.

Q. Were there any others? A. Yes, sir, there were others; but I don't remember the others. In fact, I didn't know the others.

Q. Now, you are pretty clear in your mind that you didn't pay anything yourself? A. No, sir.

Q. Do I understand you to say that you didn't pay to anybody? A. I paid the sum; that is, I intend to pay the sum.

Q. You have promised to pay it to somebody? A. Yes, sir.

Q. But it was not to Hammond? A. No, I didn't make any promises to him at all. I told him in this way, I says, "I guess I will see them people about that."

Q. What did you mean by that? A. I told him that generally the engineer, he generally said something if there was anything like that on hand, and I was in closer contact with him than anybody else. I told him it was a wonder that he hadn't said something if there was anything like that on hand.

Q. Who was the engineer? A. Mr. Pierson.

Q. Noah R. Pierson? A. Yes, sir.

Q. What you told Hammond was that you wondered that Mr. Pierson hadn't said something to you about it? A. I said, "It is a wonder that he hasn't."

Q. Now, at that time Pierson hadn't said anything to you on the subject, as I understand? A. No, sir.

Q. Did you tell Hammond that you expected to pay your money through Pierson? A. No, sir; I didn't tell him that I intended to pay any money at all.

Q. To whom had you promised to pay this? A. Nobody.

Q. Then we misunderstood you in saying that you had promised to pay it to somebody just now? A. No, sir; I said, "It was a wonder that some of them hadn't been there if there was anything to be paid; it is a wonder that somebody hadn't said something about it." And me being in closer contact with the engineer I thought if anybody there was contributing anything they would certainly let me know; if there was a contribution to be made I would know it.

Q. In other words—let me understand you—you mean that you were surprised that these other officers who were so much more with you hadn't mentioned this contribution to you rather than Hammond? A. That an outsider altogether, if there was to be any; but there wasn't anything said to me about any.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

VOL. I, No. 35.

Published monthly. Publication office, No. 23, Meridian St., Indianapolis, Ind. Address, THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, Indianapolis, Ind.

MR. W. C. PHIPPS has been in the city service in different capacities for thirteen years, the later years of his service having been in the capacity of chief clerk of the engineer's office. He has been regarded as an especially efficient man, particularly in matters relating to forms and methods of business. The charter requires a written statement of the cause of dismissal, and the city engineer thus states it:

"I desire for the betterment of the service in my office to introduce a new method of keeping accounts; define a policy of keeping a systematic record and have made the change referred to in order that in the position of chief clerk I could have an appointee who thoroughly understands the systematic methods to be pursued."

Mr. Phipps publicly states, and it is not denied, that the city engineer first told him that he would keep him as long as he desired to stay, and later that he wanted a democrat in Phipps' place. The latter says that the city engineer admitted both of these statements before the board of public works, to whom the matter of the dismissal was referred. The city will not believe that Mr. Phipps was not competent to take charge of and improve upon any methods of book-keeping which the city engineer could devise; on the other hand, the belief will be very general that Phipps was discharged solely to make room for a democrat. The city government, by its neglect to comply with the charter in the matter of the city civil service, is inviting an appeal to the courts which in due time will be made.

INDIANA affords to day the most interesting example of the evil of the rule that a President may be re-elected. Strike out the federal office-holders and it is safe to say that a majority of the new republican state committee, and of the delegates to the coming national convention would not have been Harrison men. This fact was recognized by the administration and accordingly the full power of the federal patronage was turned on. Throughout the state it has been used with consummate skill and slyness. It is not a popular move, and to the utmost possible extent its use has been veiled. No clumsy and brazen bull-doing by federal officials, such as the democrats practiced under the late administration, appeared. All was smooth and secret, but federal patronage was never more powerful. For instance, Marshal Ransdell came from Washington, but his coming was not announced by the Journal. Hanna, a law officer of the government, appears and holds a secret conference with republicans not active in politics. Warren G. Sayre, of the Indian service, suddenly has business in Indiana, and so on through a long list. Meanwhile, thousands of postmasters and other minor officials give their attention to setting up the primaries and with such success that Harrison will apparently have a majority of the state committee. Whether he will have a unanimous delegation to the national convention is yet undecided.

THE undisputed facts are that the reelection of Senator Sherman was secured by federal office-holders. There has never before been a case where in such numbers and with such aggregate strength, federal office holders have worked upon a state legislature which is supposed to act with deliberation and free from federal influence. Any one can see what this practice if continued by successive Presidents would lead to. The immense power of the federal government through its patronage would destroy the free action of the state legislatures. The worst of it is that Senator Sherman saw what was going on and admitted it and sanctioned it. In the fullness of years of eminent service to his country, he was in a position to say, "If the legislature of Ohio desires to elect a blather-skite like Foraker in my place, I will submit. If the Cincinnati Tammany headed by an illiterate keeper of a notorious dive can go among the members of the Ohio legislature, and influence them to defeat me, I will submit. If the respectable citizens of Ohio choose to stand aloof and allow this disreputable gang to secure my defeat, I will abide the result." A defeat under such circumstances would have been a badge of honor.

IN the summer of 1891 Sherman S. Rogers, President of the Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association, applied for information as to the number of post-offices having twenty or more employes. He received the following reply:

On your stating the use you desire to make of the information in regard to the postal employes, further consideration will be given to your request.

Very respectfully, E. C. FOWLER,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

It would not seem that Mr. Rogers, armed with the information asked for, could have done any great damage. Yet the administration seems to be working on the same line with the Czar, who sends subjects to Siberia upon suspicion of a desire to change the existing imperial rule.

POSTMASTER FLOOD, of Elmira, hearing that he had been removed upon charges filed against him, wrote to Postmaster-General Wanamaker demanding a copy of the charges. To this Wanamaker answered as follows:

Your demand for a copy of the inspector's report can not be complied with, because this administration adopted the course laid down by President Cleveland, to regard such reports as confidential papers, and to neither allow them to go out of the office nor to permit copies of them to be made.

Very respectfully, JOHN WANAMAKER, Postmaster-General.

It is difficult to fitly characterize this transaction. The facts are that Flood was not a friend of Platt or Sloat Fassett, and they, smarting under overwhelming defeat, are hunting up subjects for vengeance, and the administration is trying to help them. To this end it sends an "inspector" to Elmira who is nothing but a tool of Wanamaker's. He makes a report which Wanamaker and the administration are ashamed to publish, knowing that it would bring upon them the contempt of the people. They therefore pursue a star chamber method and remove Flood. It is to be hoped that the time will come when the sneaks and cowards who get into public office will understand that the American people mean to have the accused confronted with the charges and with his accusers.

WE have received from the Postmaster General a copy of his last report and enclosed with it a broadside of editorials deemed suitable for the use of the press and abounding in such expressions as "Mr. Wanamaker believes," and "the Postmaster General argues strenuously," and so on. Preferring to prepare our own remarks, we leave the broadside to the subsidized press.

Mr. Wanamaker can not boast sufficiently of what he calls "an enlargement of the scheme of promotions on merit." He says that formerly a great majority discovered that there was no recognition of merit and gave up the struggle for advancement and he felt that "there was but one way to bring about the greatest state of efficiency in the clerical force" and that was to advance, reduce, retain or dismiss on merit only, without regard to influence. He therefore introduced a daily record and competitive examination system. At the first examination, twenty-three were examined for two vacancies and the successful competitors were women. Ninety-two were examined for twenty-seven promotions in about three months. Mr. Wanamaker says "the results of this competitive merit system have been extremely gratifying. * * * There is marked improvement in the quantity and quality of the work done from day to day." He has further issued an order extending this scheme to all post-offices having fifty employees. Is this the same Mr. Wanamaker, whose present private secretary was, in Mr. Wanamaker's behalf, writing over the country in 1889 when this same merit system Mr. Wanamaker now boasts of governed admission to over 30,000 places in the federal service, asking "why both parties should not discard their insincere professions and have the patriotism to go back to the old system," that is, to the spoils system?

WE must criticise Mr. Wanamaker for obviously not living up to the precept to turn the other cheek. He smarts under the smiting of Mr. Roosevelt and, therefore, tries to establish a merit system independent of the civil service commission. He says "this can be done more fairly and conscientiously in a great department like this from within than from the outside." This is clearly from spite, for Mr. Wanamaker's successor can overturn his system at a word, while if it is put under the civil service commission he would be powerless to disturb it. Another instance is Mr. Wanamaker's comments on the bill to regulate the appointment of fourth-class postmasters. He says it may be doubted whether members of congress will give up the privilege "of furnishing the department with desired and welcome information touching the qualifications of candidates," that is, will give up their usurped power of appointing their henchmen fourth-class postmasters. Wanamaker says, "I fancy that the surrender of this power * * * is a long way in the future." It seems inconsistent that he can say of his new promotion scheme that it takes out of any man's hands the power of promoting "under the influence of social or political friendships," and yet can look complacently and without protest upon the appointment of over 50,000 postmasters under the same influences. The obvious reason is that this bill is from the "outside," and is supported by those who have had occasion to smite Mr. Wanamaker to bring him to a proper sense of his shortcomings, not only as a public officer, but as a man.

NO FACT is in these days more prominent than that the merit system has conquered its way and is steadily coming to its own. Against every kind of opposition it has reached the control of original admission to thirty-two thousand high-salaried places in the federal service, this being under the civil service commission. In addition we have the spectacle of cabinet officers originally unfriendly but now thoroughly stampeded by the onward march of the competitive system, running races with each other to get the system introduced throughout their departments. Thus Secretary Tracy has revolutionized the navy yards. Mr. Wanamaker has made the despised civil service reform stone the head of the corner in his department, and now brags that he is the original maker of that stone. Now comes Secretary Foster with an admirable set of rules for promotions on merit in his department, devised by Mr. De Land. Lastly comes Secretary Noble with the most stringent and refined set of rules yet established.

Nobody denies that Mr. Croker asserts truthfully that Tammany Hall is the only organization in the city recognized by the democratic party of New York, nor that Governor Hill is the actual democratic leader in the state. Nor will anybody deny that Mr. Platt is the republican leader in New York, and Mr. Quay in Pennsylvania, nor that the attempt to justify the appointment of Mr. Elkins is an evidence of decline in the true standard of the public service. It is a time when parties do not represent the actual division of political opinion, and when both parties degrade the political standard, and it is therefore a time of greater political independence than ever.—Harper's Weekly, January 2.

AT no time since between 1850 and 1860, have voters shaken off the shackles of party as they do now. It is to be encouraged by every means. We may continue to be ruled by the Platts and Quays, the Hills and Gormans, but not if the independents do their duty and work each over against his own house.

IS THE REFORM OF THE CIVIL SERVICE A MORAL QUESTION?

There was a striking illustration of the tragedies which spring from the spoils system in the recent death of Col. Bario, of Connecticut, late an inspector in the post-office department. He served with honor in the civil war, and had been colonel of the second regiment Connecticut National Guard. In 1886 he was appointed a post-office inspector, and soon won the reputation of being the best in New England. So shrewd and successful did he prove that he was often sent for from New York, and even as far away as Ohio. Through his work in his special field, the United States district attorney had been enabled to convict forty Connecticut postmasters of selling stamps on credit to a firm of New York architects, for which offense one of the firm was fined $5,000 and sent to jail for one day. He secured the evidence that resulted in the indictment of the New Orleans lottery men, and he broke up the infamous Connecticut "card game," the "one dollar time-piece" scheme, the "Scriptural fake," and other notorious swindles. Recently he had been engaged in collecting evidence against five postmasters of New Haven county, who are charged with selling postage stamps on credit in violation of law. He was devoted to his work, and was in every way an official who had the confidence of his superiors and earned a permanent tenure. On Friday of last week, as a New Year's gift, came the announcement from Washington that he must summarily surrender his office, solely because he was a democrat in politics. The United States attorney, the United States commissioner, and the New Haven postmaster, met last Monday to confer regarding the offending postmasters, and awaited the arrival of Inspector Bario. Here is the story of what followed:

"I never knew him to be tardy before," said Attorney Sill.

"Nor I," said Postmaster Sperry.

"Then they began talking about his removal by the President, the news of which had only reached them that morning.

"It's a shame," said Mr. Sperry, who is one of the most prominent republicans of the state, "and it will break Bario's heart. I never knew a man so wrapped up in his duties as he."

"Nor I," said Mr. Sill; "and I'd give more for Bario than for all the other inspectors in New England put together."

"Let us write to Washington," said Postmaster Sperry, "and remonstrate against his removal."

"The other gentleman acquiesced, and sat down and wrote to Washington. It was decided to ask District Judge Shipman, recently appointed to the circuit court of appeals, United States Commissioner Marvin, and Postmaster Bennett of Hartford to write similar letters, and their willingness to so write was doubted by none. Then they speculated again on the inspector's tardiness, and it was not until an evening paper was handed in which announced his sudden death at noon on Saturday that they knew the reason of his failure to report.

"He has been removed by a higher power than the President," said Mr. Sill."

The case of Colonel Bario illustrates not only the tragedies involved in the spoils system, but also the singular indifference of the public. It is enough to kill many a man to be summarily removed from a place in private service which he knows he has filled capably, faithfully, and satisfactorily, and which he desires to retain. The shock of summary discharge from the public service under similar conditions is often quite as hard for a high-spirited man to bear. The public would be filled with indignation against the private employer who would thus disgrace a meritorious subordinate. Yet it looks coolly on while the public employer rewards capacity, industry and fidelity with removal. Americans are not a heartless people in their relations "between man and man," but when it comes to the relations between the people as the state and its employes they witness the most shocking spectacles of inhumanity with an equanimity worthy only of savages.—New York Evening Post, January 9.

For a President to manipulate the federal service to secure a re-nomination is a bold assumption of royal power,

When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent, whom a horde of office-holders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for re-election a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate and intelligent political action which must characterize a government by the people.—[Letter of Acceptance, 1884, Grover Cleveland.]

IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Senator Quay was asked if it was true, as reported, that his second choice for the Presidential nomination is Gen. Alger, and he replied: "I am for Secretary Blaine. He is my choice."

"But who is your second choice, Senator?"

"I have no second choice."

"Do you think Blaine will be a candidate?"

"I really don't know; but if Mr. Blaine is not a candidate, I don't think he will refuse to accept the nomination if it is tendered him."—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, December 30.

* * *

It looks as if there was to be a general shaking up of Senator Quay's office holding lieutenants in Western Pennsylvania by order of the President. There are allegations concerning the mismanagement of affairs in the office of Internal Revenue Collector Samuel D. Warmcastle so serious that the collector will visit Washington to-morrow to ascertain just what the special agents of the treasury department have discovered about him and his subordinates. The statement is made that Warmcastle is to be removed. The friends of the President want the office in the hands of a man in harmony with the administration, in view of the fact that the district embraces nearly half the counties in the state, and its influence will therefore be important in the selection of national delegates. Congressman Dalzell is also determined that the collector shall not use his office offensively for Quay in the senatorial contest next year.

The office of United States District Attorney Walter Lyon will also be shaken up. The allegation is made that it is run too expensively. It is said that Lyon maintains three assistants, at an expense of $5,000 annually, though there is only about half as much to do as there was when the district attorney had but one assistant. Lyon is another Quay lieutenant and presided at Quay's state convention in 1890, when Delamater was nominated for governor.

It is possible that the post-office department will be asked to make inquiry as to the offensive partisanship of Assistant Postmaster Albert J. Edwards and Custodian W. W. Colville. Charges made last spring against Postmaster John A. Gilleland of Alleghany, will also be revived. Gilleland is a Quay man. The allegation being made that he was incompetent, an investigation was ordered, and a report was filed sustaining the charge. Through the influence of Congressman Bayne this report was ignored at the time.

Altogether the future does not appear to be promising for Quay office holders at this end of the state.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, December 5.

Congressman Dalzell's ambition to succeed Senator Quay is said to be at the bottom of Dalzell's alleged desire to remove Samuel Warmcastle from the office of collector of internal revenue for this district, which includes twenty-four counties. This is the gist of an article in this morning's issue of the Commercial-Gazette, the Pittsburgh organ of Quay. A special agent was sent from Washington to make an investigation, and the Commercial-Gazette says that he was frequently visited by ex-Revenue Collector Frank P. Case and Congressman Dalzell. Case set up the delegates for Dalzell in his congressional campaign, and wanted another term as collector. He is now city assessor. The report of the special agent does not reflect criminally upon Collector Warmcastle, who was for many years a high official of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and is highly respected by the business element here. It is said the report censures him for carelessness in selecting subordinates, failure to keep a strict watch over them, and devoting too much time to private matters. Collector Warmcastle and Senator Quay will both be in Washington to-morrow and a conference will be held. In this connection, the position of Chris Magee on the senatorial question is much debated. It is said that he would like to support Dalzell, but dare not, because Quay is alleged to have had a hand in terminating the rate war between rival street car lines here, one owned by Magee, the other by the Elkins-Widner syndicate of Philadelphia, and who have always been close to Quay. A termination of the war helped Magee financially.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Evening Post, December 5.

Internal revenue collector Samuel D. Warmcastle of the twenty-third district, expects to be out of office within the next few days. He returned from Washington this morning where he had been for two days putting in a defense to charges against him. He said this morning that he would probably resign. Then he went down to Beaver and had a conference with Senator Quay, and on his return said he would await the action of the President, in whose hands the case now is. The charges against Mr. Warmcastle are that he did not turn over the funds in his care as soon as is required by the internal revenue laws and that he paid employees for full time when they were sometimes engaged in political work instead of serving the Government. Mr. Warmcastle has been Senator Quay's principal lieutenant in western Pennsylvania, but the ex-national chairman now concedes that his case is hopeless, and has not gone to Washington to try to save him. C. L. Magee who until recently was Quay's bitterest political enemy in Pennsylvania, but who became reconciled to him in the late state campaign, is now in Washington trying to induce President Harrison to allow the collector to resign. Mr. Warmcastle's expression to-day indicates that he will succeed and that the collector will be saved the disgrace of dismissal.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, December 12.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 23.—The President to-day issued an order for the removal of Samuel D. Warmcastle, collector of internal revenue for the twenty-third district of Pennsylvania (Pittsburgh).

President Harrison will not have a delegate in the next national convention from this city unless Senator Quay and those who represent him in Philadelphia recede from their present position. The only opportunity President Harrison's friends had of making an attempt to elect delegates in his interest was brushed aside yesterday by the republican campaign committee.

About a week ago it became apparent that the Quay people were opposed to the election of Harrison delegates, and machinery was put in motion to reduce their chances of success to a minimum. The office holders who, of course, would be loyal to President Harrison, depended on the special primaries, when they would make an appeal to the people for their delegates to the convention. The Quay people yesterday deprived them of this opportunity, by securing the passage of a resolution that the primaries to elect delegates to the national convention be held on Jan. 12, when delegates to the conventions to select candidates for other offices will also be elected.

There was not a dissenting voice to the resolution, though Marshal Leeds and Joseph L. Nobre, who are candidates for delegates to the national convention, in opposition to the Quay people, were at the meeting. It was learned that Marshal Leeds had a conference with Collector Cooper previous to the meeting, when the rules were carefully examined to determine whether the proposed action of the campaign committee was illegal or not. It was found that the committee had power to hold the primaries when it pleased, which accounted for Marshal Leeds's and Joseph L. Nobre's silence.

Elated with the success of their plans, which in their minds placed beyond a doubt the possibility of the election of any Harrison delegates in this city, the Quay people have partly decided upon the delegates who shall go from this city to the national convention.—Public Ledger, December 1.

While President Harrison has not yet declared himself a candidate for renomination, some of the principal members of his cabinet are hard at work endeavoring to secure the election of delegates to the national convention who will, by their votes in that body, support their chief for renomination.

Postmaster-general Wanamaker, who, for a long time after his acceptance of the position held by him was on terms of political intimacy with Senator Quay, since the latter declared against Harrison for nomination, has been busy arranging his forces and the signs of the times point to a battle royal in the several counties of this state between the Wanamaker and Quay forces for the election of national delegates. It is well known that Marshal Leeds, who received his present appointment through the influence, mainly, of the Postmaster General, has taken his coat off and is battling for a seat in the national convention against David H. Lane and Jacob Wildermore, the slated candidates of the Martin-Porter combination.

Despite the refusal of the postmaster-general and mayor to give out the inside history at to day's chat, Joseph L. Nobre, Gen. Snyder, Thomas Lindsay, and other "anti-combine" workers, declare that there is a well-developed movement under way to have Harrison candidates for national delegates put in the field in every district of the city. Word has been received from the western part of the state that the removal of Collector of Internal Revenue Warmcastle has been understood by the federal office-holders of that section to mean that they are to go to work in earnest in their districts and endeavor to have delegates elected who will favor the President for renomination. It is also understood that the friends of Congressman Dalzell, who is in line with the Wanamaker programme, will lend their best efforts to defeat the candidates for seats in the national convention who have been slated in the western districts by Senator Quay's orders. The postmasters located at the county seats of the respective districts have been given the "tip," and as the country cross-road postmasters within their counties are virtually under their control by reason of the system of supervision now in vogue, they are expected to direct their attention toward securing the election of friendly delegates.

Congressman and President of the State League of Republican Clubs John B. Robinson, who has declared himself a candidate for the succession to Senator Quay, has been publicly indorsed for the position by Collector of the Port Thomas V. Cooper, who, as editor of the Delaware American, last week declared himself in favor of Robinson's elevation to the senate. It is a known fact that Collector Cooper, who now holds the best office in this state within the gift of the President, controlled the politics of Delaware county until he and Robinson met in the political arena, the result ending in Robinson's favor, since which time "Fighting Jack," as he is termed, has been in undisputed control. A close friend of Cooper's said to-night while discussing the subject: "It has been given out that Collector Cooper will not be able to get a delegate for the President's renomination. Let me say to you that the southeastern counties will be in line for Robinson for senator, and they will also name delegates to the Minneapolis convention who will support the President for a second term."—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, December 27.

I am an advocate of civil service reform. My brief experience at Washington has led me to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be for ever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens. * * *—[Senator Benjamin Harrison.

A decidedly uneasy feeling prevails among the federal office holders who are just now so unfortunate as to have their residences in the second and fifth congressional districts. They are with one accord loud in their protestations of devotion to the interests of President Harrison, and each and every man asserts in emphatic terms that his loyalty can not for an instant be questioned.

Only a few days ago they were hesitating. They feared to obey the orders issued by the ward combine to work for such delegates as could be depended upon to follow the instructions of Senator Quay, and disliked to openly participate in a movement having for its object the snubbing of the chief magistrate of the nation. It was only a week ago that the administration demonstrated its willingness to assist the two men who had the courage to wage war upon the powerful ward combination. W. H. Brooks, collector of internal revenue, was suspected of being wedded to the Quay leaders, and was notified that he was no longer custodian of the United States buildings. Marshal W. R. Leeds, who wants to go to Minneapolis as a Harrison man, was given the place and the patronage attached to it. This was intended as a warning, but as it did not have the desired effect, four gaugers were "suspended" because of their known indisposition to work for Charles W. Henry, the administration candidate in the fifth district. The announcement of this decided action by Secretary of the Treasury Foster, caused a sensation, and there was at once a stiffening of the backbone of the Harrison men. The move had a decided flavor of Ohio methods, but it was effective, and the weak-kneed federal office-holders began loudly to assert their allegiance to the cause. On Saturday came the announcement that at least a dozen custom-house employes had been booked for dismissal, and that started a panic among the many men suspected of trying to carry water on both shoulders. It was asserted that when Charles W. Henry went to Washington last week, he had in his pocket a list of office-holders whose loyalty was questioned. The four dismissed gaugers were on his list, and it is said that the doomed custom-house men were also included. Rumor has it that the post-office had also been scrutinized by the twenty-second ward man, and that quite a number of men who serve under Postmaster Field are to be asked to walk the plank in the very near future, unless the result of Tuesday's primaries shall show that they have done good service.

Finding that the frankly given warning was not having the desired effect, and that some of the Federal office holders were not looming up as strongly in the fight for national delegates as the friends of President Harrison deemed desirable, extreme measures were resorted to to-day, and quite a large-sized basket full of heads fell under the official axe. A telegram from Washington stated that twelve employes of the internal revenue department had been suspended for "reasons satisfactory to Secretary Foster." The names of the men removed were, however, not made public, and an air of mystery was thrown around the affair. Internal Revenue Collector Brooks stated early in the day that he had heard of no removals or suspensions, but late in the afternoon he admitted that six gaugers had been notified that their services were no longer required. The identity of the unfortunates was not positively established, but it was stated on apparently good authority that four of the suspended men are Dan Ahearn of the eighteenth ward, John S. Todd of the Twenty-fifth, Meschert of the Nineteenth and Hecksler of the Twenty fifth. The other two are personal friends of David Martin, Senator Quay's chief lieutenant. This activity on the part of the administration leaves no room for doubt as to the sincerity of the fight being made to prevent the Quay men from capturing a solid delegation to Minneapolis from Philadelphia, but the Beaver man's henchmen are not standing still, and the screws have been put on such employes of the city as are suspected of taking an interest in the plucky fight being made by United States Marshal Leeds and Henry to prevent the snubbing that President Harrison's opponents are fixing up for him. Three employes in the city's gas works, who owe their appointments to ex-Sheriff Leeds, were to-day warned that their places could easily be filled with men more zealous in behalf of the ward combine. This action is said by the Leeds men to have been taken in order to scare off men who are running for delegates to the convention in the interest of Leeds. Philadelphia dispatch to New York Times January 9.

Collector Thomas V. Cooper was seen at his Media home to-day, and in response to some direct questions, said:

"This trouble would not have originated at all but for the early call for the election of national delegates. It is several months ahead of the ordinary time, and this fact seemed to indicate a desire to elect a delegate who would oppose President Harrison's renomination even if Mr. Blaine was not a candidate. The friends of the administration, of course, opposed this, contending that if Mr. Blaine is not a candidate, President Harrison's renomination shall not be opposed. In short, they are averse to having the delegates carried over bodily to a third man, as they are convinced that the sentiment of all the people is in favor of Blaine or Harrison. There is no other meaning to the contest than this. There is no hostility to Mr. Blaine whatever, in any sense of the word. All of the combine delegates are now willing to say that if Mr. Blaine is not a candidate, President Harrison's renomination is inevitable, and they will support it. The mischief, was in calling the delegate elections in advance of the accustomed time, and in widely advertising the fact that this step was taken for the purpose of injuring President Harrison's chances. However, this is now disclaimed by the combine, but the disclaimer has not been half as well advertised as the original purpose, and therefore the friends of the President feel that if the views of the combine have really been changed, they ought to show the fact decidedly by at least admitting two delegates out of ten who, it is well known, will vote for Mr. Blaine if he is a candidate, but who will assuredly resist any attempt to carry the Pennsylvania delegates from President Harrison if Mr. Blaine is not a candidate.—Philadelphia Dispatch to N. Y. Times, Jan. 11.

* * *

In the fight for delegates to the national republican convention the Harrison forces to-day suffered an important defection in the desertion to the Quay column of Internal Revenue Collector Brooks, who until to-day had been counted on as a supporter of Charles W. Henry, the Harrison-Wanamaker candidate in the fifth congressional district. The friends of Henry yesterday made a strong effort to get an open declaration from Brooks in favor of their candidate, but Mr. Brooks hesitated. The significance of this hesitation on his part was definitely demonstrated to-day when Mr. Brooks, with deliberation and emphasis, declared: "I am no longer interested in Mr. Henry's candidacy. My independence and manhood will not permit me. I have been and am loyal to President Harrison. If I were not, I would not now be revenue collector. The moment my loyalty wavered to the President, that moment I would surrender my position."

"What is the reason, then, for the change in your sentiments regarding Mr. Henry's candidacy?" he was asked.

"I do not propose to shelter myself behind the men in my department and assume a position that would be regarded as selfish, unmanly, cowardly or dishonest," was his reply. "I do not propose to permit the men in this department to suffer for their independence. I never have been an object to be coerced by any power, and I do not propose to begin now."

"When did you make up your mind in this direction?"

"I made it up yesterday afternoon, immediately upon being notified of the suspension of the four officers in my department. I determined if this course was to be pursued against federal employes under me I would not by imputation be misunderstood or placed in any uncertain position. I therefore wrote to Mr. Henry last night telling him that I could no longer interest myself in his candidacy, and asking him to call upon me when I would explain my position more in detail."—Philadelphia dispatch to New York Times, January 10.

The result of Senator Quay's talk with the President last Friday is now known. He was turned down and can get no satisfaction from the President. His farce comedy protests against the use of the federal officials to forward the political fortunes of the administration were received with an icy smile by the President, but otherwise went unheeded. Mr. Harrison seems to have had no terms to offer the Pennsylvania senator. He was in no mood to make a compromise. Under the circumstances he felt that the only thing for Quay was to make a complete surrender. As the President has recently pointed to gentlemen who called on him in regard to Pennsylvania affairs, the administration has done everything up to the present time that Quay has asked. He has controlled the appointments in Pennsylvania. He has got many of his friends and henchmen into the departments in Washington, and friends of his have been given fat places in other branches of the public service. In spite of all this Quay has missed no opportunity to show his contempt for Harrison and his administration, and of late he has been openly antagonizing Harrison's renomination. At the same time he has gone on urging the appointment of his man Graham to the revenue collectorship at Pittsburgh. All went well as long as the President contented himself with simply "turning down" Quay's requests, but when Mr. Harrison buckled on his armor and took up the cudgel in his own behalf by striking back at Quay's official friends in Philadelphia who did not bow obedience to his dictates, Quay grew angry.—Washington Dispatch to Philadelphia Times, Jan. 13.

There were many smiling faces in the rooms of the republican city committee last night. The ward combine had captured almost everything its members wanted and the fact that their victory had been gained by the most outrageously fraudulent methods did not detract one jot from the keen enjoyment of the organization. All the leaders were on hand and when United States Marshal Leeds, fresh from the scene of his crushing defeat in the second congressional district, strolled in with the returns from his own ward and looking crestfallen, there were many unkind whispers about the rain and the valiant marshal's cherished whiskers.

The Harrison forces were routed at every point. Policemen, firemen and city employes of every degree, had obeyed the orders of the combine, and by main force controlled the polls in the eighth, ninth, tenth, thirteenth, fourteenth and twentieth wards, where Leeds were fighting against terrific odds. In many instances they took possession of the voting places, inside and out, and the Leeds men had practically no earthly chance. The same tactics were used in the up-town wards, and David Martin's faithful henchmen gave the followers of Charles W. Henry but little show.

* * * In the twelfth division of the fourteenth, John Lacey, who resigned from the police force and was placed in the custom house in order to work for Leeds, was defeated by about fifty votes.

Despite the plucky fight made in behalf of President Harrison, by Ex-Councilman C. W. Henry, he was heavily outvoted. The police and fireman were openly against him, and the hundreds of city employes who live in his district sturdily stuck up for the combine, and literally snowed the twenty-second ward man under. Internal Revenue Collector Brooks was unable to carry his own division for Henry, while Naval Officer Tom Powers, made a splendid showing in his ward. John Keller, a custom house man, turned in his division, the seventh of the eighteenth ward, for Henry, and the Quay men took everything else.—Philadelphia Times, January 13.

It was announced to-day that Senator Quay had finally determined to oppose the present administration, and that he would do so by offering a resolution charging that federal officers had recently "interfered with the politics of Pennsylvania," and directing that the senate committee on reform in the civil service should make an investigation "for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent federal officers have interfered with the primaries and conventions."

Senator Quay is simply angry with the present administration because President Harrison has not taken up his fights in Pennsylvania and made them his own party quarrels and personal strifes. For many months after the inauguration of 1889, President Harrison recognized the requests of Senator Quay for political appointments, and in every way possible tried to show his appreciation of the senator's party services. Finally the latter's course in and out of congress drew him into many embarrassing personal and political complications, which resulted in a division of the republican party in the state, and a bitter personal strife. Naturally, the President did not feel that the personal affairs of Senator Quay or any other person should be the guiding star of federal affairs within any state, and while he has practically brought about a standstill in Pennsylvania's federal allotments, it can not be truthfully said, as is charged by Senator Quay, that the President has in any way used the federal patronage or his prerogatives to destroy the senator's political influence.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Jan. 15.

IN OHIO.

The one important event of the day has been the general protest of Mr. Foraker's friends against the alleged interference of the office-holders of the national administration in the interest of Senator Sherman. Congressman Enoch, of the twelfth district, and Wm. Binkley, of Sidney, have both taken occasion to criticise this influence. Mr. Binkley, who is one of Mr. Foraker's leading managers, is particularly severe. "It is simply outrageous," said he, to-day, "that this army of federal office holders should invade Columbus and attempt to dictate the senatorship. It is a shame upon our citizenship that the national administration should lend its influence to a state affair of this kind and permit all the appointees to come here under government pay and take a hand in the matter. The disposition of all the local federal appointments in this state has been under a referee system, Senator Sherman appointing the referee in each locality and that man dictating the appointments in his section of the state. To-day we find these referees and all the men who have profited under their appointments here working for Sherman's re-election. These men are reinforced by a multitude of office-holders from Washington until there are three or four federal office-holders on the ground to every member of the general assembly."

A visit to Senator Sherman's headquarters found his followers confident of success and disposed to make merry over the complaints of Governor Foraker's friends of the impropriety of office-holders expressing their personal preferences in the contest. "The friends of Governor Foraker complain, Senator, that undue outside influences are being exerted in your behalf, and point particularly to the array of federal office-holders who are working in your interest. Have you anything to say to this?" "I can only say," replied the Senator, "that all the former office-holders under Governor Foraker are for him also. Nearly everybody that ever served under him seems to be laboring in his behalf. I don't see that there is any difference in this respect."—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Jan. 1.

The Sherman men are making the argument that the newspapers are a reflection of public sentiment, and that a great many papers favoring the return of Mr. Sherman to the United States Senate, the sentiment of the people must be for his election. The fact is, that the most influential papers of the state are championing the cause of ex-Governor Foraker. If from the list of Sherman papers are taken those which owe official preferment to him, the remainder, representing his free, untrammelled support will be sadly small.

The postmaster and revenue collector editors, who are earning their salaries, are numerous enough. A list of the papers supporting Senator Sherman's candidacy has been published. Among them are to be found those mentioned hereafter:

The Cincinnati Times-Star is edited by Mr. Taft, whose father was minister to both Austria and Russia, and whose brother is now solicitor general of the United States.

Charles F. Johnson, managing editor of the Cincinnati Volksblatt, was appointed consul-general at Frankfurt-on-the-Main.

Thomas H. Beers, editor of the Ashtabula Gazette, was late supervisor of the census.

T. J. Howells, editor of the Ashtabula Sentinel, is postmaster at Jeffers.

W. L. Hunt, editor of the Belmont Chronicle, is postmaster at St. Clairsville, and was formerly a supervisor of the census.

John Hopley, editor of the Bucyrus Journal, is postmaster at Bucyrus.

A son of the editor of the Delaware Gazette has for many years held official position at Washington.

J. O. Converse, editor of the Geauga Republican, is postmaster at Chardon.

D. D. Taylor, editor of the Guernsey Times, was for twelve years postmaster at Cambridge, and was succeeded by his brother, who has held the place ever since.

Geo. U. Harn, editor of the Mansfield Herald, was appointed one year ago, through Senator Sherman, as sugar inspector.

E. R. Alderman, editor of the Marietta Register, is postmaster at Marietta.

Mr. Ichas, associate editor of the Newark American, is postmaster at Newark, and his partner, Captain Wm. C. Lyon, was postmaster before him.

D. L. Flickinger, brother of the editor of the Ohio State Journal, is statistical agent for Ohio, a position secured by S. J. Flickinger, the editor, by application made through Senator Sherman.

Mr. Martin, editor of the Ottawa Gazette is postmaster at Port Clinton, and is said to be the only Sherman man in the town.

The editor of the Painesville Telegraph is postmaster at Painesville.

D. J. Richards, editor of the Zanesville Times-Recorder, was made postmaster at Zanesville.

F. S. Purcell, editor of the Logan Republican, is postmaster at Logan.

Pietro Cunco of the Wyandot Union is postmaster at Upper Sandusky.

The editor of the Pike County Republican is postmaster at Waverly.

The late editor of the Circleville Union-Herald was appointed postmaster at Circleville.

The late editor of the McConnelsville Herald was appointed internal revenue agent.

One of the owners of the Sidney Gazette is postmaster at Sidney.

One of the editors of the Holmes County Republican, is postmaster at Millersburg.

C. L. Poorman, editor of the Bellaire Tribune, was appointed to office through Senator Sherman, but resigned.

The editor of the Youngstown Telegraph, is a brother of E. J. Halford, private secretary of President Harrison.

Geo. A. Keepers, editor of the Monroe Gazette, is postmaster at Beallsville.

The editor of the Marion Independent has a son holding official position in Washington.

A son of editor Tripp, of Carrollton, is postmaster at that place, and the father's paper is a Sherman organ.

General C. H. Grosvenor is a World's Fair commissioner, and the Athens Herald is for Sherman.

Several relatives of Editor Bickham, of the Dayton Journal, hold federal places.

It is said that Secretary Foster is interested in the Toledo Commercial.

It is not hard to understand after the above statement, why Senator Sherman has a considerable newspaper support.—Columbus Dispatch to Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, December 9.

* * *

Mansfield News, owned by W. S. Cappeler, appointed railroad commissioner by Gov. Foraker.

Mt. Vernon Republican, edited and owned in part by Col. Charles Baldwin, appointed penitentiary manager by Gov. Foraker; also a member of the governor's staff.

Zanesville Sunday News, owned and edited by Charles U. Shryock, appointed member of the Zanesville board of elections by Gov. Foraker.

Columbus Express and Sonntagsgast, edited and controlled by L. Hirsch, appointed supervisor of public printing by Gov. Foraker.

Toledo News, edited and controlled by A. D. Fassett, appointed commissioner of labor statistics by Gov. Foraker.

Zanesville Courier, edited by R. B. Brown, appointed trustee of the soldiers and sailors' home at Sandusky by Gov. Foraker.

Ironton Register, edited by Edward Wilson, brother of Col. Henry D. Wilson, appointed on the staff by Gov. Foraker.

New Philadelphia Advocate, edited by W. J. McElvaine, who received recognition during the administration of Gov. Foraker.

Scioto Gazette, edited by Gen. S. H. Hurst, appointed dairy and food commissioner by Gov. Foraker.

There are doubtless others of the same sort, but these are enough to show that Governor Foraker's friends are subject to the same charge that they make against Sherman's friends. It would also be interesting to continue the analysis, and disclose the number of Foraker advocates who are such simply because they have a grievance against Sherman. One of these is A. B. Clark, editor of the Newark Tribune and Granville Times, who wanted to be postmaster at Newark when Capt. W. C. Lyon was appointed. Another is C. E. M. Jennings, of the Athens Messenger, who blames Sherman for endorsing Grosvenor's recommendation of Wood, of Athens, for census supervisor when he (Jennings) wanted the place. These are only samples, but they help to show that, if motives are to be subjected to scrutiny and analysis, the Foraker men will suffer with the rest. The sword is two-edged.—Columbus Sunday Morning News, December 6.

How did Sherman come so near to failure and Foraker so near to success? The question is fully answered in a remarkable review of the senatorial controversy which has just been published by Gen. H. V. Boynton, the veteran and well known Washington correspondent, whose sturdy republicanism, high personal character, and intimate knowledge of Ohio politics entitle him to speak with authority. The explanation of the mystery is found in the existence of "a republican Tammany organization in Hamilton county [Cincinnati]," which General Boynton characterizes as "of a lower order of political morality and worse than any similar organization in either party anywhere else in the United States." The Evening Post has more than once of late years referred to this republican machine in Cincinnati, but we have never before seen it so clearly and fully described. As a study in municipal government, and as an example of the baneful influences which a city ring may exert upon state and even national politics, General Boynton's statement merits the closest attention.

"The boss of this Cincinnati Tammany," he says, "is George Cox, an illiterate saloon-keeper of one of the most notorious dives in the most notorious part of the city, known as 'Dead Man's Corner,' because of the many murders committed in and about it. It has had a gambling-house attachment and a department devoted to even viler uses." It was while running this saloon that Cox entered politics, and he soon became a power in city affairs. A fellow-feeling drew Cox and Foraker together, when the latter came to the front ten years ago, and they have been hand-and-glove ever since. When Foraker became Governor, he appointed Cox to the lucrative sinecure of coal-oil inspector, and the saloon-keeper went through the form, so familiar in this city, of nominally putting the establishment out of his own hands and into the hands of his former barkeeper. It is this man Cox who was "the acknowledged leader of the Foraker forces, and without his countenance the governor would have had no chance of success." The second in command in this republican Tammany is a confidence man, who deals in bogus remedies for the alleged cure of consumption—a person who has no standing among Cincinnati physicians, and who advertises only at a distance, manufacturing his worthless stuff by the barrel for sixteen cents a quart, and selling it to gullible invalids all over the country at five dollars a quart. He, too, early became a favorite of Foraker's, and was appointed to office by the governor.

So absolute has become Cox's control that Gen. Boynton declares it to be "now impossible for any aspirant to be nominated by the county republican convention in the city unless he first seeks out the local boss and pays him spot cash"—save where it happens that he deems it discreet to allow a few representatives of decent politics to go on the ticket to allay the suspicions of the body of honest voters. The way in which Cox "set up the pins" for his pal Foraker is thus described:

"In the last campaign the candidates as a body, from those aspiring to the legislature to those seeking judicial nominations, were obliged to visit this boss at his headquarters and pay in advance. The sums ranged from $200 up to $2,000. As an example, the cash price paid for nomination as sheriff was $2,000, and immediately after the election the boss coolly demanded that he allowed to name sixteen out of the twenty-one appointments in the sheriff's office. Every man on the Hamilton county republican legislative ticket, without an exception, was selected in advance by this boss, George Cox. Doubtless this will seem amazing, but it is true, without a qualification."

This is the way it was done: Shortly before the convention, Cox called on the postmaster and collector (both Sherman men) with a list of five names as his personal choice for the legislative ticket, and asked them to select eight from another list of sixteen, all of whom were represented by him, and believed by the postmaster and collector to be for Sherman, this concession being due to the unquestionable fact that the republicans of the city were overwhelmingly for Sherman and against Foraker. Eight names were accordingly selected from the sixteen, but the thing turned out to be a confidence game on Cox's part. "Every man of the sixteen, as is now known, had made his pecuniary and political peace with Cox, and the latter had taken a pledge from each one in advance that, in case of nomination and election, he would do such a favor for Cox as the latter might name. So strong was his pledge that those who knew of it among Cox's press supporters made bold to announce, in double leads, the morning after election, and before a man of those elected had been consulted, that the Hamilton county delegation was solid for Foraker for senator to succeed John Sherman."—New York Evening Post, January 7.

The anti-Blaine element and administration supporters held a second conference here last night. A large crowd of the faithful from all parts of the state were here. There was a good sprinkling of postmasters and revenue collectors, and the seventh district was especially well represented. They were here to prepare plans for opposing the anti-Harrisonites next month when the election of the central committee takes place.

The rivalry between the two factions threatens to break out in open warfare long. The anti-Harrison men claim that Harrison tried to take the breeze out of their sails in the Jeffersonville district by appointing one of their number a collector at that point. They also say they are perfectly willing to furnish office-holders enough to take all the wind out of their canvass, if it can be done by appointments. The postmasters in a meeting here some time ago decided to sit on the fence during the political row, but their actions last night were in direct opposition to that decision.—Indianapolis dispatch to New York Times, December 24.

A bitter fight for supremacy is being waged in this, the twelfth congressional district of Indiana, between the Harrison and anti-Harrison factions.

The leader of the antis is Mayor G. W. Wilson, of this city, a member of the governor's staff. He represents the young republicans of the district, and his platform is anything to beat Harrison. He is opposed by Harry C. Hanna, a young attorney, who is an intimate friend of Postmaster Higgins, who is counted for the administration. Wilson is immensely popular, and as 90 per cent. of the republicans in this district are original Gresham or Blaine men, and with the leading republican papers of this city openly fighting Harrison, the chances for the administration candidate are slim indeed. In this extremity Postmaster Higgins sought advice from Washington, and the answer came promptly. It was in the shape of an order to assess the federal office-holders in this district to the tune of $2,500, and to spend this money where it would do the administration the most good. Mayor Wilson was not slow in discovering the facts, and is using the information to good advantage.

It is said that several of the post office employes refused to pay the assessments, and say they will resign rather than be mulcted of half a month's salary. Postmaster Higgins, when asked about the truth of the report, refused to talk. A district convention has been called by the republicans for the 9th of January, to meet in this city, when the fight will be settled.—Fort Wayne Dispatch to New York Times, December 24.

The Harrison republicans are very active all over the state putting the machine in shape to capture the new state central committee next week. Dan Ransdell, marshal for the District of Columbia, is now "fixing" the Ninth district. He was at Lebanon and Frankfort Saturday. The anti-Harrison men are very active, also. In the Evansville, Terre Haute, Fort Wayne and Kankakee districts the "antis" could elect committeemen without trouble if they could agree among themselves. In the Fort Wayne district, where there are no Harrison republicans outside of the office-holding class, half a dozen "antis" are running for committeemen. It is said that the Harrison managers have been scheming for some time to induce at least two "antis" from each county to come out for committeemen. In many counties alleged "antis" are doing fine work for Harrison under the direction of Dan Ransdell. The Fourth district is about evenly divided, but Internal Revenue Collector John O. Cravens and his numerous deputies, together with the distilleries at Lawrenceburg and the postmasters, will pull Chairman Gowdy through for re-election as committeeman. Gowdy lives in Rush, which is now in the new Fourth.

The New Albany district is slightly anti-Harrison, but the postmasters, who generally run country stores, have a big pull with the republican ex-soldiers from the fact that they sell their goods on the "trust system" until "next pension day."

U. S. District Attorney Smiley N. Chambers can be relied upon to "fix" the Second, or Vincennes, district, for Harrison as easily as he assisted to quash the thirty indictments for illegal voting in Judge Woods' "court."—Indianapolis Sentinel, December 28.

* * *

The unpopularity of the Harrison administration in Marion county, was fully demonstrated at last night's primaries to elect delegates to the district convention which will be held January 21, for the selection of a state central committeeman. Although the game was small, the contest was one of the bitterest and most hotly contested in the history of republican primaries in the city. From early morning the federal officers of high and low degree were out hustling and spending "boodle" freely among the boys. Among those who were out during the day setting up the pins, were Ed. Thompson, Al. Moore, Billy Patterson, George Harvey, Dave Wallace, Shel. Woodward, Oscar Wilmington, Billy Leonard and Dick Craft. Among the many interesting incidents which occurred last night was the defeat of Otto Gresham for delegate in the sixth ward, the selection of Martin Moran, recently released from jail under a heavy bond for attempting to murder John Cain, his victim still lying at St. Vincent hospital in a precarious condition, and the election of the ward healer Al. Moore, now holding a federal position, as committeeman in ward eleven.—Indianapolis Sentinel Jan. 10.

* * *

R. C. Bell of Fort Wayne, was at the Grand Hotel to-day. He told a News reporter that there was a red-hot canvass on at Fort Wayne over the election of a member of the republican state committee. "Billy" Watson and Editor Leonard, of the Gazette, and Captain White are manipulating the Blaine forces against the administration as represented by Postmaster Higgins, Colonel Robertson and Judge Taylor. Senator Bell thinks the anti-administrationists have the best of it.—Indianapolis News, January.

* * *

"Take, for instance," said a second ward republican, "Clint Lowe, Gene Saulcy, Al Moore, Ed Conway, Bill Davis, George Harvey, Ben Bagley, Marshall Woods, Ed Nolan, 'Billy' Patterson, Ed Thompson and others I might name. They are doing some rapid work crystallizing things for the Saturday primaries. The primaries will result in a cut and dried slate—prepared in the post-office. Then there is Con Kelley, who is emigrant inspector at Chicago. He is on 'detail duty' here and he has to have his finger in the pie. These individuals have important duties theoretically, and should be compelled to keep hands off and let the rest of our people have a word or two to say in selecting the delegates."

The result of the general skirmish, Saturday, between the Blaine and Harrison republicans in Indiana is not reassuring to the administration men. In the fourth, Chairman Gowdy, with the assistance of Internal Revenue Collector Cravens and deputies of Dearborn, seems to have captured a majority of the delegates. In this city the post-office gang and the "Slick Six" got the best of the antis. Money was spent freely by the administration people to bring out the vote. One man alone was paid fifty dollars to bring a gang of toughs to the sixth ward meeting, where the antis were defeated by thirty votes. Nearly all the federal officers were out working, a number being elected delegates. In the fourth ward Deputy Internal Revenue Collector Harvey presided. Surveyor of Customs Hildebrand was denounced by the gang for his inactivity. The federal officers not only managed the primaries in the interest of Harrison, but when they were in the minority they held "rump" meetings after the regulars had adjourned. In the fourth ward Collector Harvey declared his set elected when the anti-Harrison set had secured a majority of seventy-five votes.—Indianapolis Sentinel, Jan. 11.

The "antis" have secured absolute proof that in all the large cities of the state, assessments were levied upon the mail carriers to raise money to elect Harrison delegates. A few days ago the Fort Wayne Gazette, republican, published the correspondence between Chairman Daugherty, of Allen county, and his son, a clerk in the U. S. pension office in this city. Nicholas Ensley, the pension agent, comes from the Twelfth district, and was anxious to see his own district go right. He ordered young Daugherty to write his father that he must call the election by primaries instead of by mass convention. Chairman Daugherty, a one-legged soldier, who was refused the post-office to provide for a stay-at-home republican, is an "anti," and he replied that he would call a mass convention. The next mail brought another letter from his son that if a mass convention was called Ensley would discharge him. R. T. McDonald, who has spent more money for the success of the g. o. p. than all the republican officeholders of Fort Wayne, and who thoroughly hates Harrison, told Chairman Daugherty to go ahead with the mass convention and that if Ensley dared to discharge the young man, he (McDonald), would give him a better job with the Fort Wayne electric light works, of which he is the general manager.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 19.

IN NEW YORK.

The bouncing of Postmaster Flood would not have occasioned so much surprise last summer as it does now, for ever since his appointment he has been apprised that a pickle was in store for him should the time ever come to use it. But when Mr. Fassett was made collector of the port of New York, republicans generally hoped that the then leader of the senate would bury the hatchet. But notwithstanding that Mr. Fassett was highly honored, he did not forget that as secretary of the national committee he could not name the postmaster in his own town, and evidently smarted under the well-published fact that ex-Congressman Thomas S. Flood outgeneraled him in the distribution of the spoils. That there was a feeling not less than a factional tug-of-war became more and more apparent day by day, and the strain continued until the holding of the caucuses last fall, when Mr. Fassett secured control of the county convention. How that was done is also a matter of record. There were several contesting delegations; dual conventions were held, and the matter was finally disposed of at the state convention, the Flood men not receiving the slightest recognition.

Dr Flood has been aware for a long time that government officials were sent here to trump up a case against him on any pretext, no matter how slight; but he also knew that the office had been honestly conducted, that the complaints were less than during any of his predecessors' terms of office, and he therefore felt sure that his tenure of office would be measured by at least a full term.

Finally a case was made against Postmaster Flood. It was mainly to the effect that he did not devote personal attention to the office, not being there more than one hour a day some days. In speaking of the charges Dr. Flood said: "Of course you know the so-called charges preferred against me were all nonsense and without any foundation whatever. They were merely a pretext for my removal. I will say one thing, and I can say it with a feeling of pride, and that is that the Elmira postoffice will compare favorably with any office of its size in the state, and I have its affairs in such perfect order that I have always been ready to turn the office over to a successor within sixty seconds and everything be found all right."

In regard to the charge of spending only one hour a day in the office, Mr. Flood said: "That is false and is a mere pretext. Every day I personally opened all the post-office mail, superintended the business, mapped out the work, and, besides, I did a great deal of labor at my house, where I employed a typewriter at my own expense, who worked almost exclusively on post-office matters."

"During the June and September floods," he continued, "I worked night and day to give the people good service, and I think I have no reason to be ashamed of my official stewardship. In fact, the whole trouble grew out of a deal between Tom Platt and Mr. Harrison. It was consummated at the time when Fassett was appointed Collector of the port of New York—Elmira Dispatch to New York Times, December 26.

There is a possibility that the plan of Mr. J. Sloat Fassett of Elmira, to disgrace his political foe, Dr. Henry Flood of the same city, will come to naught. Dr. Flood was recently removed from the office of postmaster of Elmira, and Lewis G. Rathbun was appointed in his place. Everybody in Elmira knew at the time that politics alone was at the bottom of the doctor's removal. Against him Fassett has borne a grudge for a long time. Before the last state convention in New York, when Fassett was nominated for Governor, Dr. Flood had been threatened with removal. Fassett held the threat over him in the hope that it would be the means of disarming the opposition of Flood and his numerous friends. After Fassett received his crushing defeat he prepared to make good his threat against Flood. Just before the beginning of the holiday adjournment of congress he sprang his mine. A postoffice inspector appeared at the Elmira postoffice and made a hurried report; then Flood received notice of his removal. No reason whatever was given by the President or by the postmaster general for the action. Dr. Flood did not propose to submit quietly. He sent this letter to Mr. Wanamaker:

ELMIRA, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1891.

To Postmaster General:

SIR: The associated press dispatches report that Mr. L. G. Rathbun's name has been sent to the senate for confirmation as postmaster at Elmira, N. Y. I am informed from outside sources that there are charges on file in your office; also that there is an inspector's report. You have not informed me of such charges or inspector's report, nor have you given me an opportunity to be heard. I respectfully request and demand that a copy of all charges and the inspector's report (complete), be sent to me by return mail. Yours respectfully,

HENRY FLOOD, Postmaster.

Six days later Dr. Flood received this letter:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL, }
WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 31, 1891. }

To Henry Flood, Esq., Elmira, N. Y.:

SIR—In answer to your letter received on the 26th. You have been rightly informed that Mr. Lewis G. Rathbun has been appointed postmaster at Elmira, and that you have been removed, for the reason that you were drawing a salary of $3,100 while giving very little personal attention to the duties of the office. You were present, during a part of the time at least, when the inspector visited the office, because you made up a shortage in your accounts.

Your demand for a copy of the inspector's report can not be complied with, because this administration adopted the course laid down by President Cleveland, to regard such reports as confidential papers, and to neither allow them to go out of the office nor to permit copies of them to be made. Very respectfully,
JOHN WANAMAKER, Postmaster-General.

The reference to an alleged shortage showed plainly the flimsy ground on which the removal had been made. Dr. Flood remembered that at the time of the visit of the post-office inspector, Capt. Brockway, the superintendent of the Elmira Reformatory owed the post-office $100 for postage stamps. In dealing with the reformatory superintendent it has been the custom of the Elmira postmaster to permit the stamp account to run a few days to accommodate the system of auditing accounts which prevails at that institution. Stamps might be purchased on Monday and the following Saturday payment be made. This custom was probably well known to the instigator of the investigation, for the inspector appeared on the scene at the time when Capt. Brockway was in arrears for stamps. Dr. Flood made good the amount due the office, as he was always prepared to do. He did not realize at the time that his removal would be brought about on the basis of this transaction.

Since the doctor's removal, his friends have been very active in his behalf. Fassett has disclaimed any share in ousting him, but the evidence does not support his statement. Harrison removed Flood to satisfy Fassett and Platt. Apparently he thought that he could do so, without calling down upon himself any adverse criticism. He now finds that he was mistaken. Flood's friends are beginning to make life unpleasant for him. They know that the removal was contrary to the spirit of the civil service system and are impressing that fact upon him. He seems to have acted on the assumption that Platt and Fassett were still men of influence in New York state politics. Gradually the fact is dawning upon him that he has been laboring under a delusion. To-day ex-Congressman Flood, of Elmira, the brother of Dr. Flood, and ex Assemblyman Jonas Van Duzer, the postmaster at Horseheads, called upon the President and protested against the outrage. They gave him facts and figures to prove that they understood thoroughly the reason for the doctor's removal. Mr. Harrison was quite gracious at first, but soon he grew very nervous, and declared that he knew nothing of the matter. Mr. Wanamaker, he said, was responsible, and he advised them to see Wanamaker. They told him of Wanamaker's letter, and reiterated the demand of Dr. Flood to be confronted with the evidences of his guilt, if any there were. Mr. Harrison tried to smooth the matter over, and finally promised to see Wanamaker himself about it. He referred to the Chemung county row, and asked plaintively why it could not be stopped.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, January 9.

There was a caucus of the Goodrich followers in the Kings county republican general committee last night in a room over the Criterion Theatre, Brooklyn. The object was to fix up a slate to be voted for by the delegates to the committee meeting on Tuesday night. State Committeeman Israel F. Fischer presided over the caucus, which was attended by about fifty republicans, among them Naval Officer Willis, Port Warden Leavcraft. This ticket had no sooner been reported than Election Commissioner Cotton stated that he could not stand by Henry for treasurer. He had promised to vote for James W. Birkett for that office, and he would keep his word. Then Joseph Benjamin got up and protested against the whole ticket. "I represents the one-man power that has controlled us for three years," he said, referring to "Boss" Ernst Nathan [Internal Revenue Collector] "and the people over our way are tired of it. They have an idea, and a well settled one, that this one-man power is too closely allied with the democracy. If you elect this ticket the sixteenth ward will give a democratic majority of over 1,000 next November."

Still the caucus went ahead and adopted a resolution pledging its support to the ticket. This means 250 out of 392 delegates to the committee on Tuesday night.—New York Times, January 10.

The Kings county republican general committee held its usual noisy annual meeting last evening in the Criterion Theater, Brooklyn, and the Nathan faction succeeded in electing all the officers for the ensuing year and in retaining control of the organization. This means that Harrison delegates will be sent to the next national convention if Nathan can bring that event to pass. It required half an hour more to get rid of the routine business, and then Henry D. Hamilton of the twentieth ward rose and nominated Mr. Goodrich for a second term as president. This was seconded by delegates from half a dozen wards, and James M. Fuller tried to have the nomination made by acclamation, but there were cries of "Don't cram him down our throats." This roused Charles B. Morton, who said that he bore no ill will to Mr. Goodrich, but that he felt compelled by the wretched condition of the party to oppose the nomination of any more Nathan men. "We see our city in the hands of the democracy," Mr. Morton continued, "and we want to know the cause of all this. The men who assume to rule our party do not know what to do. Self-assumed leadership has produced these effects. There is too much bickering and interference by alleged leaders. The politician or the federation of politicians who tries to dictate can not get our support and we won't let them control our votes. It's time the buying and selling of votes was stopped. The present system is obnoxious. A conspiracy has been formed in this city to foil the wishes of a majority of the republicans of this county in the next national convention." This brought out great cheers and cries of "Give it to him!" "Pound Nathan!" The self-constituted boss stood against the wall and never blinked. Joseph Benjamin, who denounced Nathan at the caucus on Saturday night, seconded Mr. Newins' nomination. He was not against Mr. Goodrich, but he was against the influences behind Goodrich. Republicans, he said, would not vote their party ticket because they desired to show their independence of Nathan (Internal Revenue Collector). If any one would go through the heavy republican wards, he would find, Mr. Benjamin said, that the voters were sick and tired of the present machine. Joseph M. Farrington spoke to the same point and added that the present leaders were too closely allied with the democratic managers. He then mentioned the name of Blaine, and the delegates cheered and yelled themselves hoarse. Nathan didn't move a hand. He put forward Israel F. Fischer who pleaded for Goodrich for the sake of harmony, and he was greeted with jeers. This ended the talking, and the roll was called. The big vote for Goodrich encouraged the Nathan crowd to put through the slate adopted on Saturday night without more ado, and Naval Officer Willis rose and read off the following list of candidates, and on his motion, they were elected by acclamation: Andrew Jacobs, George Nason, Charles Bell, W. S. Ryan, Warren C. Treadwell, W. H. N. Cadmus, George England, John F. Henry. Some one tried to have the resolutions considered, but the crowd wanted to go home, and the meeting ended in an uproar.

* * *

The action of some of the leaders of the Republican party in causing the removal of Dr. John L. Van Alstyne from the board of pension examiners will cause the party a great deal of trouble. Dr. Van Alstyne is a staunch republican and a veteran of the late war, and so incensed are the members of the Grand Army of the Republic over his removal that they are determined to defeat the republican ring. The Grand Army men allege that Col. George W. Dunn, postmaster and member of the state republican committee, is the instigator of the scheme to remove Dr. Van Alstyne, and they propose to have his scalp. For the first time in the history of this county, the republican party leaders can not count on the soldier's vote. It will not be a surprise if this county is placed in the democratic column next fall in the presidential election.—Binghamton Dispatch to New York Times, January 10.

AT LARGE.

George Rundstadtler has been appointed to a position in the postoffice here, and thereby hangs a neat little political tale. He was a member of the city republican committee when the recent faction fight was on. The Bain faction, representing the element in the republican party favorable to the Harrison administration, needed him in order to have a quorum. He held a position in the office of the recorder of deeds. Recorder Herbs told him if he met with either wing of the committee, he must resign his official position. R. C. Kerens and John C. Orrick, law partners of Secretary Noble, agreed to pay Rundstadtler $30 a week or find him a position if he would sit with the committee. He did so. Pressure was brought to bear on Postmaster Harlow to make a place for Rundstadtler, but he did not want to be placed in the position of taking sides. It is now said that orders came direct from Washington that Rundstadtler must be provided for in order to relieve Orrick and Kerens of the burden of his support. Accordingly, Rundstadtler is now in a snug position in the post office, and has resigned from the committee.—St. Louis Dispatch to New York Times, December 5.

Hardly had the democratic convention adjourned in Baton Rouge before the republican state central committee was called to order in New Orleans. The fight in the republican camps is as real and bitter as on the other side, while the lottery issue is assisting the similarity by being one of the chief disturbing elements. Ex-Governor Warmoth has, until now, been the acknowledged leader of the party in the state. As collector of the port he represents the national administration, and just now is trying to control the Louisiana vote for Harrison. Warmoth is backed by almost the entire white republican element and a great part of the colored vote, but Internal Revenue Collector Wimberly and Superintendent of the Mint Smythe, with a patronage equal to that of the custom house, and better for political purposes, not being tied up by civil-service rules, combined with P. F. Herwig, one of the wealthiest men in the state, and Ex-Governor Kellogg, have been making big inroads into Warmoth's strength. In consequence of this, when Mr. Herwig called the state central committee to order to day at noon, and a test vote was taken on the filling of a vacancy at large, the Warmoth candidate received only 26 votes, while the opposition polled 47. The announcement of the vote caused great commotion, and this was repeated and exaggerated into a tumult when Philly Robinson, a colored member, arose and addressed the meeting. He held $120 in bank bills in his hand, and said this had been given him to desert Warmoth and vote with the anti-administration faction. There being other charges of bribery, Collector Warmoth left the hall and was followed by his supporters. These adjourned to the custom house, where they were called to order, and their numbers being re-inforced by other bolters, forty-eight members, a majority of the committee being present, business was proceeded with. They decided to hold a convention to nominate a state ticket on the third Wednesday in February.

The anti-Warmoth faction continued in session at the original place of meeting. It is probable that they will also call a nominating convention, with the result that next April there will be two republican tickets as well as two democratic tickets, in the field for state offices. The original intention of the Warmoth faction was to put up full ticket, making anti-lotteryism a main point in the platform. The opposition faction want to take the Louisiana delegation to the national convention uninstructed, and probably have it support Blaine. When Mr. Herwig, who is a large holder of lottery stock, joined their ranks, they added to their purpose an intention to thwart the plan to put up a state ticket, and to defeat the anti-lottery portion of the platform.—New Orleans Dispatch to New York Times, December 20.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A correspondent from Denison University, Granville, Ohio, writes the CHRONICLE:

The gross brutality of the spoils system receives a fresh illustration in the recent discovery that the asylum for the blind at Columbus, Ohio, has been making no provision whatever for the special treatment of the eyes of its inmates. Can anyone conceive of such a state of affairs if the trustees of the institution had been chosen simply on the basis of fitness for the position, and if they, in turn, had applied the same test in the appointments devolving upon them? If the people of this land could only realize the inhumanity of entrusting to political bummers the care of those who are afflicted with mental or physical disease the reform, in that line, at least, would be swift and sure. We can well afford a serious consideration of the question whether our treatment of criminals and unfortunates is not as far beneath the just demands of our own civilization as the treatment of Russian political exiles is beneath the civilization of Russia. The spoils system is not only corrupt from a business standpoint; it is cruel and brutal from the standpoint of humanity.—W. H. J.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

A PRESIDENT who, upon charges made by an inspector not belonging to a class enjoying or worthy of public confidence for impartiality, dismisses an officer from a place so important as the postmastership of Elmira, and refuses to let the disgraced official see or know the nature of the charges, is, in this country of open courts and public trials, a bold man.

IN the past it has generally been useless to warn the democratic machine. It is nevertheless true that the nomination of Hill or Gorman as the presidential candidate of the party would be followed by such a crusade against the nominee as has never been known in this country. Both of these men are in the position of Dudley except that their advice has been acted on. Nor will the nomination of any man who might be the tool of these men help the matter.

THE civil service commission has provided for a physical examination of applicants for the railway mail service. It can be taken before any qualified physician, but the successful applicant may be subject to a further physical examination. The probable object of this reservation is to guard against the leniency of friendly doctors. It has been demonstrated that the duties of this service require men physically sound and likely to remain so. Others should not try for this branch of service.

THE common council of Rochester has been wrestling with the New York civil service law, like its much-discomfited sister council of Buffalo, and has been badly worsted. It wanted to give a job to one Belknap, and did so over the mayor's veto, the latter's objection being that the proposed job-giving was in contravention of the civil service law. An action was begun by a taxpayer to restrain payment of the salary. The case went to the court of appeals, and that court has just decided that the employment of Belknap was illegal, as he had not come into the service after competitive examination, as provided by law.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY has the notorious distinction of having a professor—Collin—who has written an elaborate defense of Hill, the indefensible. If the university permits this to go unpunished, parents who want to make good citizens of their sons will hesitate about sending them to Cornell. Another public institution, The North American Review, has published an article in defense of Tammany Hall purporting to have been written by Richard H. Croker, an "illiterate extough." This kind of sensationalism only finds its parallel in the Police Gazette.

QUAY did well in his libel suits in Pennsylvania against those who charged him with sharing with Bardsley because the latter sent him a check for some eight or ten thousand dollars. Two editors of the Beaver Star, where Quay lives, were fined $600 each and sent to jail for six months. Somehow the country looks on with a broad grin. Is this meant as an insinuation that Quay is not "vindicated," and that the "slick" way in which the court machinery worked is a great joke on the incarcerated editors? It must be confessed it would look better if Quay had sought "vindication" first against those rich people who very particularly charged him with stealing some hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Pennsylvania state treasury, which Don Cameron made up to the treasury out of his private means.

THERE is nowhere in any constitution, state or federal, or in any state or federal law, any authority by which an appointing officer or any administration may use the public service in any manner for personal or party purposes. We challenge any one to point out such authority, yet hundreds of thousands of state and federal offices are constantly used for such purposes. There is no precedent for such a practice except in feudalism, aristocracy, monarchy, and imperialism. The country is saddled with bogus lords affording "protection" to contemptible vassals, each of whom "plows his lord's land or carries out his dung."

IN this country, the one thing that prevents the people from getting little more than nominal value for the enormous amount of money raised by taxation and expended for municipal purposes is the practice of giving the subordinate places to persons because they are republicans, or because they are democrats. So long as this practice continues, party machines will see nothing but spoil in any public employment.

ONE of the Mahone blackmailing cases has been tried at last in Washington, the jury finding for the accused. Whatever the evidence there could have been no other result after the charge of the judge which was, in substance, as follows :

Justice Bradley gave the case to the jury shortly after 2 o'clock. He referred to the act as a broad, comprehensive one, and said that whatever may have been the policy of congress in passing the act unless the act was declared unconstitutional it should be sustained.

It may be a matter of doubt if congress contemplated such a trivial case, yet in its terms it is so broad as to cover this case.

"For any political purpose," is the language of the law, and the man who pays the money as well as the man who receives it is a violator of the law. It is singular, to say the least, that although the law provides that offenders shall be dismissed from service the offenders are now in the employ of the government. It looks like trifling, but some one doubtless wants the law vindicated. If the question was on the constitutionality of the act he would, perhaps, have something to say.

The late Justice Bradley of the Supreme Court of the United States had held the act to be unconstitutional—as an abridgement of the rights of the citizen.

The object was a good one to protect the employes of the government. The law was, however, on the books and should be enforced.

He then directed the jury that they were to consider the evidence and determine if the law had been violated.

Those concerned with the enforcement of the law in this case perhaps feel proud of their achievements: The judge of his charge; the jury of the promptness with which it took the wink from the judge; the prosecutor of his success in securing failure; the President of his cold shoulder to any prosecution of blackmailing of the stripe charged.

AS WAS to be expected, Congressman John F. Andrew, of Massachusetts, regards his position as chairman of the house civil service committee seriously. He grasps the whole scope of civil service reform, and takes it as a matter of course that his committee will push forward this reform in every direction. The steps which Mr. Andrew believes now practicable are the extension of the classified system to post-offices with twenty-five or more employes, to the heads of divisions in the various departments, and to the superintendents of postal stations in large cities. He says that the present labor service system of Massachusetts has been tried "with remarkable success," and should be applied to the entire federal labor service, Secretary Tracy having already introduced it in the navy-yards, the system to be so incorporated in the law that succeeding administrations can not upset it. Mr. Andrew is a democrat, and, filled with these and other wholesome ideas which he frankly expresses, he may bring his party to such aid of civil service reform as to make it no longer possible to say that, as a party, it is a spoils party.

WE have read with interest The Public Service, published at Washington, by a company largely composed of members of the civil service. The project of enlarging the paper and putting it more into the field of the diplomatic and consular service is under consideration. Whatever is done we hope that the present uncompromising stand of The Public Service in favor of civil service reform will not be modified.

DAVE HILL.

The democratic friends and some of the opponents of Hill are unable to speak of him without mentioning "his splendid services to the party." The Atlanta Constitution, for instance, calls him "that unconquerable democratic leader."

It is astonishing that any honest democrat can mention Hill in any such terms, or can ever mention him at all without denouncing him as a scoundrel. The sum of his "splendid services" is the capture of the New York legislature. The county board of canvassers counted out the elected republican candidate of Dutchess county and counted in Hill's man. The county clerk, as clerk of the board, refused to sign the certificate, and Hill, as governor, removed him and appointed one Emans in his place. The certificate was sent to the secretary of state. The republicans took the case before a democrat, Judge Barnard, of the supreme court, who declared that the certificate was based upon an illegal and erroneous count, and restrained the board of state canvassers from canvassing it, and ordered the county board and the new clerk Emans to forward to the state board a certificate of the election of the republican candidate. This was done, Emans signing the certificate and forwarding it to the state board by mailing one copy to the governor, one to the comptroller, and one to the secretary of state, as the law requires. After he had thus ended all lawful connection with the return, some one telegraphed him that Judge Ingraham had granted an order restraining him from forwarding them. No such order was served upon him, but Emans took the train for Albany, went to the secretary of state, and that official gave him back his copy. Emans then went to the governor's office and got a messenger-boy to find the governor's copy and give it to him. Isaac H. Maynard, deputy attorney-general, went to the comptroller's office and got one of that officer's messengers to give him the third copy. After this extraordinary theft from the official files of the state, two other copies equally authentic were offered to the secretary of state and the comptroller, but were refused because they had not come by mail. Next, the court of appeals, the highest court of the state, affirmed the decision of Judge Barnard that the certificate of the Dutchess county board in favor of Hill's man was based upon an illegal and erroneous count. This certificate had reached the hands of the secretary of state, but not by mail, and immediately after this decision, and with full knowledge of it, Hill's board of state canvassers canvassed it and declared Hill's Dutchess county candidate elected to the senate. This gave the democrats a majority in that body.

These are the splendid services for which Hill is now being praised. He has publicly chained himself to this transaction by declaring that his messenger did right in stealing the returns filed with him as governor. Now, if any one can see any difference between this whole transaction and Sim Coy with his returning board altering tally-sheets, it would be well to point it out. There is no difference. Hill, in every fiber, is of the Sim Coy stripe. His methods are Sim Coy methods. His natural abilities are not greater than Sim Coy's. Were Hill put forward by the east as a candidate for the presidency, the eternal fitness of things would only be satisfied by the west seating Sim Coy by his side as a candidate for the vice-presidency. The fact that the Coy conspiracy which altered tally-sheets was punished by imprisonment, while the Dave Hill conspiracy, which, in violation of the constitution and the laws, pushed aside the government of the state of New York, chosen by the people, and crowded into its place a bogus government, which is now there, does not affect the question; it only goes to show corrupt prosecuting officers and venal juries. Given an honest jury and a fearless and able prosecutor, and this whole conspiracy, Clerk Emans, the state board, the secretary of state, the messengers, Isaac H. Maynard and Dave Hill would receive the same lesson the Coy conspiracy received at Indianapolis.

A POLITICAL BUCCANEER AS A PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE.

[Compiled from the New York Evening Post.]

David B. Hill began his political life in Elmira, New York, nearly thirty years ago as a justice of the peace. Nearly all his friends and workers were, and are, the dregs of the community. He never mingled in respectable society. He has always had a trick of "downing" an opponent in his own party by a temporary coalition with the opposite party. He personally bought votes, and since Hill began his career, Elmira has become one of the most politically corrupt cities in the United States. Says one witness:

"I personally saw Hill hand an envelope to an old man who had the palsy. The man was unable to open it and handed it to one of my clerks. I saw the clerk open it and take out a two-dollar bill and hand it to the old man."

In 1856 the Chemung canal overflowed and damaged adjacent property. No one thought of holding the state responsible. Years afterwards Hill's law firm stirred up the matter and agreed to take the case for nothing if they lost and for nearly all if they won. In 1869, and later, bills were passed by the assembly to pay nearly six millions of these claims, and when the last batch was passed, Hill was a member of the assembly. One of the awards was for $11,445 to James A. Locke, whose whole estate was not worth that amount. In 1875 Governor Tilden's Canal Commission exposed the nature of these claims. Locke testified that he first learned from the lawyers Smith & Hill that he had been damaged by the state. "Tell us," said the questioner of the commission, "in what manner, and by whom, was this question first presented to you of making a claim?" "I think it was by Smith & Hill," replied Locke. "You got your information in some way?" "I got it from them," replied the witness.

Elected to the assembly, Hill became one of the most useful agents of Tweed, and finally went into partnership with Tweed, publishing the Elmira Gazette. Hill voted for Tweed's bills to consummate the plot of robbing New York city. He opposed the impeachment of Tweed's judge, Cardozo, and apologized on the floor of the assembly for Tweed's judge, Barnard. Hill has always kept up his Elmira fights and trades. He invariably appears the Sunday before election, and all that day and the day following, his office swarms with heelers. Hundreds go away with the envelopes that constitute the secret of Hill's influence.

Mr. Hill succeeded to the governorship on January 1, 1885, when Mr. Cleveland resigned the office because of election to the presidency. He at once began to work for re-election in November following, and, in order to strengthen himself with patronage, he sought to gain control of the work of constructing a new aqueduct for New York city. The building of the aqueduct had been authorized in 1883, and begun in 1884 under a commission of three members, all honorable and able men, with the mayor, comptroller and commissioner of public works, members ex officio. The commissioner of public works, when Mr. Hill became governor, was one Rollin M. Squire, an unprincipled adventurer from Boston, who had been thrust into the office in the last days of 1884, in accordance with a disgraceful compact between a mayor who was leaving office and a mercenary board of aldermen. Mr. Hill opened communication with Squire, and entered into an alliance with him by which they mutually agreed to stand by each other through thick and thin. The two worked together for Mr. Hill's re-election, which was accomplished in November following.

Soon after the election Squire went to the governor and told him that, in order to get the office of commissioner of public works, he had signed a pledge to administer that office in all respects as one Maurice B. Flynn, a contractor, wished him to; that he supposed this pledge had been destroyed, but had discovered that it was still in existence and was about to be made public as a means of getting him out of office. The governor advised Squire not to resign, but to hold on to his office, assuring him, Squire subsequently testified, that "he would support me (Squire) through it all, unless I should do something so bad that a criminal court would convict me." The governor kept this promise faithfully, though after making it he was shown a copy of the pledge which Squire had signed. Knowing the existence of this pledge, he entered into a compact, or "deal," with the republican leaders of the legislature to pass a bill so re-organizing the aqueduct commission as to put Squire in virtual control of its work. The partners to this "deal" on the republican side were Speaker Husted, Senator Hoysradt and Hamilton Fish, Jr., and on the democratic side, Governor Hill, John O'Brien, aqueduct contractor and chairman of the democratic state committee, and William L. Muller, a former law partner of Governor Hill. They had a bill passed which provided for the appointment by the governor of three new aqueduct commissioners at a salary of $5,000 each, and the removal of the mayor and comptroller as ex officio members, leaving Squire as the sole official representative of the city on the commission. After the bill had passed, the governor appointed Hamilton Fish, Jr., one of the new commissioners, thus keeping his bargain with the republicans. Before he had given his approval to the bill he was shown a copy of Squire's pledge, and then the pledge itself, as proof of Squire's character, and as a reason for refusing to put such great power in his hands, but he declined to be influenced at all by it.

One of the first acts of the reorganized commission was to open bids for the work of constructing an important section of the new aqueduct. The bid of O'Brien & Clark, the former the John O'Brien alluded to above, was $54,000 higher than the lowest bid. Gov. Hill sent his friend Muller to members of the commission asking them to vote to accept O'Brien & Clark's bid as a personal favor to himself, and a majority of the commission acceded to the request. As soon as they were awarded the bid, O'Brien & Clark, in defiance of law, at once sold out their contract to one of the lower bidders for $30,000 clear profit. The full meaning of this transaction will appear later on in this narrative.

The new commission went into power in May, 1886. In August following, William M. Ivins, having obtained possession of the pledge which Squire had given to Flynn, published it, and Mayor Grace at once began proceedings for Squire's removal, basing the demand for it upon this pledge. The governor was forced to accede to the demand by public sentiment. At the time of doing so, the governor made public denial that he had ever seen a copy of the pledge before its publication.

In 1888 the scandals about the doings of the aqueduct commission became so great that an investigation was ordered by the senate. It was shown by unimpeachable testimony that in the campaign for his own re-election in 1885, Gov. Hill had drawn two notes, one for $10,000 and the other for $5,000, the proceeds of which had been used to defray campaign expenses. The first was drawn to the order of William L. Muller, and was indorsed by Muller, and by John O'Brien and Heman Clark, the two heaviest contractors for aqueduct work. The note was cashed by O'Brien, and charged to him on the books of the firm. The second note was indorsed by Muller and Alton B. Parker, and was cashed by John Keenan, the alleged "boodle-holder" in the Broadway railway scandal. Keenan was afterwards repaid by John O'Brien. Mr. O'Brien contributed $500, Alton B. Parker $500, and other friends of the governor similar amounts. It was to pay these notes that the contract was awarded to Clark & O'Brien, though their bid was $54,000 above the lowest, for Mayor Grace and Squire testified that they were asked to vote in favor of that bid in order that the governor's notes might be paid. The testimony also showed that both notes were finally paid by O'Brien & Clark, presumably out of the $30,000 profit made on that bid.

It was also shown by the testimony during the investigation that Gov. Hill had heard of the Squire-Flynn pledge several months before it was made public; that Squire told him of it in December, 1885, and again in January, 1886; that a copy of it was shown him in March, 1886, and the original in May, 1886. Yet, after all this knowledge, he had entered into a compact with Squire, had addressed him in letters asking for patronage as "Honorable" and "My Dear Sir," had united with the republicans of the legislature in passing a bill to put the aqueduct work into his control, and had been profiting in many ways, including the receipt of $15,000 of public money, from his association with him. Yet when the pledge was made public, he was forced to remove Squire as a dishonest official, thus admitting that the pledge was prima facie proof of his worthless character. For their friendly services in his behalf the governor subsequently appointed John O'Brien receiver for the Broadway railway, and made Mr. Muller a commissioner of claims.

In 1887, Hill cultivated the liquor interests by vetoing a reasonable high license bill. He vetoed a similar bill in 1888, and in that year he also vetoed the first ballot reform bill. In 1888 he was re-elected governor, although Cleveland failed to carry the state. Of this the New York Tribune said, "Hill succeeded only because he was able to sell a presidency for a governorship." In 1889, Hill vetoed another ballot reform bill, and in 1890 still another.

Elsewhere in the CHRONICLE is described the overturning of the elected legislature of New York by Hill upon the Coy system. His whole public history shows him to be a man that stops at nothing, and who panders always to the lawless and degraded.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF A GORMAN HENCHMAN.

We have the demoralizing spectacle of democrats professing morality and yet praising the unscrupulous work of unscrupulous David B. Hill. As if this were not enough there is also similar praise for Gorman, either himself a presidential candidate or a democratic Warwick along with Calvin S. Brice. It is not safe to desist in the effort to keep awake the moral senses of those honest partisans whom Gorman has put into a lethargic state by his fight against the Force Bill. With whom Gorman consorts, what manner of citizens his work requires, are very well indicated in the following sketch, from the Baltimore Sun.

Charlie Goodman, a man who has been in the hands of the police a number of times, and who has also figured in Baltimore local politics, shot and killed John T. Duncan yesterday afternoon. The shooting occurred in Louis Steigerwald's saloon, 105 North Eutaw street, at twenty minutes before 6 o'clock.

Charles Goodman was born in Baltimore and is about fifty years old. His early life was spent in the southwestern part of the city, and when still a young man he obtained a reputation as a fighter and was frequently arrested on charges growing out of his belligerent nature. His principal occupation for many years was that of a saloon-keeper, and at different times he conducted saloons at the corner of Green and Baltimore streets, at General Wayne Inn, on Green street, near the old western district police station, on Paca street, near the Crescent Club, and at the corner of Holliday and Fayette streets.

While running a saloon at the last-named place he had a fight with John Keleher and came near being killed. Pistols were drawn, and a bullet struck Goodman in the forehead and plowed along the scalp to the top of his head.

The first serious charge laid against Goodman was in 1870, when he assaulted Nathaniel Cole, a gate keeper at Camden Station. He was arrested for the assault, and after he was released he followed Mr. Cole to his home, on Pratt street, near Parkin, and struck him on the head with an iron plate. Cole was seriously injured. Goodman was tried on the charge of assault with intent to kill, and, being convicted, was sentenced to four years in the penitentiary. He remained there until December 16, 1872, when he was pardoned upon the condition that he would leave the state. He accepted the condition and went to Washington.

He had not been in Washington long before he got into a quarrel with Lemuel Weeden. They had a bloody fight in a room, and before they could be separated Goodman was shot in the shoulder and wrist and the furniture in the room was wrecked. While Weeden was under arrest, and before he was taken to the police station, Goodman drew a pistol and shot him. The wound was not dangerous. Goodman escaped while being taken from the jail van to the court-room. He made his way to Cincinnati, where he was arrested a few weeks later, and was started on his return to Washington in charge of a Cincinnati officer who volunteered to deliver him to the Washington authorities. He professed to be willing to return and stand a trial, but, watching his opportunity, he jumped from the train near Sir John's Run. The train was running at a speed of more than thirty miles an hour at the time, and it was thought his desperate leap had killed him. The train was stopped and the officer ran back and found Goodman lying beside the track with a broken leg. He was taken to Washington.

During the civil war Goodman was a staunch Unionist and served as a soldier. Friends in Washington, who knew of his army record, interested themselves in his behalf with President Grant, and he escaped a term in the penitentiary at Albany. He returned to Baltimore, and in January, 1873, was arrested for violating the terms of his pardon. He was afterward granted a full pardon. The wound in his shoulder continued to give him trouble, and he placed himself under the care of Dr. W. H. Crim, who took several pieces of shattered bone from the shoulder.

In 1879 Mary Lizzie Kuhns, a minor, was arrested in the western district by Lieutenant (then patrolman) Fullem, charged with being drunk and disorderly. The charge was dismissed and she was arrested upon a ticket-of-leave from the Maryland Industrial School for Girls and returned to that institution. Goodman had her brought into court on a writ of habeas corpus. Upon his promise to marry the girl she was released from the Industrial school and they lived together until nine months ago. They had numerous quarrels. On one occasion Goodman shot the woman in the arm, and at another time she stabbed him in the abdomen, inflicting a wound which confined him to bed for six weeks.

Among other things Goodman was interested in politics and was a member of the Crescent Club. During the political campaign of 1889 he created a sensation by deserting the regular ticket and appearing on the stage with the fusionists at the Concordia Opera House on the night of October 26 with Mr. John K. Cowen and Bill Harig.

He made a speech, in which he said that he had been taught revolution for four months past in the Crescent Society by its president, J. Frank Morrison. Then he said: "Mr. Cowen sent for me and accused me of what I knew I was guilty of. He asked me in a very abrupt way if I was not a ballot-box stuffer. He asked me if I would come to this meeting and confess my political sins. I said I would." Goodman said he did good work for Mr. Gorman in 1879, and told how he made an expedition to Howard county at the election in 1879 with forty repeaters, all armed, and scared the colored voters by firing pistols. Two days later the following record of Charlie Goodman was published as an advertisement in The Sun.

Charles Goodman, October 17, 1866—Arrested on bench warrant for threatening to shoot Samuel Warner.

Not long after the election of 1889 Goodman was appointed to a position on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal [Gorman spoil.—Ed. CHRONICLE] where he remained until a short time before the election of 1891, when he returned to Baltimore and rejoined the regulars.

The association at once protested against a policy which, however gratifying it may be to partisan rapacity, is evidently hostile to Indian interests,—a policy which removes responsibility for the right management of the service from the department in Washington, where it belonged—a department that could be held accountable for results—and diffuses it among a multitude of irresponsible men fifteen hundred to three thousand miles distant; which subjected the Indian to local influences in many cases manifestly hostile, and confused the selection of agents who possess almost autocratic powers over him to localities often permeated with a hostile sentiment. But protests against this policy—the spoils system in a concentrated and most objectionable form—were even less effective than our remonstrances under the previous administration. The proscription of agents appointed under President Cleveland was conducted with such neatness and dispatch that so long ago as last winter but a single democratic agent owing his commission to him remained in the service! If we are correctly informed, there is to-day not one such agent left to bear witness to the fact that there ever was such a thing as a democratic president! The policy complained of was not long in giving proof of its evil nature by its evil fruit. Agents of intelligence and high character, in cases known to us, were removed to make way for the henchmen of local politicians—men who were manifestly inferior to their predecessors, whose administration has witnessed a steady decline in the condition of their agencies, and where in two instances serious complaints have been made by the leading progressive Indians on the reservations.—From the last Annual Report Indian Rights Commission.

One objection is frequently raised to the reform system which has weight with many friends of pure government; that is, that the system will create a bureaucracy. There is a certain measure of plausibility about this to the extent that continued office holding tends to produce routine methods. But whenever my mind inclines to be impressed by this argument, it is promptly recalled to the conditions under the spoils system by a pen picture drawn by Josiah Quincy in the early part of the century:

"Why, sir, we hear the clamor of the craving animals at the treasury trough here in this capitol. Such running, such jostling, such wriggling, such clambering over one another's backs, such squealing because the tub is so narrow and the company so crowded."

And lest this may seem the idea of an old-fashioned theorist and purist, I say to you that only two years ago I read what purported to be the utterances of a prominent politician, in which, as I remember it, he used the same figure of speech, and complaining of the slowness of removals, demanded that the hungry hogs be given speedier access to the swill-trough.

The alternative is presented—a "bureau" or a "trough." Which is the most desirable? For my own part, even if the danger is what it is pictured, which I do not believe, I prefer a bureaucracy to a troughocracy.—From an Address of Charles Clayton Allen, President of the Civil Service Reform Association before the Office Men's Club.

William G. Low, brother of President Low of Columbia, has sent to the college an offer, which has been accepted, to give a prize of $100, for the best essay on civil service reform. The award will be made in the spring.

PHASES OF HILLISM.

Heretofore it has been the custom in Newburg to call the primaries for the county convention, which elects delegates to the state convention, about ten days before the date of the latter. Under the new ballot-reform law forty-eight hours' notice is required. Our citizens observed in town on Sunday a number of employes of Sing Sing prison, who owe their positions to the fact that they are heelers of Warden "Bill" Brown. Politicians of both parties promptly concluded that some of Gov. Hill's dirty political linen was to be washed, and that Brown had sent his heelers to prepare the laundry. Before night all the Newburgers whom Brown has taken care of in Sing Sing, to the number of a dozen, were here to the neglect of their official duties. They have remained over to-day and will be with us to-morrow. In the meantime people are asking: "Who is running the prison?" and "What is going to be done about it?" Everybody knows what this battalion of heelers is here for, namely, to carry the primaries which have been so suddenly called to-night to be held to-morrow and Wednesday, in the interest of Gov. Hill, and to elect Hill delegates to the Saratoga convention, who in turn will elect a state committeeman for Hill. The fact was further emphasized this afternoon when Brown himself swaggered into town. Within five minutes he was surrounded by his henchmen, the most prominent among them being "Dave" Crawford, "Tommy" Ray, the notorious "Gil" Crissey, who was chief clerk of the post-office when Brown was postmaster; "Jack" Glynn, "Teddy" Ford, and the noted "Ed" Brown, who was made purchasing agent at the prison at a salary of $1,200 a year and perquisites—a merry lot taken altogether. They obsequiously reported that "things was fixed," as they expressed it. Brown's programme is to hold the primaries in the first and second wards to-morrow night, and in the third and fourth wards Wednesday. The better class of democrats deprecate this sudden call, and express their disgust that the politics of this county should be in the hands of "such a man as Brown," as the general expression goes. Heretofore the rule has been to call the primaries about ten days before the meeting of the state convention, but Brown, inspired with the fear of opposition, anticipated the old custom and set the call three weeks before the date of the convention.—Newburg, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 24, 1891.

Warden Brown of Sing Sing prison has had a hard time of it this week, and his face wore anything but a contented look as he stepped into the court-house in this city to-day, accompanied by his right bower, Clerk Gilbert R. Crissy of Sing Sing prison. The democrats of the first assembly district of Orange county were in session there to elect delegates to the state convention. Brown and his Sing Sing horde were here two weeks ago, at the time of electing delegates to the several conventions, and intimidated the anti-Brown following to such an extent that there was a fight in only one ward, and that he finally captured.—Newburg, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 14.

When Chairman Watson announced the result on a motion to allow only delegates to vote, one of the Hill men walked up to him and, shaking his fist in his face, yelled, "It's a lie! It's a lie!" Another Hill man sprang forward to attack Watson, but was seized by others and held back. A fight seemed imminent. The crowd surged back and forth, overturning chairs and tables, and gesticulating wildly. When Chairman Watson appointed the secretaries another riot occurred, the crowd pushing and pulling each other about and driving the chairmen from their seats. Then Bancroft, the Hill chairman, appointed a committee on credentials, despite the protests of the anti-Hill men, who cried: "Give us a fair show!" This committee reported, of course, in favor of the Hill delegation from Penfield, and then the Hill faction went ahead and elected a delegation to the state convention.—Rochester, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, August 25, 1891.

The unanimous acquiescence of the democratic state committee in Senator Hill's plan for a mid-winter convention, Boss McLaughlin, of Brooklyn, joining with the other members in voting for it, shows that Mr. Hill has overcome all opposition to himself inside his party machine. How he has overcome it is not known, but it is a curious coincidence that the submission of McLaughlin to his wishes was accompanied by the appearance in the senate at Albany last night of a bill which, if it becomes a law, will restore to McLaughlin the control of the Brooklyn bridge which Tammany took away from him some time ago. The loss of the bridge has been the chief cause of McLaughlin's hostility to Mr. Hill, and he has more than once made the return of it a condition of his further support of Hill's plans. If the proposed Bridge Bill is allowed to pass through the Hill-Tammany legislature, that fact will be pretty conclusive evidence that McLaughlin has got his "terms."—New York Evening Post.

All this programme was foreshadowed in these dispatches, a few days ago. Gov. Hill keenly realizes that his chances are desperate, and in spite of precedent and of the protests that he has received from prominent democrats, in spite of reason and of sound judgment, he is determined to force on the party a "snap" convention in midwinter, when many of the roads are impassable, and when it will be well nigh impossible for the people of the country districts to attend the primaries where the delegates will be chosen, thus enabling the "bosses" to choose their own delegates in their own way and without opposition.

Coming within twenty-four hours after Gov. Flower had affixed his signature to the enumeration bill, the real significance of the hurry to pass that measure now becomes thoroughly manifest. For a week before the convention is held, and during the time it is held, the 5,300 enumerators who are to be selected by Secretary of State Frank Rice will be engaged in their labors—a formidable army of politicians who will exert no little influence, even in those counties where the honest and well-grounded opposition to Hill is strongest. The passage of that bill, the gag-law that was applied in the senate, the precipitate haste of Gov. Flower to sign it without giving to it that attention and scrutiny which a bill of its importance demands, stand forth now in the light of a conspiracy against the state, and in the interest of as desperate a gang of freebooters as ever ran a political machine.—New York Times, January 22.

The names of the enumerators for all the other sections of the state were transmitted to Senator Hill at his headquarters in this city for his personal inspection, before they were agreed upon. If the senator approved of the lists, they were turned over to the secretary of state, with the former's indorsement. In case any of the appointees were found unsatisfactory by Senator Hill, who wants none but political hangers-on or ward heelers to serve as enumerators, the names of the undesirable candidates were stricken from the lists, and the local leader was directed to select others. Evidently Hill is not easily satisfied in this particular, for it is said that the secretary of state has been kept busy revising the "official" lists of enumerators, in accordance with instructions received continually from the senator.—New York Evening Post, Feb. 10.

The fact that Secretary Rice refused to give out the names of the enumerators shows, moreover, that this census is to be taken by a close corporation, which works on the principle that the census is not the public's business.—New York Evening Post, Feb. 16.

The county democratic convention was held at Horseheads to-day, and was one of the liveliest ever held in this county. Alexandria C. Eustace, the State committeeman and civil service commissioner, as was expected, worked things under the instructions of his party boss, Senator D. B. Hill, to suit himself. John B. Stanchfield, one of Hill's lieutenants, was chosen chairman. The committee on contested delegates reported in favor of the Eustace delegates. This occasioned a bitter feeling, and the anti-Eustace men expressed their feelings in the most vigorous language.—Elmira Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 7.

* * *

The early call of the New York State Democratic Convention to choose delegates to the national convention is in a measure having the effect it was intended to have in Connecticut. The call for the state convention here has not been issued, but the Hill men are as industriously at work all over the state as if the Connecticut convention was to be coincident with the one in Albany. They have picked out their candidates for delegates to the national convention in every county in the state, and are strengthening their lines in all directions. Here in New Haven the candidate for county delegate who represents Hill and Hillism is Alexander Troup, who has more than once been repudiated by the democrats of his own town, and who will be repudiated again. In published communications Troup has declared that he wears no man's collar (perhaps he doesn't since William H. Barnum died), and that if chosen as a delegate he will act for the best interests of the party. He dare not say that he is opposed to Cleveland—he filled a federal office under Cleveland—and he is careful not to say that he is opposed to Hill. But it is not necessary that he should announce his preference. Everybody knows that he is working for Hill. He believes in and practices the Hill kind of politics. He is a spoilsman of the spoilsmen, holding rigidly to the motto "to the victors belong the spoils." He publicly scoffed at President Cleveland's civil service reform declarations while holding an office in the Cleveland administration which Chairman Barnum demanded for him. And if he can not have all the spoils he is willing to divide.—New Haven Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 8.

Tammany shows its customary defiance of decent public sentiment by forcing the board of police justices to appoint the Hon. John P. Keating clerk of the court of special sessions. Keating was indicted by the grand jury in 1890 for extorting money from prisoners as warden of Lullow street jail, and was compelled to resign that position. There was never any doubt about his guilt. Henry S. Ives testified that he had, while confined for fourteen months in the jail, paid Keating $10,000 for special privileges. Another civil prisoner testified that he had paid Keating twenty dollars for the privilege of going about the city in charge of a keeper. The indictments against Keating were dismissed on the recommendation of the Hon. John R. Fellows, and Keating was soon after appointed to a city court clerkship. Now he goes a step higher and secures a place with a salary of $6,000 a year. He owes his steady progress, in spite of all exposures as to his character, to the friendship of the Hon. Richard Croker, he being the Tammany leader in Croker's district.—New York Evening Post, Jan. 26.

Gov. Flower's appointment of Isaac H. Maynard as a judge of the court of appeals is recognized by the democratic press as so indefensible that they receive it in silence. There is nothing in his career to commend him for this exalted position. He has been a politician of the "pernicious activity" kind for nearly twenty years. He began as a member of the assembly from Delaware county, and though his skill as a politician was sufficient to get him elective office in that county he has never been able to command popular support in the state at large. He was elected county judge and surrogate there in 1877, and his service on that bench constitutes his entire judicial experience. He was the democratic candidate for secretary of state in 1883, and was defeated, running behind his ticket. He then secured the appointment of deputy attorney-general at Albany, and in 1885 Secretary Manning appointed him second comptroller in the treasury department at Washington. Secretary Fairchild promoted him to the post of assistant secretary, and in that position he originated the bogus "sugar fraud" charges against officials in the New York custom house and used them as an excuse for making fifteen removals. We charged him with the responsibility for this performance, and he telegraphed to us denying the charge and demanding proof. An investigation was held by a committee of the senate, and the charge was sustained, Mr. Maynard failing to appear in his own defence. The "sugar frauds" were subsequently shown to be entirely bogus, the officials removed and assailed by Maynard were exonerated, and the Boston Advertiser, which repeated Maynard's charges against one of the accused, has recently paid $1,000 damages as a compromise to prevent further legal proceedings in a suit for damages in which the jury gave a verdict of $12,500 against the paper.

After his departure from the treasury department with this record, Mr. Maynard was appointed again deputy attorney-general at Albany. When the democratic state convention met last summer, he appeared before it as Governor Hill's candidate for attorney-general, but found so little encouragement for his claims that he left town before the balloting began, and his name was not presented to the convention. When Governor Hill began his campaign for the control of the senate, after election, Mr. Maynard acted as his ally and agent in instigating the county canvassing boards to the various fraudulent proceedings which culminated in the theft of the Dutchess county-seat by the state board of canvassers. He was the recognized "counsel" of the Onondaga and Dutchess county canvassing boards, in which the most outrageous frauds were committed. His activity in this work is universally admitted to have constituted his chief claim to the present appointment, and Governor Flower is generally regarded as using a court of appeals judgeship as payment for a political debt.—New York Evening Post, Jan. 20.

The favored candidate for superintendent of public instruction was a man that not more than five members had ever heard of before last Saturday and whom less than five had ever seen. He has made no canvass, written no letters, applied for no support. Beyond the confines of Erie county he had no reputation. There whatever reputation he had was that of a politician. At the eleventh hour, when the other half dozen candidates imagined the contest would be awarded on its merits, the name of Mr. Crooker of Erie is sprung, and the members of the legislature are informed by Lieut. Gov. Sheehan and Senator Hill that they must support him. Many of the members are indignant and express their feelings openly. Others are angry and conceal it; all are disgusted more or less, but hesitate to say so. * * * James F. Crooker has been superintendent of education in Buffalo for ten years or more. The office is an elective one, its term being two years. Mr. Crooker is and always has been, a staunch democrat, and Buffalo is, in the main, a republican city, but Mr. Crooker has been re-elected so many times that the republicans have about made up their minds that it is useless to nominate a man against him. This condition of things is not due to Mr. Crooker's popularity, but to his adroit disposition of the immense patronage at his disposal. Early in his career Mr. Crooker catered to the local political bosses in the distribution of his "patronage." He then formed an alliance with "Jack" White, the republican boss of the first ward which has never been broken. For years it has been a public scandal in Buffalo that "Jack" White could get anybody that he chose into the public schools as a teacher. White is an illiterate but shrewd man, who has represented his ward in the common council for the last sixteen or eighteen years consecutively. He is one of the few men who control the republican machine in Erie county, and he openly works for Crooker's election, no matter who the candidate of his own party may be. So powerful is he that no republican leader has even suggested that he be disciplined. He is a Barney Biglin sort of a man and his followers cling to him because he "takes care of them."—New York Times, February 10.

Gov. Hill's action, it is well understood, was political. The fish commissioners have the appointment of fifteen fish and game protectors, and strong efforts have been made to convert the protective system into a part of the political machine. The commissioners have ignored politics; they have been governed in their appointments solely by an earnest desire to maintain an efficient service. Their only purpose has been to protect the game and the fish and to increase the supply. As public-spirited officers, serving without pay, they have acknowledged allegiance to neither democrat nor republican; and they have never considered an employee's politics, nor the political bearing of his employment in their service. This independent attitude they have maintained in the face of constant importunings by those in authority to appoint, for political reasons, unworthy applicants. This step—the summary ousting of a faithful, upright, and independent public servant from a position of trust to make the office and its incumbent a subservient factor—is an unmistakable and shameless declaration that the fish-culture interests of the state of New York are to be sacrificed to political ends. We are to have, not game protectors, but ward heelers; the increase of the food-fish supply is to be subordinated to the satisfying of partisan greed.—Forest and Stream, January, 1892, on Removal of Fish Commissioner Eugene G. Blackford.

Senator Hill's endeavors to turn the state fishery commission into a political machine have at last been rewarded with success. It was only a short time ago that, as governor, he removed from the commission its most valued member, Eugene G. Blackford, and appointed in his place David G. Hackney, a professional politician, whose only recommendation for the place was that he was a political friend of Hill's. At that time Henry Burden, of Troy, another valuable member of the board, prepared his letter of resignation. He was induced to put off sending it, but a day or two ago he decided to remain a commissioner no longer and sent the following letter to Gov. Flower:

* * * "In the two and one-half years that I have been on the commission, the question of politics has not entered into the few appointments we have had to make, and I think I voice the sentiment of all my former associates on the board that it should be kept out, as we recognize the fact that its efficiency would be destroyed if other than fitness and merit should control our appointments. I regret to say that our freedom of action has been somewhat hampered of late by politicians and state officials high in authority. The work of the commission is of such a nature that it can not be made a political machine without destroying its usefulness.

"As we receive no salary, I had a personal pride that our work should be conducted as one would his private business, that is, to give the people the best possible results with the means at our command. In view of the above facts, I can not consistently longer remain a member of this board."

Mr. Burden has taken the greatest interest in his duties. He is an enthusiastic fisherman, and anything relating to fish or fish culture is his delight. It was largely through his efforts that the legislature empowered the construction of the three fishways in the Hudson river. He had charge, also, of the Sacondaga fish hatchery, and he was interested in the construction of a fish car for the distribution of fish. His intention was to have it fitted with a shad hatching plant.—New York Times, January 20.

There is not a decent man in the city, of either party, who is not ashamed of the exhibition of Hill's boomers at Albany. A gentleman who has known the ex-governor for twenty-five years, and who was present when the rabble called upon him, says that Mr. Hill has broken his anti-swearing record; that when he was accosted by the hungry mob he caused the air to become blue with copper-lined oaths, his wrath being generally turned upon the managers of the excursion. A large crowd was at the station to "view the remains" of wrecked humanity as the excursion train rushed into the station here at nine o'clock this morning. The toughs were in a stupor, many of them hatless, and there were few whose cheap hats were not smashed into the appearance of Chinese lanterns. Several fights had taken place, and cuts and bruises adorned the faces of some of the men. At the station a lively scrimmage took place, and several of the mob were locked up. The banners looked as if they had been through a cyclone, and as a whole a more woebegone aggregation of mortals never stepped off a train in this city. An inspection of the empty cars revealed a disgusting state of things. The floors and seats were completely littered, and empty bottles were everywhere to be seen. It is scarcely necessary to say that the senator is sorry that he chartered and paid for the train that carried his political puppets to the state capital.—Elmira Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 24.

FACTS DISCERNIBLE AFAR OFF WITH THE NAKED EYE.

"We make no excuses, offer no apologies, ask no suspension of judgment. We say, investigate, scrutinize, take our word for nothing; but afar off, or near at hand, with glass or naked eye, examine what has been done in great things and little things, and on such examination pass judgment.

* * * —Attorney General Miller, at Philadelphia, February 12, 1892.

Senator Quay is as frank and open in his methods as Senator Hill. He says of the Pennsylvania delegation, which he is now "packing" for personal use in the National Republican convention, that it will not be committed to any candidate, but will go to Minneapolis as a "Quay delegation," and that when he gets on the ground with it he will look the field over, and see what to do with his men.—New York Evening Post, February 15.

* * *

It affords the Ledger as much satisfaction to announce this morning the withdrawal of Mr. John Field's resignation of the office of postmaster of Philadelphia as it will give gratification to his fellow-citizens, especially to those of the active business community, to be authoritatively informed of its withdrawal. A few months ago it became an open secret that the practical politicians, who had strenuously opposed Mr. Field's appointment, were encroaching upon his official authority, and interfering with his sagacious and efficient management. The pressure of this political force became greater and greater upon the postmaster, until, at last, he was obliged to recognize that he was no longer untrammelled, no longer able to conduct the affairs of the post-office in accordance with the same just and intelligent principles as those upon which his business as a merchant was conducted. Recognizing then that, in respect of his own good fame, he could not continue to occupy a position of public trust in which his capacity for usefulness to the community of business was already impaired and likely to be destroyed, and his own good faith likely to be impugned, Mr. Field tendered his resignation of it. Subsequently, on Saturday evening, Mr. Field was induced to withdraw his resignation. It is scarcely necessary to assure those who know him that he has consented to remain postmaster only upon condition that he shall be in fact and deed the postmaster, with absolute authority to conduct the affairs of the office in harmony with his sense of duty to the public, and with his long and honorable record of devotion to the welfare of his fellow-citizens, regardless of the selfish interests of the practical politicians.—Philadelphia Ledger, February 1.

The republicans of Pennsylvania are choosing delegates to a state convention which is to nominate a candidate for justice of the supreme court.

Among the delegates already elected in Philadelphia are three appraisers who were indicted for their complicity in the Bardsley frauds. Two magistrates in the same city have also been nominated for re-election by the republicans who admitted before the council's committee that they permitted Bardsley to retain portions of the costs and fees when a settlement was made with him for the delinquent mercantile taxes of 1890, the reason for their payment of tribute being the outrageous costs which they had themselves piled up, one of them having charged $8.76 for each dollar taken in, and the other extorting $36 for the collection of $1.—New York Evening Post, Jan. 21.

John Collins, leader of the fourth assembly district, started the discussion. He said that something should be done at once to get the republican workers something to do. He raised the old cry and declared that it was an outrage that so many democrats were retained in the federal offices. He said that he had gone to Secretary of the Navy Tracy, to get him to put some democrats out of the navy yard and that while the secretary didn't absolutely refuse to do so, he left it to be inferred that he would do nothing of the kind.

Mr. Collins complained bitterly that democrats were employed in the post-office, in the public stores, and in the custom house as well as in the navy yard. He believed that the necessities of the republican party made it imperative that a change should be made and that at once. He also complained that those who were most successful in getting places for republicans were men who did not mingle with the men who got the votes and who did all the hard work for the republican party. Every man who got a job had some big republican back of him. "This social line must be broken down," exclaimed Mr. Collins dramatically, thereby giving warning to the "silk stockings" that the "short hairs" were getting mad.

Several other members of the executive committee also spoke in the same vein. The discussion was very animated at times. One speaker said that Bernard Biglin employed sixty men and that none of them belonged to the republican organization. He thought that all republicans should do what they could to secure employment for republican workers in or out of the federal service. It was charged that not only were democrats employed in the federal offices, but they were also employed by republican commissions and officers.

George W. Wanmaker, therepublican leader of the seventeenth assembly district, advised the appointment of a committee of five to go to Washington and call on Secretary of the Treasury Foster with a view to ascertaining what could be done toward getting the democrats out. Another leader said: "This committee should call on everybody and get every democrat out." Mr. Wanmaker insisted that the republican workers should be provided for. He said; "Unless this is done we shall go under in 1892."

John H. Gunner, leader of the republicans in the twenty-second district, also argued on this line. He said that he had succeeded in getting a sweeper appointed in the post-office, and that when he made an effort to get this sweeper promoted, instead of being promoted the sweeper was discharged. Then, to appease Mr. Gunner, Postmaster Van Cott appointed a woman scrubber. The postmaster was informed by Mr. Gunner that he had no woman in his district that could vote. —Meeting of the Executive Committee of the Republican County Committee, New York Times, November 19.

The republicans of Brooklyn will have the satisfaction of seeing Quarantine Commissioner John A. Nichols and Port Warden William H. Leaycraft put out of office. The former was appointed ten years ago by Gov. Cornell, and he has been holding over ever since by grace of Thomas C. Platt and the latter's senators. Although the salary is not a large one, Nichols has managed to become a well-to-do man since he came from Baltimore fifteen years ago, and rumor has it that he made his money in the rag-disinfecting ring, in which E. B. Bartlett and he were interested. It was these men who took Ernst Nathan under their united wings, and put him forward as a local boss. The result has been apparent, and there are very few republicans who will shed tears over Nichols's decapitation. Leaycraft was also appointed by Governor Cornell in 1882, and he has been holding over through Platt's friendship. His office is run on the fee system, and Leaycraft claims to have netted between $3,000 and $4,000 a year out of it. His work has never been exacting, and rarely requires his personal attention. His time in winter is spent in Albany as a "cavalryman," and is said to be very popular with the legislators, and to have exercised considerable "persuasive" powers. It is hinted that he and Israel P. Fischer, republican state committeeman, are going to organize a firm to deal in legislative privileges. They have both made arrangements to be in Albany all winter.—New York Times, January 3.

Port Warden William H. Leaycraft has begun to realize that he must soon walk the plank and make room for some good democrat, so he is spending all his time in Washington trying to hunt up a profitable job in the treasury department. Reports received by his friends indicate that he will succeed. Leaycraft is very much like Major "Billy" Barker, not only in personal appearance, but in his ability to get a job at almost any time. He is the boss of a very small section of Brooklyn, the thirteenth ward, and is always on the side of the candidate who has most clearly followed Iago's advice to "put money in thy purse," and he has done as much as any other man except Ernst Nathan to give the democratic ring 20,000 majority in Kings county. Yet he can always get a job.—New York Times, February 7.

An effort is being made by some senators who want certain appointments to the circuit and district courts to delay confirming the judicial nominations pending till the President has not only filled the circuit court vacancies existing, but also the vacancies which may be created by appointments to circuits. The purpose of such a movement is plain. It is to force the President to yield to the demands of senators in making appointments, or suffer the penalty of an alliance with democrats for the purpose of defeating pending nominations.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, January 12.

Patronage, spelled with capital letters, has been an engrossing topic in Washington to-day. How could it be otherwise, with ten stalwart patronage-hunters from New York city in town? Mr. Jacob M. Patterson mustered his braves quite early this morning. The number had been increased by several New Yorkers who did not get here with the main body last night, and comprised representatives of ten out of the twenty four assembly districts in New York city. This is the way the delegation lined up at the Arlington Hotel previous to the opening of hostilities:

J. M. Patterson, tenth district.
M. J. Healy, first district.
Charles F. Murray, third district.
John Simpson, sixth district.
John R. Nugent, fourteenth district.
R. A. Greacen, fifteenth district.
George W. Wanmaker (not Wanamaker), seventeenth district.
Bernard Biglin, eighteenth district.
Michael Goode, twentieth district.

All these men had come to Washington to further a preconcerted plan to ask the administration for more patronage for republicans in the city of New York. About 11 o'clock the procession started for the White House. The President had been warned of the coming invasion and was fully prepared to receive the place-seekers. They were ushered into his presence without delay, and in about fifteen minutes he was made fully acquainted with the object of their call. Mr. Patterson acted as spokesman and introduced the gentlemen to the President. Mr. Harrison was already acquainted with Mr. Biglin and one or two others of the party. They had been to see him before on similar errands. The position of the New York republicans was fully set forth by Patterson and Biglin. The party, they said, was on the eve of a great struggle. They believed that victory could be won in the state of New York if the republicans adopted the right tactics. The democrats were torn by dissensions, and the recent acts of David B. Hill had done much to make republican success possible. In the city it was hard to contend against Tammany and its enormous resources in the shape of party patronage. Patronage was necessary to party organization, and party organization was necessary if victory was to be had at the polls. There were in the employment of the government in New York city many democrats who were appointed by the last administration. Their places ought to be filled by republicans. The sight of democrats holding office under a republican administration was repugnant to old-time republicans, who believed that victory should carry with it all the spoils consistent with good government. While the delegation believed in the civil service law (everybody looked solemn at this juncture), there were many places which this law did not cover, and these were the ones the republicans coveted.

The interview came to an end at last, and the delegation marched from the White House to the treasury department, Secretary Foster had been apprised of its coming and was "in." For fifteen minutes he listened to the tale of woe. However much he may have sympathized with the object of the visit, he was exceedingly circumspect, and no man in the party could say afterward that he had promised to do anything definite. "He talked about the outlook for the party, and even discussed the subjects of turning the democrats out, but he didn't say positively that anything would be done," said the republican quoted above. "He promised to talk the matter over with the President, and we had to be content with this." The delegation went back to the Arlington, and spent the remainder of the day there comparing notes. Theodore Roosevelt, of the civil service commission, is the man whose scalp they deem necessary to the furtherance of their plan. Nothing about Mr. Roosevelt was said to the President or to Secretary Foster, but some very broad hints were let fall. On this subject one of the delegation, who has exercised a controlling voice in its movements, said to-night:

"Mr. Roosevelt alone stands in the way of republican occupancy of the offices we have come to Washington to see about. The civil service commissioners, it is well known, have the power to make many rules which can be used to the detriment of the party in power if they so elect. Mr. Harrison could meet all our demands and strengthen himself with the party if he would remove Roosevelt and put in a man who would be willing to change the rules to suit the occasion. These are plain words, but they express our feelings exactly. Mr. Harrison needs only to look between the lines of our argument to-day to recognize our position as regards the civil service commission. If he does this, and acts as we would like to have him do, he will be more favorably regarded by the members of the party at large."

The republican who made this utterance was certainly in earnest, and there can be no question that he stands high in the ranks of the New York City members of the party. Perhaps the President did not "look between the lines." If not, this will be sufficient notice to him to do so.

The offices which the delegation is after are greater in number than the general public imagines. To begin with, Mr. Patterson wants to be one of the commissioners provided for in the law controlling the construction of the new custom house in New York. There are five of these commissioners to be appointed by the secretary of the treasury, and they are to superintend the construction of the proposed new building. They are to be known as United States building commissioners and are to receive "a fair and reasonable compensation," to be fixed by the secretary. Ex-governor McCormick of Arizona, now of Long Island, is another candidate for one of these commissionerships. There are many chief clerkships at $2,500 a year, which the republicans regard with covetous eyes. These are now filled by democrats who are protected by the civil service law. It is claimed that they were placed on the classified list of the service some time before Mr. Cleveland retired from the presidency. Other places which are demanded are those of the paymaster, the superintendent of weighers, superintendent of laborers in the public stores, and superintendent of warehouses. Then there are any number of deputy collectorships which the democrats now hold, carrying salaries which would handsomely support republican families. Many of the "hold-overs," it is said by the delegation to-night, are not protected by the civil service rules and might just as well be put out to make room for republicans and thus strengthen the hands of the administration. The leaders of the delegation professed to feel confident after their visits to the President and secretary of the treasury, that their mission would prove successful. Barney Biglin said he believed that the administration was disposed to do "what was right," and he believed that in good time the rank and file would have no cause to complain of its action in regard to the offices at its disposal. He expressed the opinion that the republicans would win in New York state and the nation next fall. "You may say for me that I believe that Mr. Harrison will be the republican nominee, and that he will be elected."—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, February 5.

Ex-United States Marshall Louis F. Payn left here for New York this afternoon sore in spirit. He had come to Washington full of hope that he might carry away with him the fat contract he has been seeking for several months for his brother-in-law, Edward S. Mellen, for labor at the public stores in New York City. He had the indorsement of Thomas C. Platt, and Senator Hiscock had promised to aid him. Mr. Payn was duly introduced to Secretary Foster, and his plea and that of the big man from Syracuse were received. Then Mr. Foster refused to give him the contract. The refusal was so plainly the result of long consideration that Mr. Payn did not tarry in the presence of the Secretary. * * *

All the New York republican patronage seekers, with the exception of Jacob M. Patterson and Bernard Biglin, left Washington for home this afternoon. These two gentlemen remain to see if they can not carry back with them the promise of Secretary Foster to make Patterson one of the five commissioners to supervise the erection of the new custom house and the appraisers' stores. They called upon Mr. Foster again this afternoon and pressed the claim to the best of their ability. If they get away with their personal baggage they will do well. The district leaders expressed themselves as not any too well satisfied with the outlook for more patronage when they departed.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 6.

I do lift up a hearty prayer that we may never have a President who will not either pursue and compel his cabinet advisers to pursue the civil service policy pure and simple and upon a just basis, allowing men accused to be heard, and deciding against them only upon competent proof and fairly—either have that kind of a civil service, or for God's sake let us have that other frank and bold, if brutal, method of turning men and women out simply for political opinion. Let us have one or the other. They will not mingle. * * * —Senator Benjamin Harrison, 1886.

There is much excitement in political circles here. Some days ago, Signal Officer B. H. Bronson, who has been stationed at Charlotte for a number of years, and has always been non-partisan, received a letter from the war department charging him with being a partisan, and with affiliating with democrats. Bronson wrote the department, demanding its informant. To-day he received a letter in reply, refusing to give the author of the charges and saying that to do so would implicate the republican party.—Charlotte, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, June 7, 1891.

Gen. C. J. Langdon, Elmira, N. Y.:

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 19th inst., is just received. I had already examined with some care the papers on file in the postmaster general's office relating to the Elmira postmastership, which were forwarded to the committee on post-offices and post-roads at the request of the chairman of the committee.

The charges against Dr. Flood, and upon which it is pretended his removal was based, are of the most trifling character, and are wholly unsupported by any evidence in corroboration of them. If charges of a similar character were made by any individual in some matter not affecting the government of the United States, they would not stand a moment's scrutiny. They deal only in vile innuendo, and would not bear the light of the most superficial investigation. They were sufficient for the postmaster general of the United States; they would not be sufficient for any fair man.

The inspectors, and there were two of them, commenced their work as early as May last, although Dr. Flood's final removal was not requested until December 9th. The result of their efforts was as follows:

They discovered an apparent shortage of $39, which upon explanation is shown to be no shortage at all.

The statement by two letter carriers that when some question was coming up as to voting a twenty thousand-dollar loan, and upon one other occasion, Dr. Flood asked the carriers to canvass their routes.

That he belongs to a corrupt political ring.

The statement by another physician that on one occasion—date not given—the doctor was about to amputate a limb without first applying tourniquet, thereby endangering the patient's life, and that his assistant interfered to prevent it.

That the doctor belonged to a social club, where there was some drinking, and that it was "suspected" he was gambling.

The course pursued in the removal of Dr. Flood is in exact accordance with the methods of the post-office department, as they have been elsewhere exemplified. Every good citizen familiar with the management of the office deplors them, but they are chargeable to the official who sanctions them, and not to the political party to which the official belongs. The republican party is not to be measured by the conduct of its postmaster general; if it was, it would be in a bad way indeed.

I understand the removal of Dr. Flood is an incident to a factional fight in the county in which Elmira is situated. If the true reason had been given for Dr. Flood's removal there might be justification for it, inasmuch as the office is not, as it should be, under civil service regulations. There are no charges against the character of Mr. Rathbun, who is named as Dr. Flood's successor, and it may be our duty in such case not to inquire further than as to the fitness of the new appointee. Without, therefore, touching the question of Mr. Rathbun's confirmation, I cordially join with you in your expression of disgust at the unworthy methods employed to effect Dr. Flood's removal. With regards, yours very truly. EDWARD O. WOLCOTT.

Washington, January 21.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

John A. Bell testified as follows:

Q. (Mr. Roosevelt.) What is your position in the office? A. I am dispatcher here.

Q. How long have you been in the service? A. I came in the office, I think, this month a year ago.

Q. What ward do you live in? A. I live in the seventh ward.

Q. Are you a member of the republican club in that ward? A. Yes, sir; I am a member of the seventh ward club.

* * *

Q. Mr. Bell, do you know of any collection of money for use in the primaries on next Monday? A. Well, I don't know particularly about what the money is to be used for. I know that Mr. Gladfelter handed me some money to hand to the treasurer of the organization the other day.

Q. He gave you five dollars, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir; he handed me a five-dollar note.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. Well, I couldn't say positively the night, but it was one night this present week; two or three nights ago.

Q. Was it down-stairs in the basement? A. Well, I couldn't positively tell you where it was he handed it to me. I am generally very busy, you know.

Q. But it was in this building somewhere? A. It was around the building somewhere; yes, sir.

* * *

Q. You have not, then, contributed? A. I haven't given him a cent.

Q. Have you contributed through anyone? A. No, sir; not a cent.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

VOL. I, No. 37.

INDIANAPOLIS, MARCH, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

WITH this number the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE enters upon its fourth year, the first number having been published in the first month of Harrison's administration. The volume will cover the four years of that administration, that being deemed the most fitting arrangement considering the purposes of the paper. That period will cover the time it was originally intended to continue the publication. It may be said that the CHRONICLE has met with an appreciation from leading men in all sections of the country which is an ample reward for the steady and extended labor which has been freely given for three years.

WE have received from a professor of Cornell University a note, not for publication, protesting that our criticism of Professor Collin last month for his advocacy of Hill and Hillism shows a lack of appreciation of the fact that Cornell professors hold their positions, and would only hold them, with the understanding that they are to have the utmost latitude of expression of opinion. We so understood it and should regard any other holding as a sacrifice of manliness. The right to the freest expression of opinion however is well defined and limited. It does not, for instance, embrace the right of advocating the establishment of more gambling houses in Ithaca. There is nowhere any pretense of denying that securing a democratic majority in the New York senate was Hill's work; it is this of which his friends are the proudest. A few years ago we had a returning board in session at Indianapolis. Under the lead of Simeon Coy, a local politician, a conspiracy was formed and carried out to the extent that the figures of a number of the returns were erased and other figures substituted with a view to giving candidates of Coy's party a majority which the people had not given them. For their part in this conspiracy Coy and the chairman of the board were sent to prison. Now, we challenged last month and we challenge again any one to show that the Hill conspiracy by which his party got control of the New York senate differs in any essential criminal element from Coy's conspiracy. Are we to understand that a professor of Indiana University would be within the limits of the utmost latitude of expression of opinion were he to become a public champion of Coy? Clearly not, and neither is Professor Collin within such limit.

Since the foregoing was written we have received the following extract from the Cornell Daily Sun of February 17, quoting from an address of Professor Collin before the History and Political Science Association on the "Machine in Politics":

"It is the duty of every true citizen who has any spark of patriotism about him to assist the machine in one way or another. No one should feel himself above the work of political fighting. The man who sells his vote for money is more to be respected than the man who stays away from the polls and does not vote."

We commend the last statement to the notice of our readers with the remark that it seems powerful cumulative evidence of fundamental unbalance. We repeat again, that parents will not desire their boys to be in the path of such notions of citizenship. The political ethics of the Hills and Quays will not long be tolerated in the teaching of any university.

THE Indianapolis Journal divides its time between a silly adulation of President Harrison and declarations that independence in politics is disappearing. In the meantime with ceaseless industry it works its notary seal in London to the tune of forty or fifty thousand dollars a year. This is the unseen but perfectly well-known rudder that guides its course and makes it an object of goodnatured pity. President Harrison is not helped by its adulation, and independence in politics was never so great and growing as it is to-day, and it is nowhere more flourishing than in the Journal's own city. Parties at present are small minorities composing the party machines in each community. These machines have no object in the world except to quarter their members upon the people. Let each citizen look around him and see if this is not so. Blind adherence to a party leads to the Quay grip upon Pennsylvania and the Tammany grip upon New York. It is the duty of every citizen to look with cold-blooded indifference upon mere party success, and this duty is now being performed as it never was before. Party machines can and do control nominations, but the voters have absolute control of the elections.

THE late Oscar C. McCulloch was an example to the clergy. He saw that blind adhesion to a party was the way not to secure good government. He recognized that to keep civil government advancing, great reforms are always necessary. He knew the stupendous corruption of the spoils system and he was its uncompromising enemy. In every election he made his vote count with complete indifference to mere party success. He was a leader of the people. How this course does contrast with the course of a large number of his brother ministers who occupy comfortable pulpits and consider their duty done when they have preached their creed. They are but dilettante citizens and always break down in a crisis. They then take their cue from the politicians of their party and labor heavily to make the worse appear the better matter.

ONE of the curious phases of politics is the attitude of the democrats towards Hill. It is true that one of them shows a complete grasp of his character by the remark that Hill can not break into the White House with a jimmy, and there are doubtless others of equal moral courage, but they are exceptions. All the corrupt elements of the democratic party are for Hill. A large majority of the rest are against him, and this majority is now struggling apparently helpless in the hands of the Hill machine. Its protest in New York may be taken as a fair example. Naturally we should expect to see the acts by which a bogus majority was secured in the New York senate, brought by these protestants with minute detail to the notice of every democrat in the state, with indignant insistence, that the party should make an outcast of the man who, if the boasts of his friends are true, is fit for the penitentiary. A statement of the facts of Hill's "splendid services to his party" ends the argument, and those democrats who should make it would command the respect of the country. Instead they are making a great noise because Hill had a state convention held in February. There is no indication that their conscience is roused because a state government has been stolen or that they do not mean to vote for Hill if his machine rides them down. Frederick R. Coudert and Everett P. Wheeler, and their associates, have the appearance of being indifferent to acts that are subversive of free government.

As the readers of the CHRONICLE know there are yet left in Pennsylvania some men not deadened to the duties of citizenship, who, sacrificing personal ease, financial profit and other worldly perquisites, are struggling to free themselves and other fellow-citizens from Quay's dictatorship. There are signs that they are making headway, for there has lately appeared an occasional press report with the startling charge purporting to be written by Clarkson, but said to be written by Quay's late private secretary, now in Clarkson's employ, that all these charges against Quay emanate from a conspiracy of Tammany to ruin him. A few days later the story becomes more lurid with the further detail that Tammany threatened to kill Quay. This is pretty slippery ground on which to hope to stem the rising tide against Quay; yet it will avail somewhat. His henchmen will with forced soberness applaud him as a hero, and a class of very ignorant, or very bigoted republicans, will grasp this as an excuse for casting another ignorant and bigoted vote. Quay as a martyr is a grotesque spectacle.

It will be remembered that Eugene Higgins cut some figure during Mr. Cleveland's administration. Of late years he has lived the best he could on Maryland spoil, but he seems embittered and reckless. He says:

"Civil service reform is a fiasco. It is one of the greatest outrages that was ever perpetrated on a too-confiding public. Let me give you an example: When I was a clerk in the treasury department (you remember mine was the first appointment Mr. Cleveland made), one of the positions of watchman in the building became vacant. There were two candidates for the position, one a sturdy young fellow of twenty-two and the other a consumptive school teacher. The young man was the son of a western farmer who had been one of the most useful supporters of the democratic party in his section of the country. There was a civil service examination, and the school teacher got the place and its salary of $1,800, while the young fellow, who needed the money to support his father in his old age, did not get the position. Do you think that was right? Well that occurs every day. I am down on civil service reform, and I do not care who knows it."

The difficulty with Higgins's story is that watchmen in the treasury are not and never were paid $1,800 a year, and they are not and never were examined.

WE ask the readers of this paper to examine the work of Tammany for one month; note the manifold directions of its activity, and consider how monstrous is its power for evil. New York is most vitally concerned to cut herself out from this mesh of wickedness, and so also is the whole country. Tammany's last exploit was the arrest of Mr. Godkin, of the Evening Post. He has the supreme satisfaction of knowing that he has got through Tamman's thick hide at last.

President Morrison, of the health board, was seen by a Journal reporter and said:

"About Sept. 24 the Price Baking Powder Company wrote me asking for a full analysis of their baking powder, and offering to pay all the expenses connected therewith. I answered, saying that if they wanted a full private analysis of their powder they would have to make a private contract with chemist Latz, if they desired to make such analysis. I then wrote Latz a note, inclosing the note of the Price company to me. In my note to Latz I stated that if he entered into any agreement with the baking powder company I would request that he make his fees reasonable, as we did not wish to be placed in the position of driving any concern into the position of making an expensive analysis by a man who was acting for the health board and at the same time doing private work. This was suggested by a remark made to me by Mr. Harry Gates to the effect that he had been compelled to pay a good round sum in excess of a fair charge to Mr. Latz for a re-examination of his powder, and that such examination has done him no good whatever.

"When the result of the various analyses came in the ordinary qualitative analysis of various brands was followed by a complete quantitative analysis of the Price powder, together with a puff of the same. This latter was neither desired nor tolerated by the board, and all of that part of the report was suppressed. The board fully recognizes the right of Dr. Latz to take private contracts, but is fully determined that the results of such private analyses shall not be embodied in its public report."

Dr. Martin, of the Indiana Chemical Company, which employs Latz, through whom it is understood that the latter was employed to analyze the Price baking powder, was also seen. He was very surly at first and professed to be in entire ignorance of Mr. Latz's business, but he finally softened a little, and admitted that he knew of the correspondence, though declining to say anything about it on the plea that it would not be fair to the health board, which had suppressed the Price analysis. All attempts to see chemist Latz proved futile.

John Maloney, an attendant at the central hospital for the insane, visited Wachstetter Bros.' saloon, 154 West Washington street, Thursday afternoon. He had twelve dollars, and very soon began spending it freely at the bar, repeatedly paying for drinks for strangers in the room. Among other things he did was to buy one dollar's worth of beef steak at a butcher shop and distribute it among several loafers in the saloon. His money was soon exhausted, and later in the evening he caused the arrest of the Wachstetters, charging them with robbing him. Judge Buskirk continued their hearing yesterday morning. -

Dr. J. E. Curtis, of the Central Insane Hospital, does not deny that he charged the attorneys who applied for a certificate of the death of Charles Fisher a fee of $10 therefor, but says he had a right to make the charge, since this is a service which he is not required to render in his official capacity. He is very anxious for an investigation.

One day, about six weeks ago, a News reporter was in Coroner Manker's office when his deputy, Isaac Dunn, was taking the statement of M. R. Mansfield in an inquest. Mr. Mansfield is a railway conductor, and his train on the Vandalia struck an escaped inmate of the Insane Hospital and killed him. It was in the inquest of this case that he was called to testify. When he had concluded his testimony and signed the written statement, Dunn said: "I suppose you want your fee?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Mansfield, "if there is anything coming to me. I went to Terre Haute the other day and got nothing for my long ride."

"Well, here," said Dunn, tossing out two quarters. "I guess I'd better pony up. Put your John Hancock on this please," indicating a small piece of paper bearing a dozen or more names.

Mr. Mansfield signed his name, took the fifty cents and left, remarking that he had made the cigars off his visit.

The next day the News reporter called upon Mansfield at his home upon Bellefontaine street, and asked him if he knew what witness fee he was entitled to?"

"No, I do not," he replied, "I suppose fifty cents was all I was entitled to. That is all I got."

"Mr. Dunn didn't tell you that you were entitled to seventy-five cents, did he?"

"No, sir, he did not. I've never had any experience in court, and didn't know whether I was entitled to any fee or not. My brake man, B. E. Reynolds, only got the same as myself."

Saturday afternoon Dunn filed his bill for witness fees, together with his personal bill and Coroner Manker's bill, with the county commissioners. The fee bill was passed, and when passed Dunn receipted for sixty-eight witness fees, among them those of Mansfield and Reynolds. The warrants which he received were for seventy-five cents each. On June 6 he receipted for fifty-nine witness fees.

This morning the county commissioners considered Coroner Manker's bill, which for July was $469.20. The coroner is allowed $10 per day for the first day of an inquest, and $2.50 for each succeeding day. The commissioners reduced the bill to $400. Dunn's bill as clerk was $93, but the commissioners cut it to $81.

Deputy Dunn returned this afternoon, and gives this explanation: "Fees are payable at the county auditor's office between the 10th and the 15th of each month. I tell witnesses that they are entitled to seventy-five cents. If they want cash I sometimes offer them fifty cents, and they are often glad to accept, rather than return or wait. This statement I made to Mr. Mansfield, and if he says to the contrary I am sure he must be mistaken. I frequently, as a matter of accommodation, pay the full fee. The utmost there is in it as a matter of speculation is eight or ten dollars."

The county commissioners yesterday considered the bill of Dr. Manker, coroner, for the month of November. It aggregated $420 for ninety-three days' work. It struck the board as singular that so many days could be crowded into one month, and a reduction of $90, leaving the amount $330, was made in the bill, after which it was allowed. This gives the coroner fifty-three days' service, which, while it may be within the meaning of the statute regulating coronial fees, still distends a month of time.

A. G. Smith held up his right hand this morning and made oath to support the constitution of the United States and of Indiana during his term of service as attorney general. "I have appointed Leon Bailey to be my deputy because he is a warm personal friend, and because his experience especially fits him for the duties of the position," said Mr. Smith to The News to-day. "The duties of the place are not so heavy but that Mr. Bailey can have time to attend to the work of the city attorneyship, to which he has been elected. The salary of the deputy attorney general is $2,000 per year. I have not yet determined whom I shall appoint to the clerkship in my office; probably no one for some time." Thus Mr. Bailey will be city attorney and deputy attorney general, and from the two offices will draw the comfortable combined salaries and fees, amounting to about $5,000.

The appointment of the above officers is to take effect January 1, thus, for the first time, making the terms uniform. The appointment of a night watchman was left open. There are so many candidates, and the pull to reappoint Eden is so strong, that some trouble in agreement turned up. Commissioner Hunter is for Eden, but Commissioner Farrell is dead set against him. Commissioner Stout was therefore made to feel the brunt of the pressure, but he would not commit himself. The boiler-makers of the city are pressing James Sullivan, one of their number, for the place. He is known as a faithful democrat, whose usefulness in his trade has become impaired by age. He has an invalid wife and six children. These facts are set forth in his behalf, but it is not believed Eden will be beaten. Albert Sahm is said to be for him, and so is Tom Taggart, but he denies having any interest in the matter. But the auditor's office is the only one which Eden is free to enter. The rest are all closed to him by order of the head officials. The matter may be settled this morning.

It leaked out to-day that a week ago last Saturday Thomas Lyons, a prisoner sentenced to the penitentiary for two years, escaped from the deputy sheriff who had him in charge between this city and the penitentiary, and has not since been heard from. And Lyons is a one-legged man too.

The sheriff's office had arranged to keep this escape a secret, and but for the brakeman on the train from which the prisoner escaped the attempt at secrecy would probably have been successful. This morning a News reporter surprised the deputies in the sheriff's office by unfolding the facts to them. The brakeman's story is that at Guernsey, just this side of Monon, the prisoner, who was sitting on the front seat, while the deputy sheriff was in the rear of the car, got up and jumped off the train and disappeared. At Monon the deputy got off and took the return train to Indianapolis. The brakeman said the deputy told him that he was to have left Indianapolis with the prisoner on the noon train, but he and the prisoner had "lashed up" and had missed the train. The brakeman said the train was scarcely moving when the prisoner escaped, and that the deputy made no effort to get off and capture the prisoner. "Yes, a man did escape," said Chief Deputy Corbaley. "The person's name was Thomas Lyons, who had been sent up two years for burglary. It is also true that he is a one-legged man. The person from whom he escaped is John A. Anderson, a bar-tender. Anderson came back here and reported that the train was running twenty-five miles an hour. His story does not agree at all with the one told by the brakeman."

Anderson, it seems, did not get back here until Monday, and by that time the prisoner might have been in Halifax, unless he thought it safer to be very near bar-keeper Anderson. A good many persons will want to know why the sheriff has been allowing bar-tenders and other irresponsible (officials) men to take convicts to prison—or rather to let them go free. The administration under the present sheriff has been one series of disgraces, and this is the crowning one. Prisoners run away from the jailors, the jail is kept in a lousy, foul condition, the sheriff himself figures in disgusting episodes and finally allows a bar-keeper to balk justice in the way described. And it is even true that this same sheriff has the audacity to ask a renomination.

There is dissatisfaction over the commissioners' appointments at the court house. It is charged that Mr. "Billy" Eden, who has been reappointed night watchman at the court house, does not attend to his duty. It is said that there are many nights in every month when he is not around the building at all. This week he took a prisoner to Michigan City, and he often goes out of the city and is gone several days. Fifty dollars per month is allowed for this service, and democrats say a man could be employed who would give the valuable court records protection and all of his time.

* * *

There is likelihood of another bet getting into court. The trouble comes about this way: John Woodard, who was recently released from the penitentiary, went to Sheriff King the other day and asked permission to escort a prisoner to Michigan City. The sheriff, knowing his face but not remembering his record, wrote him an order to Turnkey Emmett, telling Emmett to let him (Woodard) escort a prisoner to the penitentiary. Woodard put the order in his pocket, and said something to his friends about the trip he was going to make.

Joe Littler didn't believe Woodard had an order from King, and offered to bet Woodard that he wouldn't take the prisoner up. The bet was made, $35 on a side being put up. After the money had been put in the hands of a stake-holder, Woodard presented his order to Turnkey Emmett, who, knowing him, refused to recognize the order, and tore it up. Woodard now wants his money back, and says he will bring suit before 'Squire Feibleman to replevin it.

The board of trustees and superintendent of the southern Indiana hospital submitted their report to the governor yesterday.

The water supply was entirely inadequate. To remedy this deficiency, wells were dug which now furnish 300,000 gallons a day. The cost of this water plant was $7,500. To provide against fire, and for use in the boilers, a lake was excavated covering an acre of ground and fully four feet in depth. A contract was let for the construction of a sewer to Pigeon creek, but this necessary work was stopped by the auditor's action in refusing the funds to carry on the work.

"Is Dr. Metcalf in?"

"No, sir," came the reply of a female clerk in the office of the state board of health this morning.

"When will he be in?"

"Well, that is hard to say. He ought to be down to tend to the mail pretty soon."

This was after 10 o'clock.

"How long has it been since he has been at the office?"

"He was here yesterday afternoon and a while in the morning, but his practice often keeps him away?"

The reporter turned from the door of the handsome quarters furnished by the state for the secretary to tend to his business in, and walked over to the city dispensary, where he found a young man taking a patient's name and residence in a quarto record book.

"Is Dr. Metcalf in?"

"No, sir," answered the young man.

"When will he be in?"

"It's hard to say about that."

"Who is in charge of the dispensary during his absence?"

"I am, sir."

"How often is Dr. Metcalf here?"

"Oh, he manages to drop in a few minutes every morning and afternoon."

Reporters are not the only ones who ask such questions. Visitors and those having business at both the state health office and the city dispensary ask those questions and get the same answers. As secretary of the state board of health Dr. C. N. Metcalf gets $1,500 per year, and as superintendent of the city dispensary he gets $70 per month. So far as public observation goes, he doesn't give proper attention to the office, and probably if the city health board had the authority it would accomplish his disconnection with the city dispensary in a jiffy. Metcalf seems to be responsible to no one for his management of the health office's affairs. The two offices he holds have been reduced to a minimum of usefulness from sheer want of direction. It is highly discreditable that these offices should be at the mercy of peanut politics. Metcalf can not be interfered with by the health board until his term expires. His deputy, Dr. Berg, at the state board, is almost as infrequently seen as is his superior.

Three weeks ago the daughter of John O'Mara died from a malignant attack of diphtheria. Contrary to the law Mr. O'Mara allowed the funeral service to be held thirty-six instead of eighteen hours after death, and had them publicly instead of privately. The board of health held a special meeting on the case, and decided to prosecute O'Mara. The matter was reconsidered, however, and nothing was done beyond quarantining the children of four families who attended the services. Last Friday Mr. O'Mara was appointed sanitary officer by the new democratic board of health to succeed Leonard Crane.

Are councilmen and other city officers violating laws? Some of them are employes of corporations doing business with the city. Others have for years done business at their shops with corporations so profitably that they could not afford to "break" with them by voting against anything the corporations demanded.

Perhaps some things can be explained. Last night Mr. Davis, who is chairman of the committee on public property, presented two bills for expenses at Garfield Park. One was for about $450 for fencing, and the other for $50 worth of supplies furnished by the South Side Foundry. This foundry is owned and managed by Thomas Markey, who is a member of the city council.

"FREE AND UNPURCHASED SUPPORT."

"No officer should be required or permitted to take part in the arrangement of political organizations, caucuses, conventions, or election campaigns. Their right to vote and to express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessment for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed."—President Hayes, June 22, 1877.

When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of office-holders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for re-election a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate and intelligent political action which must characterize a government by the people.—[Letter of Acceptance, 1884, Grover Cleveland.]

I am an advocate of civil service reform. My brief experience at Washington has led me to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens. * * *—[Senator Benjamin Harrison.]

—The new secretary of the republican central committee is a mail carrier. Does this indicate that the postoffice is to be made republican headquarters? We do not believe that a person in the government service should occupy such a position.—Logansport Pharos, February 26.

—At the republican state committee meeting the P. M.'s were on hand in force. There was P. M. Thompson of this city, P. M. Higgins of Fort Wayne, P. M. Greiner of Terre Haute, P. M. Godfrey of New Albany, P. M. Ellis of Muncie, P. M. Crockett of South Bend, P. M. Bennett of Warsaw, P. M. Byerly of Goshen, P. M. B. Wilson Smith of La Fayette, P. M. Fearis of Union, P. M. Hendricks of Greensburgh, O. M. Tichner of Princeton, and so on ad infinitum.

After all the other federal officers had crowded into the room, including District Attorney Chambers, Assistant Cockrum, Marshal Dunlap, Collector of Internal Revenue Cravens, Deputy Collector Harvey and Pension Agent Ensley, the creatures of the noble army of P. M.'s, the members of the committee were graciously allowed to crowd in and occupy seats, while they were being instructed as to their duties, when as a mere matter of form they should meet in executive session later on in the afternoon.

"You might have heaved a brick into that conference and never missed an office-holder," said a disgusted Blaine man in the Denison office yesterday afternoon. Those who didn't have offices had relatives in office. Of this class were J. A. Coutts, of the Kokomo Tribune, whose father is postmaster at Andrews, and J. W. Hess of this city, whose son Herbert has a fat seat in the departments at Washington.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 29.

—The tenth congressional republican convention was held here to-day to elect a member of the state central committee. The list of office-holders in attendance were two national bank examiners, fifteen postmasters, a pension agent or two and mail carriers innumerable. Ex-Congressman Demotte, the postmaster at Valparaiso, and his son-in-law, who is a post-office inspector, labored hard to secure an indorsement of Harrison's administration.—Logansport Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, January 21.

—The republicans of the eleventh congressional district held their convention in this city to-day to elect a member of the state central committee. Resolutions were reported by a committee, of which Warren G. Sayre [Indian land commissioner] was chairman, warmly indorsing the administration.—Wabash Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, January 21.

—The republicans of the second congressional district met in mass convention here to-day for the purpose of selecting a member of the state central committee. Smiley N. Chambers of Indianapolis [United States District Attorney] made several fiery speeches.—Shoals Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, January 21.

—The committee on permanent organization, through W. Wilson, of Warrick county, reported that Warren G. Sayre (Indian land commissioner) of Wabash, had been chosen by the committee for permanent chairman. Mr. Sayre, upon taking the chair, spoke at some length. He said that he believed the prospect of the republican party continuing in power was never brighter. This was so because the party deserved it. It was a party of progress. He said he had a suspicion that this convention was fairly friendly to the President of the United States, Benjamin Harrison. The President's Bible the last three years, had been the platform put out by the convention of four years ago. Mr. Sayre said many pleasant things about the President, and was frequently applauded. As Mr. Sayre is an appointee under President Harrison, there were some smiles when he alluded to the high grade of the appointments. On the call of the roll the Third district, through Marcus L. Sulzer, of Madison, placed in nomination Newland T. DePauw, of New Albany. Although Mr. Sulzer a short time ago was opposing the administration, he talked out plainly for Harrison as the only man the republicans could afford to nominate for President. A few months ago Mr. Sulzer was appointed to a special Indian agency.

After the resolutions had been read ex-Congressman White took exception to the resolution endorsing Harrison. * * At this point Captain White's voice was drowned in hisses. J. B. Cheadle came to Captain White's assistance, and told the convention that Captain White was a republican who four years ago received 1,400 more votes than Mr. Harrison. Captain White then proceeded amid hisses.

"What has President Harrison done?" asked Mr. White.

"Everything!" shouted the convention.

Attempt after attempt was made to drown Captain White's voice, but he went on. * * Ed Conway arose in the midst of the uproar and asked that Captain White be allowed to go on. "Let him run down," said Mr. Conway. "A republican who is against Harrison is a novelty, and I move we hear him through."

Order was finally restored, and Captain White went on. * *

At this point Assistant District Attorney J. B. Cockrum got the floor, and insisted that this was a republican convention, and not a place where a man could come loaded with personal bile and spit it out.—Indianapolis News, March 1.

—Mr. R. T. McDonald, of Fort Wayne defeated candidate for delegate to the republican national convention, has appealed to the chairman of the national republican committee for a new deal. His appeal, addressed to Hon. J. S. Clarkson, is as follows:

"The convention to elect delegates to the national convention held in this congressional district yesterday, was without jurisdiction on account of unfair apportionment. The delegates declared elected did not have a majority of the votes of the convention. The whole proceedings were dominated by a tyrannical office-holders' machine. I propose to test the validity of the election of the delegates and the validity of the convention.—Indianapolis Journal, March.

—The arraignment of the democracy by Smiley N. Chambers, United States District Attorney, in his speech before the Columbian Club, Saturday night, was such a powerful philippic that the Journal this morning prints it almost in full. Mr. Chambers said:—Indianapolis Journal, March 21.

THE MOUTH.

Charles J. Bonaparte writes of Political Corruption in Maryland in the March Forum.

The North American Review follows its article on Tammany by Boss Croker by another written by Dorman B. Eaton.

The eighth annual report of civil service commissioners of Massachusetts has been issued. For the thousandth time the facts show that competitive tests favor those with the common-school education. Of those examined, 1,084 passed the requirements and were placed on the eligible lists. Of these, 1,055 have had a common-school education only, and 29 have attended college. Also the average age of those who passed was 37.28, and of those who failed 35.34. Again we commend to the Indianapolis Board of Public Safety the labor service of Boston.

Rev. W. H. Kaufman, Milbank, S. Dak., would like the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for October, 1889, to complete his file.

A MOUTH OF TAMMANY.

Curious and unusual things are being done these days by the democrats who operate under the orders of the Albany Regency. The legislature, in providing for the enumeration, authorized Secretary of the State Rice to appoint one enumerator for each election district, and it was naturally supposed that the secretary would at least make a show of appointing them himself. So far as this city is concerned, however, he has adopted a very curious course. He has notified Tammany Hall, through Richard Croker, that the Tammany organization should send the names of 887 enumerators to him before Feb. 1, in other words, he authorizes Tammany to dispose of that many appointments, 887 being the number of election districts in this city. The Tammany committee of twenty-four met yesterday afternoon, and the acting secretary, John C. Sheehan, read Mr. Rice's letter. Each leader was then authorized to send the names of the enumerators for each election district in their several assembly districts in to the committee's secretary as soon as possible. Richard Croker advised the leaders to leave the selection of the men to the captains of the election districts, and he suggested that each captain select a man thoroughly acquainted with his election district to make the enumeration. The enumerators can easily be made useful for political purposes.—New York Times, Jan. 20

Frank A. Lewis, assistant superintendent of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, and Justice Divver are anxious to know who gave information to the gamblers at 522 Sixth avenue and thus spoiled the raid that was made on that place Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 12, 1892. Mr. Lewis had suspected for some time that gambling was going on at this place. He visited it and found the room crowded with men and boys, who were gambling. Then he went before Justice Divver at the Jefferson market police court and obtained a warrant. It was decided to serve the warrant at 4:30 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, as the place was generally crowded at that time. When Sergt. Coombs and six policemen reached the place they found no one there but a man who was industriously writing in the express office in front of the gambling room. There was nothing to suggest that gambling had ever been carried on in the building. Mr. Lewis said it was a shame that a warrant could not be obtained without the person who was concerned getting information about it. Justice Divver said he could not understand it. He had made every effort to discover who had given out this information, but he had been unable to do so.—New York Times, Feb. 12.

[Patrick Divver, commonly called "Paddy," is the Tammany leader in the second assembly district. He is the keeper of a sailors' boarding house and is the proprietor or has interests in several liquor saloons. He is an ex-member of the board of aldermen, a race track frequenter, and the friend and confidant of gamblers. He is on terms of intimacy with "Johnny" Matthews and "Jake" Shipsey, two members of the sporting and gambling fraternity, whose particular methods of gaining a livelihood are unknown to the frequenters of Paddy Divvers' and other rum shops on Park Row, where they are generally to be found.—The "New Tammany" New York Evening Post.]

Mayor Grant's eagerness to punish the Staats-Zeitung for daring to oppose his candidacy for reelection is carrying him to extraordinary lengths. Not content with taking as a site for the new city building the property upon which the Staats-Zeitung building stands, the mayor declares his intention to ask the legislature to pass a law which will enable the city to take possession in a more speedy manner than would be possible under the usual condemnation proceedings. In other words, he means to force the newspaper to abandon possession of its property without any regard to its own interests or convenience. If such a law were passed, it would be an unspeakable outrage upon private rights. The Staats-Zeitung must be printed every day, and in order to move to new quarters it must have new presses built. The old ones can not be moved without stopping the publication of the paper. The conduct of the mayor and his Tammany associates in deciding to take the property is indefensible from every point of view. The site is not a desirable one for a city building, and it will be a great mistake to place it there. They are using their power as city authorities to erect a great municipal building upon a most unsuitable site, simply that they may "get even" with a newspaper which presumed to oppose their continuance in office.—New York Evening Post, February 24.

The democrats in the legislature apparently mean to do everything possible to convince the people that their party is unfit to be trusted with power. The senate yesterday passed the McCarren East River Bridge Bill, which gives a company the exclusive charter for the construction of two bridges between this city and Brooklyn, and the power to build a three mile elevated railroad on this side, neither bridges nor railroad to pay anything to either city, neither city to have any authority over bridges or railroad, and the foot-path on the bridge not to be free. Senator Brown declared that he had received from responsible men an offer of $500,000 for this charter, and that he would give $250,000 for it himself, and yet the senate insisted upon letting the company have it for nothing. Meanwhile the assembly was passing what is known as "The Huckleberry Road Bill," which provides for the consolidation of all the street car roads in the annexed district, gives the consolidated company a monopoly of the street railroads across the Harlem, releases it from all provisions of the present general law for the payment of percentages to the city, makes the city take care of the street between the car tracks, and in short, as the Sun correspondent says, "does everything that the promoters could ask, except to make the city lay their tracks and furnish them with cars and motive power."—New York Evening Post, February 25.

The latest "grab" of the Tammany-Hill combine at Albany is for the lower part of Fifth avenue, from Washington square to Forty-second street, for a street railway. The bill embodying it was introduced, in violation of the rules and by stealth, by a Hill member of the assembly from Ulster county. He took it to Mr. Hill's speaker of the assembly at the latter's house after the assembly had adjourned, and induced him to consent to an illegal way of getting it on the assembly files. Then the Hill speaker had it referred to the committee on cities, which has a Tammany chairman and a Tammany majority, instead of to the committee on railroads, to which it properly belonged. The chairman of the latter committee protested in vain. The Hill speaker insisted that the bill should go to the Tammany committee. That it contains a job, and a most outrageous one, nobody questions. The Hill-Tammany organs of this city, which are being severely tried just now, hasten to denounce it and to say it must not pass, but unless the Hill-Tammany combine shows more regard for public sentiment than it has shown thus far in its legislative conduct, the bill will follow in the wake of the bridge and elevated railway extension and "huckleberry" jobs, pass both houses, and go to the Governor.—New York Evening Post, February 27.

Attention has been directed lately to the very low voice of the reading clerk of the assembly at Albany, which renders it difficult for members to know what kind of bills or amendments are going through that body. When McCarren's amendment to the East River Bridge Bill was passed unanimously, or nearly so, it is stated that hardly anybody in the chamber knew what it was, the clerk's voice was so indistinct. This is quite explainable as the clerk himself is a lobbyist and the tool of Chairman Murphy. Last year a bill known as the McKnight Bill, changing the law regarding elevated railroad damage suits, was slipped through so adroitly that at least one hundred lawyers who were watching for elevated railroad bills were utterly deceived and never knew of the McKnight Bill till it had become a law.—New York Evening Post, Feb. 29.

When William F. Sheehan caused to be passed through the Legislature in one day a bill creating a commission that would appoint a superintendent of education of his own choosing to succeed James F. Crooker, the new superintendent of public instruction, it caused a strong protest from all classes and all parties not strictly of the Sheehan stripe. Politics was the only reason for the change, which was at first intended to meet the emergency of the recent vacancy. It worked so well, however, that it is understood another bill has been prepared placing the appointment of the superintendent for a full term in the hands of the commission, with the mayor left off.

This would give Sheehan control of the school department for at least four years. * * The mayor is to be left off the commission presumably because he has connected himself with the anti-Hill element of the party and is an active and effective worker in behalf of decent politics.—Buffalo Dispatch to New York Times, March 2.

* * *

The action of Mayor Grant in appointing police commissioner John R. Voorhis to a police justiceship and John C. Sheehan as police commissioner is pronounced by Tammany Hall men as "good politics." Voorhis's political career is a remarkable one, and he has, since 1873, been more or less of a power. In 1873 he was picked up, unknown, by Mayor Havemeyer and made an excise commissioner, and every mayor since has appointed him to one place or another. Voorhis's appointment is regarded as a fine political move. The appointment of Sheehan is said to be in the nature of a personal reward for good work done and a favor to Lieut.-Gov. Sheehan. The appointments are far-reaching and by the transfer of the two men already in office the Tammany organization accomplishes much and brings under its absolute control two departments where there are many places and much money to be expended. The placating of the New York democracy is said, however, to be the chief reason for Voorhis's appointment, and, furthermore, it removes the possibility of Voorhis as a mayoralty candidate next fall. The New York and "Voorhis" democracy cast about 20,000 votes in the last election, and should Mr. Voorhis be a candidate for mayor, these votes taken away from Tammany would place it in a position to be defeated. Whether the New York democracy will practically dissolve on account of the preferment of its leader is not yet certain. Mr. Voorhis's chief lieutenant, ex-Assemblyman John Martin, has been provided with a lucrative clerkship in the legislature, and this could not have been accomplished had it not been approved by the Tammany legislators. Police Justice Voorhis, however, says his party will live and grow. It has for several years been favorable to Tammany, not on the ground that it had nominated the best men, but that the members were all democrats. Recently Mr. Voorhis declined to go into an anti-Tammany combination with the Stecklers and others, and this did much towards securing his appointment. The appointment was offered to him three times, once previous to the election and twice since.—New York Evening Post, March 2.

* * *

Returning to a consideration of Voorhis, it is curious that on the very day of his appointment to be a police justice the World published a long interview with him in his capacity as president of the police board, in which he illustrates as naively as grimly, his native unfitness for the place. It was all about a policeman of the name of Gallagher, who committed the misdemeanor of brutally kicking and cuffing an aged woman who sells newspapers at the corner of Anu street and Broadway. For this he was hauled before a court and after trial and conviction was sentenced to the penitentiary on Blackwell's Island for a term of six months. But, strange to say, he remained, as this report said, a policeman in good standing of the city of New York, and his pay continued. The late president of the police board, now by the favor of Tammany made a police justice, was interviewed regarding these facts and is represented as having justified them, but we are informed that Gallagher has now been removed from the force for "absence from duty," the absence being caused by his imprisonment. As a sample of the commissioner's talk, take the following extracts:

"Would you let his conviction in a criminal court count against him?" asked the reporter.

"No," said the commissioner; "no, I do not think we should. There often have been cases where parties have been convicted and punished before police courts or juries where, in the opinion of the board, they have been convicted unjustly. We do not take the conclusion of a jury as to a man's innocence or guilt. We draw conclusions from the evidence put before us. Policeman Gallagher's trial has already taken place before us; but as a matter of justice to an accused officer we thought that for a reasonable time we would suspend the judgment of this board. * * *

"We do not consider the time before our judgment is a matter of life or death," added the Commissioner. "It is better to err on the side of the weak and the unfortunate than to take advantage of him in his deplorable situation.

"Weak—and—unfortunate!" gasped the reporter. "Mr. Voorhis, what about the old woman who was assaulted?"

"It would not make any difference to her," replied the commissioner, "whether he was on the Island a day longer or not. She has had, I suppose, her satisfaction. She is, from what I hear, inclined to be crazy."

"Crazy! Then is not that all the worse for the officer?"

"I did not say crazy," said Commissioner Voorhis. "She is a singular creature, from what I have been informed. I have never seen her. This case has been made a great deal of. Simply that this woman has been selling papers at one place for a great many years is something that I attach no importance to."

It does not seem to be necessary to add any comment to this man's exhibition of his notions of official duty and the revelation of his ideas of justice and humanity, except to say that there is every reason to believe they agree with the notions and ideas prevailing in Tammany.—New York Times, March 2.

A. R. Conkling made an able and convincing argument in the assembly to-day in support of his motion to reverse the unfavorable report of the judiciary committee on his bill to prohibit the payment of assessments or contributions to organizations or persons by candidates for judicial offices. The bill has been held in committee for six weeks, and all efforts to get a report upon it proved unavailing until to-day, although Mr. Conkling agreed to amend it so as to make its provisions less stringent and radical. In urging his motion to-day Mr. Conkling declared that the measure had the unqualified endorsement of the press, bar, and bench of the state, all of which viewed the reform as most necessary. No particular surprise was manifested when the assembly refused by a tie vote of 51 to 51, to reverse the committee's unfavorable report upon the bill. This vote sufficed to kill the measure, but Speaker Bush seemed to think it advisable to place himself on record against the proposition to put a stop to the auctioning off of judicial nominations that now so generally prevails, so he voted "no" along with the Tammany men.—New York Evening Post, March 7.

Mayor Grant to-day accepted the resignations of Inspectors H. B. Masterson and Michael Hahn of the bureau of weights and measures, who were charged with fraud and malfeasance in office. The charges were brought about a week ago, and Comptroller Myers began an investigation. He found that the charges were true, and so reported to the mayor yesterday afternoon. It appears that Masterson, who is a Tammany man, collected large fees and kept them, and turned in small ones. To make up a proper-looking amount he put in a large number of fictitious names. Hahn was recommended by the grocers' union. He collected sums for January and February, and when the charges were preferred last Wednesday Hahn came to the comptroller's office and turned in a larger amount than the sums which were sworn to. The acceptance of the resignations by the mayor was much criticised this morning.—New York Evening Post, March 9.

Police Justice William Watson is in trouble again. He made an alliance with Alderman Pickering not long ago, and induced the latter to introduce a resolution providing for a courtroom for him (Watson) in Bennett's Casino. But the democratic leaders, Adams and Suter, heard of it, and they frightened Pickering into withdrawing his proposed ordinance. They even induced a lot of ministers to protest against having a courtroom in such a place as this Casino, which would have been raided long ago if its owner had been devoid of a pull. Pickering is a weak vessel and he deserted Watson, so that the latter has no courtroom, and has to draw his $5,000 a year and do no work. This is objectionable to him, he says. The fact is that he hoped to build up a political following when he got a courtroom of his own, and Adams and Suter were afraid he would. New York Times, March 12.

It was pointed out in The Times a year ago that the men who were behind the bills appropriating money for the construction of new regimental armories in Brooklyn were engaged in nothing more nor less than a bunko game. They went to Albany and submitted their bills, arguing at the time that the money they asked for was absolutely all that would be needed. * * * Now the exposure has come, and every one appears to have been very much surprised at it. The report of the experts appointed to examine the condition of the new thirteenth regiment armory was expected, and every one knew that it was going to show that a great deal of money had been wasted, but no one thought it would disclose such a state of corruption as it did. These experts declare very positively that the building will cost $505,260 when it is finally completed instead of the $300,000 appropriated by the legislature. This is about 75 per cent. more than the original appropriation. If this course should be pursued in reference to all public constructions, the result would be beyond the wildest imagination. But there has been a scandal about this thirteenth regiment armory from the start. The first step in that direction was the selection of Rudolph L. Daus as architect. He is a young man with little experience, but he is a protegee of Hugh McLaughlin, and the latter's backing secured him this job, although Col. Austen and ex-Mayor Chapin were opposed to him and his plans. Up to the time of his selection only $146,000 had been spent on this project, and that went for a site. This left $300,000 for the building, and plans were invited on that basis. Those of Daus were accepted, although the members of the regiment did not like them at all, and ex-mayor Chapin tried very hard to have another set selected. The McLaughlin influence was too strong, however, and Daus triumphed. But when his specifications were published and bids called for it was found that the building could not be erected for less than $409,000, exclusive of the architect's commissions. Corporation Counsel Jenks decided, however, that the commission could not spend more than the appropriation—$300,000. Here was a chance to get rid of Daus and his plans, and ex-Mayor Chapin tried to have new plans put in, but again McLaughlin was able to force the commission to decide merely to strike out what they thought would be unnecessary and so reduce the cost. But the method of reducing the cost was a most peculiar one. "We understand," said the experts in their recent report, "that this method was knowingly adopted by the commission, yet it was to cut out features absolutely essential while adhering to a somewhat expensive exterior." For instance, these wise men cut down the drill-room to one-half its proper size, they put a wooden partition at the rear instead of a brick wall, and they decided to put no plaster at all on the walls of the drill-room or the Memorial Hall. They put a miserable little 150-horse power boiler in to heat the entire building, and made no provision whatever for heating the big drill-room. Yet they thought it necessary to select for that one boiler the most expensive they could find. But the most remarkable discovery made by these experts was in reference to what was not provided for at all in Daus's original plans and specifications. He had submitted his idea of what the armory building should be like, and that idea was adopted and contracts made for the erection of some sort of a building, and yet there was absolutely no provision made for sidewalks to surround that building or even for a fence or for iron slats to keep people from falling down the areaways. As the entire appropriation had been used up, where was the money to come from to pay for these very necessary things? But this was not all. Daus had made no provision for lockers in the armory, for a rifle-range equipment, for gun racks, for lighting fixtures, gas or electric, or even for a kitchen. The state law in reference to armories requires, in so many words, that the plans for an armory shall provide for these very things. The cost of these omissions, the experts reported, would be $60,100.—New York Times, March 13.

The New York Evening Post has been looking up the records of the men who composed the grand jury which exonerated District Attorney Nicoll from the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst's charges. It finds that nearly one-third of them are leading lights in the Tammany organization. Tammany isn't caught napping when there are charges against any of its bosses to be investigated.—Buffalo Express.

"Don't tell me I don't know what I am talking about. Many a long, dismal, heartsickening night, in company with two trusty friends, have I spent since I spoke on the matter before, going down into the disgusting depths of this Tammany-debauched town. And it is rotten with a rottenness that is unspeakable and indescribable, and a rottenness that would be absolutely impossible, except by the connivance, not to say the purchased sympathy, of the men whose one obligation before God, men and their own conscience is to shield virtue and make vice difficult. Now, that I stand by, because before Almighty God I know it, and I will stand by it, though buried beneath presentments as thick as autumn leaves in Vallambrosa, or snowflakes in a March blizzard. Excuse the personal references to myself in the case but I can not help it. I never dreamed that any force of circumstances would ever draw me into contacts so coarse, so beastly, so consummately filthy as those I have repeatedly found myself in the midst of these last days. I feel as though I want to go out of town for a month to bleach the memory of it out of my mind and the memory of it out of my eyes. I am not ignorant of the colossal spasms of indignation into which the trustees of Tammany ethics have been thrown by the blunt and inelegant characterizations of a month ago.—Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, March 13.

The notorious women of Capt. Brogan's precinct now carry on their trade in the sight of the men and women who ride on the Broadway cars. While Broadway is torn up the cars of that line, instead of turning with the street at Fourteenth street, go down University Place by Washington Square and through Wooster street. Some time ago the Sun found it necessary to call the attention of the officials at police headquarters to the fact that vice was so openly flaunted in the fifteenth precinct that Capt. Brogan could not go to or from his station without being compelled to witness the orgies that occurred in the vile dens. Inspector Steers took hold of the matter, and for a time the standard of decency was raised. It was only for a time, but long enough to show that the police can maintain public decency when they try to.

Now, every passenger who travels on the Broadway line must close his or her eyes as the car goes through the street, or else must be a witness to the atrocious conduct of pretty nearly the lowest creatures that live in New York. Inspector Steers has a chance to distinguish himself again. If he had been on a Broadway car with a Sun reporter yesterday, he would have seen, at No. 245 Wooster street, a bleary-eyed woman, partly dressed, with the marks of a Saturday night's debauch visible, sitting at the window. The blinds were closed, but the slats were opened, and she hissed her invitation loud enough for the men and women who were returning from church on the car to hear. He would have seen a young girl in one corner of the car look curiously at the creature in the window. Her attention had been attracted by the hiss. He would have seen her ask her mother, who sat beside her, a question, and he would have seen a look of horror on the mother's face.

He would have seen a woman in the window of the house next door, and next and next. In house after house on either side of the street these creatures sat and called and beckoned and insulted men and women in the very presence of policemen of the fifteenth precinct. The only effort made to hide the sights of vice were the closed shutters, but in every house where the shutters were closed the slats were open and the women were in plain sight.

In two alleyways between the Park and Bleecker street, there were women of the character of the women in the windows, and they called to passers-by who were on their way from church. The streets were filled with children. There are many respectable people living in the street in houses side by side with these dens. This weather it is impossible to keep children off the street, and they watched and watched the women and wondered.

This was on Sunday. The scenes on week-days are worse still, and just as many, if not a great many more, respectable people ride on the Broadway cars during the week. In the early morning young women pass on their way to business down town, in the afternoon mothers and their daughters, who are at all other times shielded from evil, or even the suggestion of it, and in the evening again the young women who earn their own living. After dark women from the windows come out on the steps of the houses or walk the street and lay hold on men who walk by, and these things are witnessed there by the men and women on their way to and from the theaters in the cars.

The police of the fifteenth district are responsible for this condition of affairs. They could keep the street decent if they wanted to.—New York Sun, August 10.

My attention has been called to the political tirade delivered yesterday. It is hard to believe that a sane man, and especially a minister of the gospel, would so far forget himself as to talk in a manner that would cause anxious and loving mothers to look with alarm on the face of the daughters who accompanied them, and to find thereon the blushes of shame caused by his improper remarks.—"Jimmy" Martin of the Police Board on the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst's Sermon, in the New York Evening Post, March 15.

"Boss" McLaughlin of Brooklyn has got his pound of flesh. [The first complication was created by the action of Tammany Hall in stealing a march upon boss McLaughlin of Brooklyn and running away with the patronage of the Brooklyn Bridge. As McLaughlin puts it, "they might just as well have broken into my bedroom at night and stolen my watch and pocketbook from under my pillow." He regarded the bridge as his personal and peculiar property, to be used for his own emolument and that of the Kings county democracy. When Tammany committed the theft McLaughlin demanded its return, and called upon the governor to enforce the demand. The governor declined to honor the call, and then the serious trouble began.] Gov. Flower this morning sent to the senate the nomination of Alfred C. Chapin, ex-mayor and the present congressman from the third district, to succeed Isaac V. Baker, Jr., as a member of the railroad commission. Mr. Baker is the only republican left on the board. Many democrats of position believe that this board, the most important in the state, should remain non-partisan and have so signified to Gov. Flower. The governor, himself an old railway man, with a thorough knowledge of the dangers and risks to invested property by the establishment of a strictly partisan board, has not, according to Albany rumor, looked with favor upon these exactions from influential democrats. To Edward Murphy, Jr., chairman of the democratic state committee, was given the post of superintendent of public works and the superintendent of buildings; to Lieut. Gen. Sheehan the superintendent of public instruction; to Richard Croker, "boss" of Tammany Hall, the health officer of the port of New York.

Having satisfied the demands of Hill, Croker, Murphy, McLaughlin, and Sheehan, Gov. Flower is now manifesting a disposition to take care of his own. The long expected port warden and harbor-master nominations came in with the rest. The majority of those displaced were appointed to office by Gov. Cornell eleven or twelve years ago, and have held on because a republican senate refused to confirm the nominations of a democratic governor. The governor's old friend and long continued tooter, Thomas M. Lynch, succeeds port warden Isaac W. Edsall. Lynch is a Watertown man, a saloon-keeper in New York, formerly represented the twenty-fourth ward in the board of alderman of that city, is wealthy, independent, and a blind worshiper of the governor's. Another ardent friend of Mr. Flower, who has received reward for past services, is ex-congressman Nicholas Muller.

The name of Col. Michael C. Murphy, who has been appointed a port warden, is familiar to every one who followed the course of politics in this state for twenty years past. He is about sixty years old. For three years past he has been practically an invalid, owing to a cancer in the stomach. Many times his life has been despaired of, but surgical operations have greatly improved his condition.

John McGroarty, who has been reappointed port warden, is a Brooklyn saloon-keeper. He was born in the ninth ward in 1838, and has run a saloon next to the Academy of Music in Montague street, Brooklyn for fifteen years and has accumulated a fortune. His place has long been one of the headquarters of the sporting members of the local political ring. It was in the basement of this resort that a disgraceful fracas over a woman occurred several years ago at 3 o'clock in the morning. The Emerald ball was in progress in the Academy of Music and McGroarty's saloon was in full swing up stairs and down stairs and in the basement. In the latter portion of the premises were a man and woman drinking champagne. The woman was a well-known character, whose husband was killed by her son. Detective Patrick Carr of the Brooklyn central office joined the drinking party and a row ensued. Champagne bottles were hurled by the woman and her companion, a man got his head broken, the woman hid, and Carr vanished in the excitement. The man with the broken head was carted away, and although the news of the row reached the first district police station, it did not get on the blotter. It leaked out, afterward, however, and detective Carr was allowed to resign, a police sergeant was reduced to the ranks and the officer on the beat was severely punished. McGroarty got off without so much as a complaint against his place, although it was open in direct violation of the excise laws.

Thomas M. Lynch, who has been appointed a port warden, is a saloon keeper and an ex alderman. He was defeated for re-election as alderman at the last election. His Nassau street bar room is a popular resort for down town politicians. His claim for the appointment probably lies in the fact that, like Gov. Flower, he is a Watertown man and has been able to do many small services for Mr. Flower.

Port wardens get fees that will aggregate upward of $3,000 a year. The position is a substantial sinecure. There are nine port wardens. Three must be nautical men and one must be a resident of Brooklyn. Their pay comes from fees levied on all vessels entering this harbor. Two of the nine must live at quarantine and board all incoming vessels that are detained by the health officer. They have the appointment and licensing of pilots, and are called upon to decide whether owners or insurers are liable for damages to cargo.—New York Times, March 16.

The committee on civil service examinations in this city has submitted to the executive committee of the civil service reform association of New York a carefully prepared report touching the enforcement of the municipal civil service rules. These rules apply to 7,098 persons, who are divided in the classified service of the city as follows: 3,503 in the police department, 1,013 in the fire department, 287 in the department of public works, and 2,295 miscellaneous.

The committee present the following conclusions: "First—That the civil service rules now in force, while excluding the absolutely unfit, present but a slight and wholly inadequate barrier to appointments upon other grounds than merit.

"Second—That the fact that few or no requisitions are made upon the civil service board for clerks would justify the suspicion that the law is invaded or openly set aside when it proves to be an insurmountable obstacle to favoritism."

The report is signed by C. W. Watson, A. R. Macdonough, Edward Carry, Seth Sprague Terry, and Alfred Bishop Mason.—New York Times, March 16.

Persons who are interested in the methods which Mr. David B. Hill pursues in his chase after the presidential nomination are just now making a quiet investigation into the facts surrounding the pardoning of William Conroy, a murderer who was serving a life sentence in the state prison. Conroy is an ex-policeman, and the same influences which secured his appointment on the police force are expected to aid in helping along the cause of the man who used his high office as chief executive of the state to liberate the murderer. In order to avoid an airing of the pardon as long as possible, Mr. Hill put it off until his last hours in the governor's chair, the order having been issued on the afternoon of December 31 last. Conroy was convicted on December 16, 1883, of murder in the first degree for killing Peter Keenan on November 3 of the same year. Conroy was on patrol duty at the time of the killing. He had been drinking more or less during the day, and when he was told that "Tom Murphy had left a drink in Cody's saloon" for him he hastened to accept the generous offer. In the saloon were eight or ten men, all of whom were invited by the policeman to drink at his expense. Afterward he disputed about the payment for the drinks, and offered to fight anybody in the place. No one accepted the challenge, and Conroy rushed into a rear room and began plying the inmates with his club. When they ran out for safety he stepped back into the main saloon again and, putting his club back in its socket, pulled his pistol, took deliberate aim at a group composed of Mrs. Cody, a man named Cantwell, and Peter Keenan, and fired. Keenan fell mortally wounded. The drunken policeman calmly walked out, and, meeting two other members of the force who had been attracted by the shot, he started to assist them in carrying the wounded man out. It was suggested that an ambulance be called, but Conroy said this was unnecessary. He took hold of Keenan and made the dying man stand up and walk to the station. On the way, it was shown by the evidence, he clubbed his victim several times. When the couple arrived at the station the sergeant at the desk promptly sent for an ambulance and Keenan was taken to Bellevue, but before he arrived there he was dead. The murderer was stripped of his uniform, and, as his act had aroused general indignation, the case was rushed to a trial at once. The jury, after deliberating seventeen hours, found the defendant guilty, and on December 21, 1883, he was sentenced to be hanged. An appeal was taken, however, and the general term of the supreme court reversed the verdict on the ground that the necessary premeditation to establish murder in the first degree had not been shown. The court of appeals, while upholding the reversal, did it on different grounds, holding that the facts were sufficient to justify the verdict, but that Judge Cowing, before whom the case was tried, had erred in refusing to admit certain testimony bearing on Conroy's mental state, counsel for the defense having put in a plea of insanity.

Conroy never faced a second jury. When the time for his re-trial came he pleaded guilty in order to escape the gallows, and accepted the life sentence, which David B. Hill commuted for him, thanks to the "pull" of the gentleman on whom the senator relies for his presidential boom.

Nothing was known in the district attorney's office yesterday of the manner in which Conroy's pardon had been secured, and William F. Howe, who was the murderer's lawyer, said the first he knew of the affair was when he saw it recorded in the newspapers.—New York Times, March 17.

There is an unaccountable amount of "hitch" and delay in the Central Park menagerie investigation by the commissioners of accounts. Superintendent Conklin is probably trying to get his "pull," which has somehow become weakened, into good order again, and the commissioners seem disposed to give him plenty of time. There is nothing particularly new in the condition of things at the menagerie. Mr. Conklin has for years been nursing it as if he owned it. Everybody has known that animals belonging to Barnum's show and to importers and dealers in animals had been kept there at public expense, and those belonging to the city have been used at the discretion of the superintendent for show purposes outside the park. If he has bought animals himself and kept them there, or has sold or given away those belonging to the collection, or swapped with other dealers without anybody's consent, it is only in keeping with the theory upon which he has always seemed to act, that the whole establishment was at his disposal.—New York Times, March 20.

Every resident of this city has an opportunity to-day to do something toward saving Central Park from despoliation by the placing of a race course along its westerly side. The job the Tammany politicians "put up" to rob the people of the city of a large slice of their finest pleasure garden for the benefit of a few hundred owners of race horses and a limited number of contractors has worked to a charm up to this time, Senator Plunkitt's iniquitous bill providing for it having been railroaded into a law by the assembly and the governor, and an obedient board of park commissioners having demonstrated their entire willingness to do the dirty work placed in their hands. The only apparent way effectually to undo the evil work that has already begun is by a popular expression of indignation such as will call the politicians to a halt and demand the immediate repeal of the law.—New York Times, March 20.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. Charles H. Ray testified as follows:

Examined by Mr. Roosevelt.

Q. Your name, Mr. Ray? A. Charles H. Ray.

Q. Position? A. United States assistant weigher.

* * * * *

Q. Mr. Ray, have you contributed to any person within the last week or so for political purposes? A. No, sir.

Mr. Roosevelt. Understand, you have a perfect right if you wish.

Mr. Ray. That's all right; I tell you, sir, I did not contribute.

Q. Have you been asked? A. No, sir; not directly.

Q. Have you been indirectly? A. The treasurer of our association in the seventh ward—it is not a political association in any way, shape, or form—he said that we would have to have some money, and I said I was willing to give anything. We have a costly—

Q. Who is the treasurer? A. Charles A. Allard.

Q. And in office? A. No, sir; I know what the law is, and did not intend to put myself in the law.

Q. You then, as a matter of fact, contributed? A. I contributed one dollar.

Q. Have you not been spoken to before, so that anyone who said his name was on a certain list was a contributor? A. I told you, y' understand—Mr. Allard y' understand—that I was invited to his house. I thought I had a perfect right to go to a neighbor's house. I am a republican; I know I was straight. I belong to a club. I thought I had a right to outside of my business hours. I thought I had a right to give my money as I pleased. I am an old-stock republican, and I have loved the party all my life. The democrats would turn me down every time and would not put me in, and I could not stand back. I would give freely if I was not prohibited by law.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Mr. Ray, what is the name of this club? A. We call ourselves "The Young Men's Republican Club of the Seventh Ward," in opposition to the Stone Club.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. The Stone Club is the same as the Henderson Club? A. Our club is the administration club.

Q. The administration club—that's what the fight will be to-day? A. A great many people are in the post-office and the custom-house, and I think it would be ungrateful if we went back on Mr. Johnson or Mr. Marine, and he never hinted at such a thing, and if he would say it to anybody he would say it to me. They have tried to crush me and keep me out of here, and I was a voter when he was in his breeches—

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Mr. Ray, let us see if we have you down straight. Your name came to be on this list by your saying that you were willing to give him some money? A. Certainly; he did not call on me.

Q. Has anyone brought the list around here? A. I have not seen it. I was out on duty, as the books will show, from last Wednesday week to last Tuesday. If the list was brought to this custom-house I didn't see it.

Q. When did this meeting at Allard's house take place, do you remember? A. Tuesday evening, 17th of March, I went up there.

Q. On the 17th of March? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that correct? A. I think it is.

Q. Now, was there a Mr. Bell, an employee of the post-office, a member of that club? A. I don't know that he is a member of the club at all now. He was down there when we first started. It's a social organization, you understand. We have people in it as are against us and some are with us—its a social organization. And Mr. Bell has not attended that club since before last September.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Mr. John Bell, do you mean? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Didn't you attend a meeting at Mr. Bell's house when he was absent? A. No, sir. (Witness here objected to being cross-examined by Mr. Bonaparte. Mr. Roosevelt said it was perfectly proper for Mr. Bonaparte to cross-question.)

Mr. Ray. That's all right. I am willing to do it. I will answer you truthfully. I was not there. No, sir.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy — George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

WE are able to give the full address of Mr. Curtis before the National League of Civil Service Reform Associations at Baltimore, April 28th. It is a complete statement of the circumstances under which the irrepressible spirit of progress acts in political matters, and under which civil service reform is now waging its war, and it is couched in terms which make its reading a rare pleasure. Progress is everywhere the Golden Fleece to be won only by hard contention. Distrust of political power is the safeguard of democracy. The demand for civil service reform is the cry of that eternal vigilance which is the price of liberty, for a still further restriction of executive power. It is but another successive step in the development of liberty under law. The superstition of divine right has passed from king to party and the old fiction that the king can do no wrong has become the practical faith of great multitudes in regard to party. Patronage has but to capture the primary and it commands the party organization. Devotion to party success for the spoil which it brings, has become a greater evil than any which party proposes to remedy. Party is no longer a combination of citizens for public ends; it is a trading company seeking the advantage of the leading partners. Party machines no more favor civil service reform than kings favor the restriction of the royal prerogative. Civil service reform will nevertheless succeed through party action because party machines defer to public opinion and independent votes. Already planted, it grows like a vigorous sapling. The futility of theoretical objections is shown by conclusive experiment, as when the first steamship crossed the ocean before Dr. Lardner had finished demonstrating that it was impossible.

It is impossible in any synopsis to give an adequate idea of this address. It must be ranked as perhaps the greatest utterance that has ever been delivered against the spoils system.

The following resolutions, recommended by the committee on resolutions and read by Carl Schurz, were adopted:

The National Civil Service Reform League gladly acknowledges that notwithstanding all violations of pledges and inconsistency of official action, the increasing pressure of public opinion upon public officers secures a faithful observance of the reform law of 1883, a greater reluctance to remove honest and efficient employes for political reasons, a deeper sense of shame in extorting political contributions from public employes, and the league congratulates all good citizens upon the constant and certain progress of reform.

The present administration entered upon its duties with unprecedented promises from its party of thorough reform by extending the reformed system to all grades of the service to which it is applicable, by observing the spirit of the reform in all executive appointments, and by repealing all laws at variance with the objects proposed by reform legislation. To fulfill these extraordinary pledges the President has appointed an admirable commission, which has enforced the requirements of the law, and has awakened in the southern states confidence in its honest operations so that the quotas of appointments may be equalized among all the states, and has everywhere stimulated a wholesome apprehension in official circles of the danger of violating the reform law. The President's judicial appointments are a sign of progress in the right direction. He has included some additional hundreds of places in the Indian service within the classified system, and has authorized open competition for promotion within the departments. The secretary of the navy has placed the entire labor system of the navy yards under reform rules, and the postmaster-general has introduced competition for promotion in the department at Washington and the classified post-offices. These are all measures of reform which the league recognizes with pleasure and warmly commends.

REPUBLICAN PROMISES BROKEN.

Much has been accomplished for reform by the force of public opinion, by the fidelity of the civil service commission, and by the action of the secretary of the navy during this administration, but the solemn promises of the republican platform of 1888 have been broken, the voluntary pledges of the President are unfulfilled, and the claim of the republican party, however strong may be the sympathy of individual republicans to be distinctly the party of civil service reform, is not sustained by the course of the administration, and against this gross breach of pledged faith with the people of the United States the National Civil Service Reform League earnestly protests.

But with these exceptions the administration has done nothing to fulfill the pledges of extending the reformed system to all grades of the service to which it is applicable; the spirit of the reform has not been observed in all or in many executive appointments, and no effort has been made to repeal all laws at variance with the objects of reform. The post-office service, including the employes of 60,000 post offices, the custom-houses and other executive offices, with the exception of the places within the classified system, have been ravaged by party removals; political assessments, although happily greatly restricted by law and public opinion, have not been restrained; the power of patronage has been boldly exercised by the administration in factional quarrels, as in New York, and the earnest recommendation of the civil service commission for the removal of employes who have violated the civil service laws, as in Baltimore, have been wholly disregarded by the President.

ARBITRARY POSTAL REMOVALS.

The national postal service contained on the first of March 1892, 106,459 persons out of a total in the entire executive, judiciary and legislative departments of 175,884. The arbitrary removals in the post-office service for political reasons alone wantonly impose upon the country the loss, delay and expense which necessarily result from replacing efficiency and experience by ignorance and inexperience. The practice is an antiquated political tradition against which reason and good sense protest. It is a wrong which should be corrected by law, and we commend warmly as measures of great advantages to the public service the correction proposed by the Honorable Sherman Hoar in his bill providing for the removal of postmasters solely for cause stated, and by the bill introduced by Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, providing for the appointment of fourth-class postmasters without regard to political considerations.

The league also regards as a public measure of great value and importance the bill introduced into the house of representatives by the Hon. John F. Andrew of Massachusetts, providing for the selection, by merit, under equal conditions for every applicant, of the labor force of the government in every department. Eminent public officers testify to the admirable practical working of this system in the cities of Massachusetts, where it has been established since 1885, and there is no reason to doubt that it would be of the utmost benefit in the national service.

FOUR YEARS' LAW OPPOSED.

Believing that the power of removal should be vested in appointing officers, subject only to a sound discretion, the league holds that such officers should be relieved, so far as practicable, of every temptation and every facility for the partisan exercise of such power. It, therefore, renews its demand for the repeal of the act known as the four years' law, which, by prescribing a fixed term of office, were designed to facilitate political removals, offering the opportunity, which is eagerly embraced, for a monstrous abuse of the power of appointment.

The league calls attention to the fact that at the recent trial of persons charged with illegally assessing government employes for political purposes Justice Bradley charged the jury that the retention of the accused in office by the government was reason for considering them innocent, and at the same time the government failed to remove them till they were criminally convicted. Thus, while the President does not remove until the offender is convicted, and the offender is not convicted because he is not removed by the President, the law is made of no effect.

The league regrets that no punishment whatever should have been inflicted upon those employes of the Baltimore post-office proved by their own admissions to Commissioner Roosevelt to have violated both the spirit and the letter of the civil service law; it finds no satisfactory explanation for the President's silence and inaction on the subject; it declares the reasons given officially for this failure to vindicate the law (in so far as any reasons have been given) utterly insufficient, and it expects of Congress a thorough investigation and exposure of the entire transaction.

THE house is inquiring into the scandals of the federal service in Baltimore, set out in Mr. Roosevelt's recent report. The committee will find it an easy task to show that federal offices in Baltimore have been extensively used for personal and party ends, that the law relating to the black-mailing of employes has been openly violated, and that a multitude of facts showing this disgraceful state of affairs has been laid before the President, and that he has paid no attention to them. The Baltimore district attorney has not brought the matter to the attention of the grand jury, and the law breakers are still in office. Criminals drawing pay from the public treasury, a district attorney in silent league with them, and the President looking on with indifference, do not make a pleasing sight.

EX-CONGRESSMAN ALLEN, of Michigan, has been in Chicago soliciting funds from government employes. He "struck" Mr. Oliver T. Morton in his office in the federal building, but Mr. Morton has a way of striking back at blackmailers. Allen now denies the charge, as might be expected; that is an old and convenient dodge. One curious distinction may be noted. When the person who figures as United States marshal at Chicago was questioned, he took the ground that Allen only talked with Mr. Morton "as a republican." The millenium of evil-doers has arrived if a criminal or his friends may answer that he has not committed crime but has only acted in a capacity.

THE resignation of Civil Service Commissioner Thompson is a loss to the public service. Being of the minority party he was not the spokesman of the commission in its contests with the hungry crowd that sees the public service slipping away from its clutches, but he was not the less an admirable officer. He had no favoritism for members of his own party, nor any blind side toward blackmailers who try to squeeze money out of government employes. He believed in fair play and in the enforcement of the law. It is saying much in these times to say that he was not afraid, either of the President or of any office-holder under the President. Those who are familiar with the dishonesty and the cowardice which has had to be fought down by the advocates of the merit system will understand that in mentioning these qualifications we are paying Mr. Thompson the very highest compliment.

COLLECTOR BEARD, of the Boston custom house, has given to the public a report of his office for the two years, ending March 1, 1892. During this time, in the classified service of 219 places, eleven changes were made by removal, eleven by death, twelve by resignation, and one by promotion to an excepted place. The reduction of annual expenses is $69,630. At the end of the report is this remark:

"Collector Beard submits to the public the foregoing statement as illustrating his idea of a practical business administration of the civil service, and believes that the facts herein presented save him the necessity of making ostentatious professions of devotion to civil service reform."

Ostentatious professions should always be avoided and it is to be hoped that Collector Beard will neither make them individually nor join in party platforms which make them upon any subject. But he has not made any professions of devotion to civil service reform. He has, on the contrary, disapproved of it, while compelled by public opinion around him to conduct his office upon its principles, and now the results confound him. The merit system has again conquered its ill-wishers.

DEMOCRATS over the country are holding their conventions and declaring that the tariff must be the issue in the approaching presidential election. Nevertheless they had better be preparing an answer to the question how, if their candidate is elected, will he proceed with regard to the some hundred and forty thousand places in the federal service now operated as spoil. What will he do with regard to the civil service law? If it is said that he will enforce it is it meant that he will enforce it as it was enforced in Indiana by the last democratic administration? Democrats have had too many lessons from those who are fighting the spoils system to be justified in supposing for a moment that they will sit down quietly and let a question of importance, but of minor importance, like the tariff be the one great question which bears upon a president's qualifications. The tariff question has been with us for a hundred years and it will be with us a hundred more. It can wait and the country will prosper. The work of destroying the spoils system can not wait.

THE democrats of Indiana have held their state convention and adjourned without saying anything about the introduction of the merit system into the state and municipal service of Indiana. In the meantime we have two great prisons, four great hospitals for the insane, a large institution for the blind, one for the deaf and dumb, fire and police departments in several large cities, and other departments of state and municipal service running upon a system of personal and party favoritism which is essentially and incurably corrupt.

THE annual examination for under-physicians in the Indianapolis city hospital and dispensary was held this month. These examinations are competitive and the one this year lasted five days, being oral and written. There is not a person in Indiana who will say that this method of choosing physicians is not practicable, or that it is not fair, or that it is not free from personal and party favoritism, or that it is not in every way a thorough success. This was brought about by the medical profession and that same profession can bring it about that similar appointments in our four insane hospitals and in all of our state institutions shall be relieved of the incubus of partisan politics.

PARTY AND PATRONAGE.

An Address at the Annual Meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League in Baltimore, April 28, 1892.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

If Charles Lamb had been an American by birth, as he is certainly an American by affectionate literary adoption, he would have added, probably, to his list of Popular Fallacies the pleasing delusion that a republic is a self-adjusting system of liberty and equal rights, and that to upset a throne is to set up justice. When Voltaire was insulted by the London mob for being a Frenchman, an offence which John Bright said is forgiven by John Bull only with the greatest reluctance, the Frenchman turned upon the steps as he entered his door, and with exquisite sarcasm appealed to the nobleness of the English character and complimented the mob upon their institutions and love of liberty. Voltaire knew that in England the surest appeal was to the national self-complacency, a virtue which is not wanting to the English-speaking race wherever it is found.

But although we may justly claim that a republic upon the whole secures fairer play for every man than any other government, it is not necessary, as in a disputed election, to claim everything. However it may be in Maryland, in New York the establishment of a republic by our fathers, while it has secured a fairer general chance for all men, has not yet developed universal political virtue or absolutely honest government. Like all excellent human devices, the administration of government must be constantly and carefully repaired and improved. If a locomotive upon a railroad must be watched with incessant care and be scrupulously oiled and burnished, in order effectively to do its work; if even a chronometer must be regularly wound if it is to report accurately the time of day; if a slight derangement of the machinery brings the huge humming factory to silence, it is a fond delusion that popular forms of government alone will secure honest and equitable administration.

In the nineteenth year of our constitutional union Fulton essayed with steam to force his little vessel, the Clermont, up the Hudson river to Albany. It was an experiment in mechanics, but no more an experiment than the republic in politics. Incessant care, comprehensive observation, intelligence, discretion, shrewd modification of details, perpetual deference to the hints of experience, a thoughtful care which has not yet ceased, all these have developed Fulton's struggling, doubtful Clermont pushing its way upon a smooth stream to Albany in thirty-two hours into the magnificent marble palace that crosses the turbulent ocean in five times thirty-two hours. Much more was necessary to this marvellous development than the invention of the steam engine, and the application of steam to navigation. Very much more is necessary to honest government, to the security of liberty, the equality of rights, and the general welfare, than a republican form of government. Among the Zulus to-day a republic would hardly prosper. In Bourbonized France a hundred years ago a republic was a saturnalia of wrong and blood. Wendell Phillips, seeing only the cause and the result, the inhuman tyranny that produced the French revolution, and the relaxed grasp of despotism that followed it, called it "the most unstained and wholly perfect blessing Europe has had in modern times." However that may be from the orator's point of view, the French republic of 1793, the fierce outbreak of a people imbruted by unspeakable oppression, was itself an awful revenge in kind. Even great as is the progress and marvellous the recuperative force of the French people, and fair their future prospect, the republic is built upon volcanic ground, and may yet reel with earthquake shocks.

If Mount Blane, the sovereign Alp, has not a charm to stay the morning star, the American republic, greatest and best of all republics, has no more power than the Roman republic by its name alone to secure freedom and wise progress. It is but an instrument, and its beneficent efficiency depends upon the intelligence, character and conscience of the people who wield it, and upon the promptitude and skill with which it is kept in repair and adjusted to the changing conditions of its operation. The demand of reform in methods of administration of government, therefore, is not revolutionary, nor Quixotic, nor surprising. It is the sign of a healthy and progressive political life. It is not exceptional, but on the contrary it is familiar in every kind of human activity. It is the impulse of the instinct which constantly seeks something better;

"The desire of the moth for the star,
Of the night for the morrow;"

the instinct which stimulates medical science to discovery of more certain relief for the physical pain and suffering of mankind, which produces endless mechanical inventions, increases the knowledge of occult forces and their practical application to human convenience, arrests the vast and needless waste of vitality that lesser knowledge can not stay; which lightens labor and lengthens life by greater command of time and space.

Why should this beneficent inspiration be lost to the sphere of politics which is not a less universal concern than all these? When human ingenuity is busily improving sewing-machines, and type-writers, steam engines, telephones and electric lights, and every mechanical and industrial process, why should methods of administration and government not be supposed susceptible of improvement? As the Arabian Nights and the old fairy stories are but delightful prophecies of our modern world of larger intelligence and shrewder wit, where we are wafted from place to place upon an enchanted carpet and in a chair of magic, where Ispahan converses with Istamboul, and a drop of elixir deadens pain, so Plato's republic, and Sir Thomas More's Utopia, and Harrington's Oceana, and all the ideal commonwealths of the poets and philosophers are but vague forecasts of states not further from ours than ours from those of early history.

Yet the world is not a garden of the Hesperides where we have only to raise our hands and pluck the golden fruit of progress. Progress, on the contrary, is everywhere the Golden Fleece to be won only by hard contention, by taming fire-breathing bulls of stupidity, by slaying dragons of malignity, and by victoriously withstanding hosts of slanderers and liars sprung from the teeth of venomous serpents. If the application of humane discoveries of science and the advance of the comfort and convenience of modern civilization have been resisted as stoutly as if they were a pestilence or a consuming cloud of locusts, it is not surprising that every political reform is ridiculed as visionary and denounced as incendiary. This has been so universally the welcome of improvement in every department of human interest that it may be said almost that the presumption is in favor of every proposed reform, and that reputed quacks and tiresome fanatics are probably new Columboes and Galileos and Jenners, the latest benefactors of mankind. It is this jealous distrust of progress which led so sagacious a statesman as Lord Shelburne to say: "The moment the independence of America is agreed to by our government the sun of Great Britain is set, and we shall no longer be a powerful or respectable people," and even Richard Henry Lee called the framers of the American constitution "visionary young men." They were very positive, but it was only their highly rhetorical way of saying "here is a change," and change to certain conservative temperaments means only mischief. But the challenge of conservatism to the spirit of progress has this advantage, that it compels every change to prove its right by showing its reason.

The uncertain fortune of reform in politics, fluctuating between sudden success and long delay, is well explained by a remark of Fisher Ames, that "the only constant agents in political affairs are the passions of men;" and by what Gardiner, the latest and masterly historian of the great civil war in England, says of the Presbyterianism of Prynne, that it enlisted on the side of the average intellect of the day, "which looked with suspicion on ideas not yet stamped with the mint mark of custom; the feeling which unconsciously exists in the majority of mankind, of repugnance against all who aim at higher thinking or purer living than are deemed sufficient by their contemporaries, and who usually, in the opinion of their contemporaries, contrive to miss their aim." But existing order consists always of ideas which are stamped with the mint mark of custom, and the hope of progress, therefore, lies in the ideas which are not yet authenticated at the mint. The Bourbon despotism in France, the Stuart abuses in England, the supremacy of the Crown in Colonial America, had the mint mark of custom. Had no other coinage been demanded these coined abuses would have remained the sole currency. Political progress, and with it larger liberty and higher general welfare, are secured only by bringing fresh bullion to be stamped with the mint mark. In the ever-spreading tree of political life it is distrust of the established order, not acquiescence in it, which is the irritation of the stem that shows the spot where the new growth will spring.

In the legal security of liberty progress has been always effected by regulating the executive power which is the final force in all politically organized communities. The Great Charter, the Grand Remonstrance, the Petition of Rights in England, were all declarations against the arbitrary exercise of executive power, and steadily diminished by jealous popular care, this power gradually became mainly the arbitrary control of patronage. For this arbitrary control the English tory had always a plausible plea, and in the middle of the last century, when England had been freshly reminded by Culloden and the romantic enthusiasm for Prince Charles that the Hanoverian throne was not yet secure, David Hume in his essay upon the Independence of Parliaments, made a better argument for patronage under the British Constitution than could ever be made for it under ours. It was essential, he said, to the balance of the constitution. The House of Commons did not assert its supremacy over the other branches of the government only because it did not think it its interest to do so. The patronage of the crown, he said, with the aid of honest members alone maintained the royal power. That is to say the King bought votes enough to supplement the votes of his friends. "We may call this influence," he says, for Hume was an honest man, "by the invidious appellations of corruption and dependence, but some degree and some kind of it are inseparable from the very nature of the constitution, and necessary to the preservation of our mixed government."

Mr. Lecky points out the coincidence of Hume's view with that of Paley, who attributes the loss of the American colonies to the want of royal patronage extensive enough, as he says, "to counteract that restless, arrogating spirit which in popular assemblies, when left to itself, will never brook an authority that checks and interferes with its own." This is the tribute of the moral philosopher to the necessity and reasonableness of the spoils system, a tribute which is echoed in the political gospel according to Tammany Hall as recently set forth under the name of the political moralist, Mr. Richard Croker, in the North American Review, a plea, I may add, which was promptly and thoroughly exposed by our friend and associate, Mr. Dorman B. Eaton.

Our fathers were largely children of the Englishmen who with great gyves of reform bound the royal prerogative; and the American Declaration of Independence in legitimate succession from Magna Charta and the Grand Remonstrance was an arraignment of the abuse of executive power. Our colonial politics were, in large part, a contest over patronage between the royal governors and the colonial legislatures. The destruction of the statue of George the Third in the Bowling Green at New York, at the beginning of the Revolution, was symbolic of the instinctive distrust of executive power by the colonists. The crown was the emblem of executive oppression, and when the republic began in the formation of the first state constitutions during the revolution, the chief distinction of those constitutions was the attempted restraint of that power by distribution between the legislature or the council and the governor. With the same jealousy the framers of the constitution in establishing the national government limited the executive power of appointment. They provided that only with the advice and consent of the senate should the President appoint certain specified officers, while the congress should provide at its pleasure for the appointment of others. The constitution thus reserves to the senate a practical veto upon the appointing power and to congress the designation of the methods of appointment of all inferior officers.

The people had assumed their own government, but as they could not administer it directly it was administered by agents selected by party or the organized majority, but under such restrictions as the whole body of voters, or the people, might impose. The crown had vanished. There was no king or permanent executive. There were a president and a legislature elected by the people for limited terms. But the practical agency of the government was party, and whoever was elected president, party remained in the administration as permanent as a king and with the same control of the executive power. But executive power, whether in the hands of a king or a party, does not change its nature. It seeks its own aggrandizement and can not safely be trusted. Buckle says that no man is wise enough and strong enough to be vested with absolute authority. It fires his brain and maddens him. But this, which is true of an individual is not less true of an aggregate of individuals or a party. A party or a majority needs watching as much as a king. Indeed, that distrust is the safeguard of democracy against despotism is a truth as old as Demosthenes. Like a sleuth-hound distrust must follow executive power however it may double and whatever form it may assume. It is as much the safeguard of popular right against the will of a party as against the prerogative of a king. Distrust is, in fact, the instinct of enlightened political sagacity which sees that the peril of popular institutions lies in the abuse of the forms of popular government. The great common-place of our political speech, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, is fundamentally true. It is a scripture essential to political salvation. The demand for civil service reform is the cry of that eternal vigilance for still further restriction of the executive power.

Civil service reform, therefore, is but another successive step in the development of liberty under law. It is not eccentric nor revolutionary. It is a logical measure of political progress. In the light of larger experience and adjusted to the exigencies of a republic in the nineteenth century, instead of a monarchy in the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries, in the spirit of the wise jealousy of the constitution, in the interest of free institutions and of honest government, it proposes to restrict still further the executive power as exercised by party. It is a measure based upon the observation of a century during which government by party has developed conditions and tendencies and perils which could not have been foreseen in detail, although at the beginning of party government under the constitution, Washington said of party spirit, "it exists under different shapes in all governments more or less stifled, controlled or repressed; but in those of popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy."

The experience of a century has justified Washington's words. The superstition of divine right has passed from a king to a party, and the old fiction of the law in a monarchy that the king can do no wrong, has become the practical faith of great multitudes in this republic in regard to party. Armed with the arbitrary power of patronage party overbears the free expression of the popular will and entrenches itself in illicit power. It makes the whole civil service a drilled and disciplined army whose living depends upon carrying elections at any cost for the party which controls it. Patronage has but to capture the local primary meeting and it commands the whole party organization. Every member of the party must submit or renounce his party allegiance, and with it the gratification of his political ambition, and such is the malign force of party spirit that in what seems to him a desperate alternative he often supports men whom he distrusts and methods which he despises lest his party should be defeated. He takes practically the position that party loyalty requires him to support one party with bad measures and unfit candidates rather than risk the success of another party with good measures and suitable men.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy. In order to secure and maintain party power, a corruption has been introduced which involves not only the whole system of our politics, but the character of the people. It is a corruption so general and so familiar that an amendment to the constitution is proposed in congress, which contemplates the election of senators of the United States by the popular vote of state instead of the legislature, and the argument gravely urged for the amendment is that it is harder to corrupt the whole people than to buy a legislature. Familiar incidents of the last presidential campaign, the collection of an immense sum of money by party managers to be spent without audit or accounting of any kind, and the general public conviction that it was a simple corruption fund not only spent for illicit purposes, but by which high office was bought, and the equally general conviction that if the other party could have procured the same sum of money it would have done the same thing, show how widespread the evil has become.

A New York morning paper of the highest character recently published the remark of a conspicuous politician whose name was given, that, "two-fifths of the democratic voters of the state are represented in conventions by delegates selected by the heads of the various departments in New York and King's county," that is to say in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. An evening paper of the same day, speaking of the republican nomination for the governorship in Rhode Island, said, "it is notorious in the state that every republican candidate must pay for this honor, and the price has heretofore ranged from $20,000 to $40,000. * * * It has frequently happened that a second assessment has been necessary when the election by the people has failed and the choice has fallen upon the legislature." These statements are not disputed. They are read languidly by many readers as illustrations of the rottenness of politics. They are read with alarm by many others as signs of a taint that will rot the whole system if not extirpated. The wrong is not peculiar to any party, for its source is the party spirit which Washington foresaw. The poet indeed solemnly rebukes the kettle, but when traders in mules denounce traders in blocks of five for political corruption, we instructively recall the legendary Roman augurs and the stage direction in Robert the Devil, "infernal laughter."

This monstrous development of the party system in a republic, while it might have been vaguely anticipated, could not have been definitely foreseen. The American who had served under Washington in the field and had voted for him as President, although he may have seen in the malice of the opposition newspapers the adder tongue of faction, would have smiled to hear the suggestion that in Republican America, the party proscriptions and excesses of Athens and Rome and Florence, without the slaughter, might be revived and repeated. Still less would it occur to him that a civil service which a century ago in the whole Union included only two hundred and nine post-masters and a handful of other officers, whose tenure was their fidelity and efficiency, would suddenly rise like the Afrite from the casket in the Arabian tale, into a gigantic and towering form, but still the supple slave of reckless party power. The increase of the population, the vast alien addition to the native stock, the universal extension of male adult suffrage, the growth of great cities of heterogeneous citizenship, the opening of enormous opportunities of contracts and political money making, the vast consolidations of capital not hesitating to attempt for their purposes the bribery of legislatures, the paralysis of the national conscience for a generation in the defence by a great political party of a huge moral wrong, and finally a long and relentless civil war, all these were yet to come, and their relation to an enormous increase of public patronage, and their influence upon the party system, could not be foretold.

These results, however, are now evident. What our fathers could not guess, we can see. Party which is properly simply the organization of citizens who agree in their views of public policy to secure the enactment of their views in law, has become what is well called a machine, which controls the political action of millions of citizens who vote for candidates that the machine selects and for measures which the machine dictates or approves. Servility to party takes the place of individual independence of action. So completely does it consume political manhood that like men suddenly hurried from their warm beds into the night air, shivering and chattering in the cold, even intelligent citizens who have protested against their party machine as fraudulent and false, and an organized misrepresentation of the party conviction and will, declare that if their protest against the power of fraud and corruption does not avail and the party commands them to yield, they will bow the head and bend the knee in loyalty to fraud and corruption. The despotism of the machine is so absolute and the triumph of the party so supersedes the reason and purpose of party, that we have now reached a point in our political development, when upon the most vital and pressing public questions parties do not even know their own opinions, and factions of the same party wrangle fiercely to determine by a majority what the party thinks and proposes. Meanwhile so completely has the conception of party, as merely a convenient but clumsy agency to promote certain public objects, disappeared, that one of the chief journals in the country recently remarked, with entire gravity, that it found "no fault with conscientious independence in politics," which was like announcing with lofty forbearance that, as a philosophic moralist, it found no fault with truth telling or honest dealing.

The recent vivid and detailed picture of political corruption in Maryland, which we owe to the distinguished president of the Maryland Civil Service Reform Association, one of the earliest, most steadfast, and most effective advocates of reform, and its companion-piece depicting political corruption in Pennsylvania, by our devoted and undaunted friend of political reform, Mr. Herbert Welsh, whom ravaged Indians bless, show how completely in two great states the two great parties of the country by base and dishonest methods pervert their power from promoting the public benefit to fostering their own aggrandizement. I am not forgetting Burke's apothegm that we can not draw an indictment against a nation. I am not arraigning the individual citizens who compose the great parties as guilty of bribery and corruption. As individuals they deprecate and denounce them. But as partisans they sustain the bribers and corrupters. The drivers of the machine are necessarily few, but they are also the drivers of the party, and substantially they are the party. The individual partisan forced to excuse himself can only say that it is bad business, but that his party machine is no worse than the other. This was the plea of Thaddeus Stevens, the leader of his party in the house of representatives, who is said to have asked in a contested election case, "Which is our damned rascal?" in order that he might vote for the right wrong. So far as the mere fact is concerned, however, the plea that the other machine is equally bad is undoubtedly sound. When Theodore Parker delivered his tremendous discourse on Daniel Webster, to which Rufus Choate's eulogy at Dartmouth College was the magnificent but pathetically futile reply, a fervent admirer of Webster declared, energetically, that Parker's discourse was the most outrageous deliverance he had ever heard, "and the worst of it is," he said, "that it is true." When the supporter of one party machine defends himself with the rueful apology that the other party machine is quite as bad, the worst of it is that it is true.

If I am telling the truth, it is plain that when the control of patronage passed from royal prerogative to popular party, the spirit and purpose of its exercise did not substantially change. A hundred years ago in England the king bought votes in parliament; to day in America party buys votes at the polls. The party system has subjected the citizen to the machine, and the first great resource of its bribery fund is patronage. It is the skillful annual expenditure of sixty millions of public money in the national arena, and by that of thirty millions in the municipal contests of New York alone, not by educational arguments and appeals to reason, that the machine or the managers of parties attempt to secure or maintain their ascendancy. Tammany Hall defends itself as Hume defended the king. The plea of both is the same. The king must maintain the crowd against the parliament, and he can do it only by corruption, said Hume. Party is necessary, says Tammany, but party organization can be made effective only by workers. Workers must be paid, and the patronage of the government, that is to say, the emolument of place, is the natural fund for such payment. This is the simple plea of the spoils system. It places every party on a wholly venal basis. Under its control party is no longer a combination of citizens for public ends; it is a trading company seeking the advantage of the leading partners. It is the selfishness of the individual, not the public spirit of the citizen, upon which it rests. And this view has various consequences.

If public money may be properly given as a private reward, the givers may decide upon what terms it shall be given. This is frankly asserted by Tammany, and in this it speaks for every party machine. It asks plainly, why should not a judge who is elected by us for a term of years, with a salary of fifteen thousand dollars a year, and who except for us could not be elected, pay to Tammany the very moderate commission of ten thousand dollars for his election, which Tammany guarantees? This is the doctrine of political assessments in the custom house and post-office, and every branch of the service. It is rent paid for the place. It is tribute to the party for the personal favor of appointment. "Why should not a man pay for benefits? Why should not those who are elected to well-salaried offices," asks Tammany, "pay the expenses of the election? Who are so much interested in the election as its beneficiaries?" It inquires, and it asks candidly, because the truth that the people ordain elections for their own benefit and not for the private advantage of the candidates Tammany not only does not believe, but when stated does not comprehend. And this view of Tammany is the view of not only of each party machine, but of a large majority of both parties. Tammany is called a gang of public robbers without political principles, an obscene fungus fattening upon the corruption engendered by a great city. But it is the natural spawn of the spoils system. It is the mirror in which party as now organized among us is reflected, and when party contemplates the image of that diamonded savage with his scalping knife of spoils it may well recall the title of Rossetti's picture, "How they met themselves."

The sophistry of the spoils extends itself readily beyond elections and appointments and assessments in the civil service not only into the whole political system, but into every department of the national life. It is undoubtedly true that whether there were a spoils system or not great interests of all kinds in the pursuit of their own advantage would always attempt to bribe legislatures, and that public officers and voters would still be bought at the polls.

But it is not true that such attempts would be made or would succeed under all circumstances. Cholera and typhus may not be wholly prevented by the wisest sanitary care. But cleanly, well-drained, and prudent neighborhoods are much less exposed to their ravages than those which are abandoned to foulness of every kind and degree. The spoils system is a moral pestilence bred of ignorance, carelessness, and knavery, which invites corruption as filth invites disease. A community which holds that a public office is a private benefit for which the recipient ought to pay, or that citizens of all parties in a free government may be justly taxed for the workers of a party, would hardly frown upon the proposition that the beneficiary of a law may properly pay for its passage. I do not say that the cases are exactly parallel, but the moral laxity and blindness in the one case would extend naturally and readily to the other. So long as it is held that the public money may be spent by a party for its own benefit, which means that in a country where party dominance should depend upon honest preference of its policy, the dominant party may properly pay sixty millions of dollars from the public treasury for votes so long it will be as impossible to stem the corruption which threatens us on every side as to stay the resistless plunge of Niagara.

We are approaching the third presidential election since the League was organized. Does any intelligent observer doubt that the party of administration controlling the vast salary fund of the civil service, which is practically a corruption fund, enters upon the campaign with an immense but wholly illicit advantage? Like every administration party it is justly entitled to every advantage that arises from a wise policy, from the honest and efficient conduct of affairs, from strict adherence, if it has adhered, to the promises by which it solicited public support, and from the faithful fulfillment, if it has fulfilled them, of voluntary executive pledges. To all these legitimate advantages the party is entitled. But so far as its administration has expended sixty millions of dollars in salaries with a view to the next election and to the continuance of the party in power, so far it has betrayed the principle of popular government, because so far it has deliberately bought party support with public money. The disposition of that fund was committed to it in trust for the public welfare, and every cent of it which this administration has spent to advance a party interest has been spent in betrayal of a public trust. If the national patronage fund were six hundred millions of dollars instead of sixty, it is not impossible that, in the present development of the party system, the party of this administration, as of any other, by the shrewd expenditure of that sum might maintain itself in power. But the offense is not measured by figures. The abuse of a trust of sixty millions is morally as great as abuse of a trust ten times as large.

It is not an abuse peculiar to this administration. There has been no administration since that of John Quincy Adams which has not done the same thing. It was long done amid general public apathy arising from the good-natured and careless feeling that it was the natural order of politics, the common law of parties. It grew up gradually amid general ignorance of its tendency and public indifference. The spoils system may plead that although a breach of the earlier tradition in national politics, it is really as old in New York and nearly as old in Pennsylvania as parties themselves, and that it has grown strong with the general acquiescence. But that is only to say that public evils and abuses do not arrest attention and arouse organized resistance until they are seen to be public perils. That is now distinctly seen, and this League is the living, active, aggressive witness of the happy awakening of the public mind to the fact that the prostitution of patronage to the maintenance of party power imperils liberty to-day in a republic no less than the arbitrary will of a king imperiled it in a monarchy.

In appealing to public opinion to bind the executive power still more closely by restricting the license of party in the interest of the whole people, we propose nothing which has not been often done. The very fact that party is a convenient agency and that its disposition is to magnify its authority, is conclusive reason for vigilant observation of its conduct and for wholesome checks upon its action. Party is a clever servant like Steerforth's man Littimer in David Copperfield. But the cleverer he is the more insolent, if permitted, he is likely to become, and the more firmly he needs to be disciplined. Party is the servant of the people, but it is so clever that it tends to become practically master and bullies the individual citizen as the clever Littimer, setting the table and stirring the fire, overpowered with awe poor little shrinking David. Those who grovel before party as the courtiers in Siam crawl on their bellies before the king, forget that the people are really master and often break from their good-natured indifference to teach party its place. There is, for instance, in this country a public opinion which has the force of law that the judicial bench, the tribunal of ultimate appeal even in questions of elections, whether the judges are appointed or elected, shall be independent of party partiality and influence, and it is a happy fact that the bench is so absolutely non-partisan that the infrequent exceptions to the rule, when they occur, justly startle the community as with a shock that threatens the foundations of social order. Another illustration of this suspicion of party is the condition frequently imposed by law upon the executive appointment of commissions charged with important public duties, that the members shall not be all drawn from one political party. But the most striking illustration of a sane public sentiment which recoils from the abuse of executive power by the party and of the intervention of the people to correct it, is found in the political history of New York, the state in which the spoils system was introduced with the rise of parties under the constitution, and which for the first twenty-five years of the century witnessed the worst excesses of party tyranny.

When the state constitution was adopted in 1777, in order to curb the executive power, a council of appointment for all state officers was elected by one house of the legislature from the members of the other, of which council the governor was made president, with a casting vote. For some years before parties were definitely organized, its function was honestly discharged to the public satisfaction, and upon the true principles of the public service. Political removals were practically unknown until as parties arose under the constitution, the council of appointment was swiftly transferred into a clean-sweeping party machine, and for the first twenty years of the century its action was merciless. In 1820 the council controlled about 15,000 appointments in a state where there were but 145,000 voters. A change in its party majority inaugurated an orgy of plunder. The public service of the state after an election was looted like a Chinese city after its capture by barbarians. The party proscription was complete, and among a healthy and vigorous people it became also intolerable. The evil wrought its own cure. There was a general demand for the abolition of the council, and in 1821 one hundred and nine thousand votes against thirty-five thousand demanded its abolition, and the clean-sweeping party machine was destroyed by the unanimous vote of the constitutional convention. This was not a party victory; it was the act of the people regulating the executive power by curbing the arbitrary will of party. The appointing power was distributed among different agencies where it still remains, and as its abuse by party, although greatly reduced, still remained under the changed form, the people still further abridged it by the civil service reform law of 1883, a measure in direct and logical succession from Magna Charta, and all the great monuments of political liberty.

This is the law, which in its limited operation is an undisputed public benefit, that we would apply to every branch of the public service, national, state and municipal, to which it is applicable. By restraining the arbitrary power of party we would promote honest administration of the government. But when we say that our aim is honest government, we do not say that the civil service is dishonest. It is, therefore, no reply to our demand to allege that the percentage of loss to the government in the collection of the revenue is inconsiderable. What we affirm is that the theory which regards places in the public service as prizes to be distributed after an election like plunder after a battle, the theory which perverts public trusts into party spoils, making public employment dependent on personal favor and not on proved merit, necessarily ruins the self-respect of public employes, destroys the function of party in a republic, prostitutes elections into a desperate strife for personal profit, and degrades the national character by lowering the moral tone and standard of the country.

Four years ago as the presidential election approached, the League stated in some detail the reasons for its dissatisfaction with the administration of that time. It tested the administration by the simple standard of reform, and all that it could say was that the scope of the classified service had been somewhat enlarged and that the rules and regulations had been revised and improved. It declared that the general party change in the service which had followed the inauguration of the new president was not demanded by the welfare of the service itself, nor by any public advantage whatever, and was due solely to partisan pressure for partisan objects which unfortunately the President had not resisted. But it will not be forgotten not only that the party of the President had not demanded reform—but that its controlling sentiment was hostile to it. All that was done under the last administration—and what was done gave the question of reform a place in practical politics which it will not lose until the reform is fully achieved—was done by the President alone. Except for his courage and fidelity to his personal convictions, the reform law of 1883 would have been practically nullified, and the reform ignored and discarded. Tried by the standard of absolute reform, he failed as President Grant failed ten years before, and for the same reason, the hostility of his party. But tested by the actual situation of to-day, notwithstanding the executive yielding to party pressure, the pure flame of reform sentiment not only was not extinguished during the late administration, but burned more brightly in the public mind as the administration faded—burned so brightly, indeed, that the opposition party in the platform upon which they carried the election made the strongest profession of reform faith and purpose that any party ever made.

The present administration came into power not with the usual vague platitude upon the subject, but with a definite promise of reform and the distinct pledge to fulfill its pledges. But it celebrated the success of its party with a wild debauch of spoils in which its promises and pledges were the meats and the drinks that were riotously consumed. Nevertheless, the reform law has been as faithfully observed as by its predecessor, and the scope of the reformed service has been greatly enlarged. The secretary of the navy, in the interest of the public, and he could have done his party also no greater service, has introduced the reform into the skilled and unskilled labor system of the navy yards. In his late speech in Rhode Island, a carefully and skillfully prepared defence of the administration and the strongest presentation of its claims to public confidence that probably will be made during the pending campaign, Secretary Tracy says: "I believe I am justified in saying that so far as its administration is concerned the navy has never been treated so little in the spirit of a party question as it is to-day; the regulations of the department within the last year have eradicated all political considerations from the employment of navy yard labor, and have made that employment dependent alone upon the skill and efficiency of the workmen."

A more signal illustration of the practical progress of reform can not be found, and when we add to this action of a republican secretary of the navy the fact that a democratic member of the house of representatives has unanimously reported from the committee of which he is chairman a bill to make the order of the secretary in one department the law in all departments of the government, it is plain that the beneficent flame of reform of which I spoke is in no danger of extinction. The President has also somewhat extended the classified service, and has authorized open voluntary competitions for promotions, while the postmaster-general had already adopted the principle of competitive promotion in his department. It is the post-office department, however, the largest patronage branch of the government, which has been ruthlessly ravaged under this administration by the old abuse. At the same time, again, in the house of representatives bills have been introduced regulating the appointment of all postmasters upon reform principles.

Yet while the steady advance in one of the most fundamental of political reforms proceeds, the party platforms of the last year have barely mentioned it, and in the hot party campaigns of the autumn and of the spring, party orators have forbore even to compliment it, lest haply some vote might be lost. The explanation of this apparent inconsistency and this evident avoidance and silence, is, however, not difficult. Civil service reform proposes to restrict the arbitrary power of party. It does not, of course, contemplate the dissolution of parties or suppose that popular government will be carried on without the organization of citizens who desire to promote public policies upon which they agree. Indeed, the reform will necessarily promote the legitimate power of party by making it a representative of opinion to a degree which, under the spoils system, is impossible. But as party has now become largely a machine, oiled by bribery and corruption in the form of patronage and money, and as the result of elections is coming, in the popular belief, not to indicate the popular will, but to signify merely the preponderance of "buddle" on one side or the other, party machines no more favor civil service reform than kings favor the restriction of the royal prerogative.

But it is by party action, nevertheless, that reform must be secured. Why, then, do we anticipate success? Because party itself is finally subject to public opinion, and whatever the machine may wish it is at last obliged to conform to public opinion as a sailing ship to the wind. There is already a peculiarly intelligent and influential reform opinion, an opinion with independent votes, of which party machines are conscious, and to which they now formally defer. It is an opinion which is known to public officers who often share it, and, taught by official experience the practical value of reform, they introduce it cautiously into the administration. Once planted, like a vigorous sapling, it grows apace. The uniform and undeniable excellence of the result strengthens and extends the reform sentiment, and still further emboldens public officers to heed it. The futility of theoretical objections is shown by conclusive experiment, as when the first steamship crossed the ocean before Dr. Dionysus Lardner had finished demonstrating that it was impossible. The wiser and more independent sentiment of party perceives the advantage to be gained by becoming the instrument of reform, as the wiser Whigs forty and fifty years ago strove to make their party an anti-slavery party, and, failing, saw their party disappear. Undoubtedly if the Republican party, born of that failure, had proved that it meant what it said of civil service reform in its recent platforms it would enter upon the contest this year a more powerful party than it is. But its platform and the declarations of republican leaders and its observance of the reform law, like the same observance and the reform acts of the late democratic President, show in what way despite the party machines public opinion, as it is strengthened, prevails, and the good work is done. The vigorous young sapling must encounter gales and frosts and droughts, but still it grows, and swells and burgeons. So feeling its way gradually, irregularly, inconsistently, halting and stumbling, but steadily advancing, reform proceeds.

Party machines, truculent and defiant, resist, but like kings they yield at last to the people. The king whose arbitrary excesses produce the peremptory popular demand for relief ordains, however reluctantly, a restriction that limits his power. So the French Bourbon, Louis the Eighteenth, signed the charter of 1814, and the Prussian Hohenzollern Frederick William the Fourth, summoned the constituent assembly of 1848. They call their surrender a motu proprio, an act of their sovereign will. But they know, and the world knows, that it is the will of a greater sovereign than they, the will of the people. Our appeal is now, as it has always been, not to party, but to the people who are the masters of party. As the English barons, in the phrase of an old English writer, cut the claws of John; as the English parliament taught terribly the English king that not he, but the English people was the sovereign; as the American colonies taught the English parliament in turn that the American people would rule America, so by every law and custom demanded by public opinion, which restrains the arbitrary abuse of executive power by party, the American people are constantly teaching American parties that not the parties but the people rule. We can not expect the king, nor the parliament, nor the party, to solicit the lesson or to enjoy the discipline. We can not expect their supple courtiers either in the palace or in the saloon, to demand that the king or the party shall be bound. But bound, nevertheless they are, bound by the people they have been, and bound by the same power they will be. The record of this year, as of last year, and of every year since the League was formed; even the reiterated pledges of platforms, although reiterated only to be largely broken; the most sweet voices of the stump, that sink into barren silence; the bills introduced that gasp and die in committee, on the one hand, and on the other the constantly larger scope of the reformed system in the public service, all reveal the ever stronger public purpose, and the constantly greater achievement of that purpose, to add in civil service reform another golden link to the shining chain of historical precedents which by wisely restraining executive power promote the public welfare.

THE BALTIMORE INVESTIGATION.

[Concluded.]

Q. You know the meeting to which we refer? A. No, sir, I do not. I have not been in Mr. Bell's house at any meeting when he was absent.

Q. No meeting when he was present? A. I stopped in one night. I stop in there often. He lives right above me—right in the neighborhood.

Q. Wasn't there a meeting there, Mr. Ray, about—somewhere—about this same time you mentioned—within a week or ten days ago, which was attended by different persons, some of them in the government employ, to consider ways and means for this coming campaign? A. We often talk—we have been talking some time together, among ourselves, and spend the evening in this way—talk over the administration. We took an interest in Mr. Marine. We were going to hold up the administration. And I think it is right, you understand. I never did anything during business hours, and had no hand in it, nor made any arrangements.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Why we are asking this is because we heard of this meeting up at the post-office, and I want to see if the information that we got up there is correct. Now, you were not present at any meeting at Mr. Bell's house? A. I stopped at Mr. Bell's house a couple of weeks ago. He was on duty. I went up there one night and stopped in and met several of our friends there.

Q. Mr. Bell was on duty that night? A. No, sir.

Q. He was there? A. For a short time.

I was in there for an hour. I went in there with a friend I knew. We walked down the street together but I haven't done nothing to collect money.

Mr. Roosevelt. There is no charge against you.

Mr. Ray. If there is a charge I will face the music, sir.

Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Is there not a Mr. Hammond connected with your club? A. I don't know him, sir.

Q. Do you know a Mr. Lingenfelter? A. No, sir; I don't know him.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of Oeh? A. Well, I have met that young fellow. He has grown up later. I know more of the old stock.

Q. Do you know a Mr. Armstrong? A. No, sir.

Q. Is this Mr. Oeh a member of your club? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he present at this meeting at Mr. Bell's house? A. I didn't see him. I usually go about and stop in and see my friends sometimes.

Q. For the friends of the administration? A. I did not say for the friends of the administration, exactly. I have given no money after Mr. Lingenfelter called me up. I thought there was people trying to put a job up on me and trying to get me into a snap.

Q. Had you been asked to call at Mr. Bell's? A. I was told some one would be there.

Q. Who told you? A. Word was left at my house. My wife told me some one wanted to see me at Mr. Bell's house.

Q. Do you remember how many people were at Mr. Bell's house? A. About eight or ten, or a dozen.

Q. You say some of them are employes of the post-office and the custom-house? A. No, sir; none from the custom-house but myself.

Q. Did you see Mr. Bell or any other employe of the post-office? A. Yes, sir; I seen Mr. Bell there, and Mr. Bell stayed there during the time we were there.

Q. Was he there all that time? A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you mean by saying he was was not there? A. I did not say it.

Q. Yes, you did. Was he there when you put your name down on that paper? A. Yes, sir; he was.

Q. Did he put his name down? A. I did not notice.

Q. To whom were you to pay the money? A. To Mr. Allard.

Mr. Ray was dismissed.

Special Deputy Collector Henry Lingenfelter afterward stated that Ray had told him that he (Ray) had made a contribution. By order of Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Ray was recalled.

Examined by Mr. Bonaparte.

Q. Mr. Ray, we want to see if we have got you quite straight about this matter. Have you given anything yourself for this political business? A. I tell you no, sir.

Q. You haven't given anything at all? A. No, sir.

Q. Well, you know what I am driving at is whether you have made any contributions yourself for political purposes in connection with this approaching primary election. A. I understand what you are driving at, and precisely what you mean.

Q. And you say you haven't given anything? A. Well—that is—you understand—I again tell you no, sir.

Q. You told us you had a conversation with Mr. Allard, who is the treasurer of your club.

Mr. Ray. I didn't say club; I said association.

Mr. Bonaparte. Well, call it association; to whom you said that you would put your name down on his list, but that nobody came around to collect from that list, so far as you know.

A. I could not look after anybody else. I told you nobody came after me.

Q. And you have not, either at Mr. Allard's house, or at your own house, or at Mr. Bell's house, or here, given anything yourself? A. No, sir; I have not. If you want an affidavit, I will make it.

Q. And you have not seen anyone give? A. No, sir; not a government employe. No one ever approached me in any way, shape, or form, neither about here, nor anywhere else, at all, sir.

Mr. Roosevelt. Mr. Lingenfelder, you told us that Mr. Ray told you, I understand, that he had given.

Mr. Lingenfelder. He either said that, or that he had intended to give. As I recollect, he signed his name. He said he had not given, but he had intended to give. He had put his name down on a piece of paper in his own house.

* * * * *

Mr. Ray. I told Mr. Lingenfelder I was asked—I said I would contribute—by a friend outside of government employ, Mr. Allard—I say this much, I did not give my money. I was on duty outside of this building for a week nearly. When I come in I had not given, and I did not give.

Q. You put your name down? A. Yes, sir; on Mr. Allard's paper.

Q. You did? A. Yes, sir; for the expenses of the club, or organization—I do not term it "political purposes."

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. When was that you put your name down on the paper, Ray? A. About a week or so before I seen Mr. Lingenfelder. He went to one of our houses.

Q. Where was it that you put your name down—in your own house? A. No, sir; we were trying to raise contributions to defray the expenses of our club—

Q. Was it in your club room? A. No, indeed. We were trying to raise money towards defraying expenses.

Q. Where was it that you put your name down? A. It was in Mr. Bell's house.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. It was in Mr. Bell's house? A. Yes, sir; at night.

Q. Who else was there? A. I don't know.

Q. Was Mr. Bell there? A. I did not see him.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Where is Mr. Bell's house? A. About three squares above me.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Who else besides My. Bell and Mr. Allard were there? Was Mr. Oeh there? A. I can't say positively. He is one of the latter-day boys.

Q. There were no other employes of the custom house? A. Oh, yes; there were several of us there that night.

Q. Was Mr. Kimball there? A. No, sir; he belongs to the Sixth ward.

Q. Did all the people present put their names down on that list? A. I could not say.

Q. Who started the list? A. I don't know.

Q. Who asked you to put your name down? A. No one. We were anxious to get our club out of debt, and the money was put in a fund.

Q. Who started it? A. I can't tell.

Q. Were there any names down when you signed? A. Yes, sir; there were several names down, but I could not tell you who were ahead of me.

Q. You could not see who was ahead of you? A. No, sir; I signed with my glasses off. I could not.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. You went to Mr. Bell's house to a meeting there with a number of persons. Who they were you don't remember. And there was a paper that, somehow or other, was there for people to sign, but you don't know how it got there; and you signed it, but you don't feel quite clear how you came to sign it?

Mr. Ray. I signed it because I thought it was my duty to give my aid. I said I would be one of ten men to clean the debt up.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. You said you would be one of ten men to clean the debt up? A. Our club is a social organization and has nothing to do with anything bearing on this election. We have people of both factions in it, and we come together at night, or Sunday or Monday, or whenever we please.

By Mr. Bonaparte:

Q. Did Mr. Allard preside over that meeting? A. Which?

Q. That which met at Mr. Bell's house; who presided over that meeting? A. Now, there was no organized meeting. Some young man just took a paper; who it was I don't know.

Q. Took it around? A. No, he did not take it around at all. Nobody was asked straight out to contribute.

Q. Nobody was asked to contribute? A. No, sir.

Q. Did the young man put it down on the table? A. No, sir, it was on the table, and nobody put it there as I know of.

Q. Did everyone put down his name? A. I can't tell that. There is always some people who won't pay nothing.

Mr. Marine. Was this money that you subscribed for there at that meeting, was it to be used in the campaign in the Seventh Ward? A. I could not tell you that to save my life. I told you I did not pay any money.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. When are you going to pay the money? A. I ain't going to pay it at all, now.

Q. What did you put your name down for? Tell us frankly about this.

Mr. Marine. You had better just answer the question. You have said that when you subscribed you subscribed to the club and that it was for club purposes. What these gentlemen want to get at is this: they want to ascertain whether you are sincere in telling them that you really gave money for club purposes, that you did not really give for some other purpose.

Mr. Ray. No, sir; I am telling the truth. I gave $5, you understand.

By Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Just answer me this question: Was the money you gave there for the purpose of that club or was it for other purposes? A. I could not tell you to save my life. I stated that we wanted to raise money for the club. Some said they were going into this fight and that it would take some money to pay the legitimate expenses, and after they asked Mr. Allard and another office holder, I told them I was willing to pay $5.

Q. Who? A. Mr. Allard and some other gentlemen.

Q. Was Mr. Bell present? A. I don't know.

Q. Was Mr. Bell present when you told Mr. Allard that you would pay some money? A. No, sir. When Mr. Lingenfelder sent for me that day I refused; I did not give a cent.

Q. Do you recollect who it was that said that we were going into this fight and needed money for legitimate expenses? A. No, sir; I got a little mixed on that. Of course, we have two primaries in our ward, and some of them said we had some expenses to meet.

T. Sewell Plummer, employed in the Baltimore custom-house, testified as follows:

Examined by Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Your name? A. T. Sewell Plummer.

Q. Your position? A. Warehouse clerk and member of the local civil service board.

Q. For how long? A. Ever since the board was organized.

Q. How long have you been in the office? A. I have been in the office about 21 years.

Q. You have been approached, I understand, by a gentleman who asked you to contribute to the political campaign expenses? A. There was a man came to my desk. As soon as ever he approached I saw that he was a very ignorant man. I said to him, said I, "Do you know that you are violating the civil service act?" He said he did not know that that he was not, or had not passed the examination. I said, "That's a mistake. Any man, whether he passes the examination or not, if he approaches a party in the custom-house to solicit money for political purposes is liable to the penalty of the law."

Q. Had he asked you to contribute? A. Yes, but he immediately left the building.

Q. Was he a post-office employe? A. Yes, sir.

Q. His name? A. Bell; John Bell.

C. S. Burns testified as follows:

Questioned by Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Your name? A. C. S. Burns.

Q. Your position? A. Entry clerk in the naval office.

Q. You are secretary of the local board of civil service examiners, are you not? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in office? A. Nearly five years.

Q. Appointed under the last administration? H. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been on the board? A. I came on the board in May of that year—five years ago last May.

R. Do you know anything about collection of names for political purposes? A. No, sir.

Q. So far as you know? A. No, sir.

Q. The bulk of employes now left in the office were appointed under the last administration? A. Yes, sir. There have been no changes in our office since the advent of the present administration. Mostly all the clerks are democrats.

Q. So far as you know, there has been no collection of political assessments among them? A. No, sir.

Q. Was there no collection in the fall of 1888, so far as you know? A. No, sir.

Q. Any voluntary contributions on their part this year? A. I know of none, sir.

Q. Any such voluntary contributions in the fall of 1888? A. I think there was.

Q. Perfectly voluntary? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they all took part? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Pretty general? A. Yes, sir.

Q. All give about the same amount? A. No, sir; according to the amount of salary.

Q. Was it about $50 or $60? A. It was a little more than that in 1888.

Q. How much larger? A. About from 6 to 8 per cent.

Q. Well, why did they happen to choose that amount? A. Well, I don't know that.

Q. What was the amount of your contribution? A. I made a contribution of 6½ per cent.

Q. Made entirely unsolicited? A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you happen to select 6½ per cent? A. Well, that would make $100; that was the understanding among the $1,600 clerks.

Q. Did the employes of the custom-house generally contribute that proportion? A. Well, some gave less than that.

Q. The contributions, then, were general in 1888? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know if they were very general last year? A. I do not think so. I contributed.

Q. You're a democrat? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You contributed to the democratic fund? A. No, sir; to the republican fund.

Q. Why did you do that? A. Well, I thought it was my part to do so. I thought it was my part to support the administration. It was voluntary on my part.

Q. As a matter of fact, were there any contributions to the opposition, do you know?

A. I do not know, sir.

Mr. Roosevelt. I have heard just that view before, that the desk owes so much to the party.

Mr. Roosevelt then asked Collector Marine the following question:

You have not appointed or refrained from appointing by reason of politics? A. I have always understood that out of a certification of three you were at liberty to select.

Mr. Roosevelt. But not with regard to politics?

Mr. Marine. I have brought the men here and had a look at them. I have been careful to exercise a proper supervision, and if the candidate did not suit me I would not put him in. Of course, you will understand that my preference is to appoint republicans to office.

Mr. Roosevelt. Not in the classified service. There must be no discrimination.

Mr. Marine. Here is the way I have done it; I don't want to mislead you; I have never when I have had this list before me, for instance, if I did not know a man on the list, which very frequently is the case, and did know the others, I would take the man I did know in preference to the one I did not.

Mr. Burns was dismissed. Mr. Marine was asked to withdraw.

Capt. William Fensley, being called, said:

Examined by Mr. Roosevelt:

Q. Your name? A. Capt. William Fensley.

Q. What is your position at present? A. I am a night inspector.

Q. Do you recollect being present within the last week or two at a meeting where a number of office-holders were present—I think Mr. Kimball presided—where some money was raised, or they started to collect some money in reference to these primaries that are just taking place to-day? A. I was at that meeting; do you want me to be truthful?

Mr. Roosevelt: I would very much prefer it. About what date was that meeting? A. Well, I think it was on last Tuesday, two or three weeks ago.

Q. Were the other gentlemen employes of the custom-house and post-office? A. Now, I could not say. I suppose there were some. There was two or three there and more, and there was outsiders—to be frank with you, I only knew a few.

Q. What were the names of the post-office men who were there? A. Well, now, before I proceed any further, I see that you are going to interview me closely. Now, sir, in point of law, a witness is not bound to incriminate himself.

Q. Well, who are the employes of the post-office building who were there? A. There was a gentleman there named Biddleman—

Mr. Lingenfelder: He is not in the post-office; he is in United States Marshal Airey's office.

Q. Well, at that meeting did you decide to raise funds in view of the coming primaries or for legitimate expenses? A. Yes, sir; there was some funds for to pay the necessary expenses of the house that we were to occupy for that day, and I was there this afternoon and saw where they had a private house for holding the primaries, which is legitimate.

Q. To whom did you pay it? A. Well, now, there was about a dozen persons there, and I don't know who I did hand it to; but I was appointed one of the officers to disburse the money and yet it was handed to another, for I had not been to the meeting; never had been to those meetings in that ward, not for a number of years, from the time I ran for council a number of years ago.

Q. Don't you recollect who you handed it to? A. I don't; I handed it to a gentleman who was sitting like Mr. Smith and he handed it to some one else.

By Mr. Rose:

Q. Didn't you hear his name? A. Well, perhaps I did.

Q. Don't you remember it? A. Well, let me see, I would not remember it now. I never seen the man before to know him.

Q. Besides Captain Biddleman who else was there that you knew? A. Mr. Kimball—

Q. Anybody else from the custom-house? A. No, sir; him and I were representing the custom-house.

Who else was there from the post-office—Captain Biddleman of the United States marshal's office—who represented the post-office? A. Well, there were several gentlemen there that I did not know, sir.

Q. Did you know anybody that was there besides Mr. Kimball, Mr. Biddle, and yourself? A. I knew a gentleman named Mr. Bond.

Q. Where is he? A. I don't know whether he is in the post office or in the custom-house.

Q. Do you know if he is in office? A. I don't know.

Q. Is it your impression that he is? A. No, sir; I didn't say that. I don't know.

Q. Mr. Bond was there. Who else? Who is Mr. Bond? is the first question. A. He keeps a coal yard.

Q. Who else? A. That is all that I knew.

Q. Was this gentleman, the custodian of the fund, was he an employe of the post-office? A. I don't know, sir; I could not say.

Q. Well, do you mean to say that you do not know the name of the man to whom you gave your money? A. I did not. He was sitting in the parlor of this house, and I was invited there.

[There is much more of interest in this investigation, but as the house is now going over the ground again, the object of repeatedly calling public attention to it has been accomplished.—ED. CHRONICLE.]

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE:

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

A FURTHER examination of the address of Mr. Curtis before the League at Baltimore confirms our opinion expressed last month after a first reading. It is the greatest utterance that has yet been delivered against the spoils system. Its fundamental principle that the evil of party struggle for spoil has become greater than any evil which party proposes to remedy is absolutely beyond question. It now remains to get this principle thoroughly fixed in the minds of the American people. The circulation of this address is the most powerful means to this end now at hand. Every friend of the merit system should join in this work. Mr. John Hemsley Johnson whose post-office address is Baltimore, Maryland, is chairman of the committee having the distribution in charge, and all communications and contributions should be sent to him. The smallest contribution will be welcomed. It is to be hoped that every member of the Indiana civil service reform association will send money to Mr. Johnson for copies and distribute them among his neighbors. Civil service reform associations everywhere, and especially those that have not been able to find anything to do, will find this a most effective work.

THE paper read by Mr. R. Francis Wood, of Philadelphia, at a meeting of the National League in Baltimore, upon appointment of postmasters, grounds its discussion largely upon the last annual report of the postmaster-general and is an entertaining commentary upon that bumptious document. The following from Mr. Wood's paper defines the situation in his own state:

In the state of Pennsylvania, which seems to have been exceptionally favored in the distribution of offices, there were in 1891, 4,684 post-offices of all classes. If I may use the analogue which has been so well applied in the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, think what a fine retinue of knights and squires these furnish to Duke Donald of Lochiel and to Earl Stanley, the lord lieutenant of Pennsylvania; and what consideration must be given to nobles with such a following, if the lord paramount desires their aid in one of his quadrennial wars? Is it strange that our newspapers have contained almost daily for sometime past the news that one county convention after another has given its cordial endorsement to

Mr. Quay's candidacy for re-election to the United States senate; or can we wonder at the eulogies upon that gentleman delivered in the late state convention of his party? "As a dog turneth to his vomit, so a fool iterateth his folly."

To the young men who have followed Mr. Clarkson's suggestion and have formed a national league of college republican clubs, we take the liberty to repeat Washington's warning: "The common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it." And again: "It exists under different shapes in all governments more or less stifled, controlled or repressed, but in those of popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy."

And, since the machines of both parties are under the manipulating fingers of Quay, and Platt, and Clarkson, and Gorman, and Hill, and both machines exist only for spoil, and only by spoil, these young men would do well to heed another warning by a patriot as distinguished as Washington, Abraham Lincoln, who said to a friend a few days after the fall of Richmond, pointing to a crowd of office-seekers besieging his door: "Look at that. Now, we have conquered the rebellion, but here you see something that may become more dangerous to this republic than the rebellion itself."

As both parties are now constituted, it is a misfortune when party ties sit anything but lightly on the young college men of this country.

In the new Baltimore investigation, cabinet officers have distinguished themselves. Mr. Wanamaker testified that after Mr. Roosevelt made his report, he sent a special agent to look into the matter, and this agent reported that the accused office-holders had not been correctly reported by Mr. Roosevelt, and had had no chance to defend themselves, and were not guilty. He therefore had punished no one. It requires great self-restraint to repeat what Mr. Wanamaker swore to and not follow it with the declaration that he is willfully in collusion with law-breakers and criminals, and is shielding them from punishment. To note the difference between his acts and Mr. Roosevelt's acts in this Baltimore matter, is to note the simple difference between a sneak and an honest officer. With Mr. Roosevelt, every word that fell from the lips of the witnesses was taken by a stenographer, and was printed and laid before the President and Mr. Wanamaker and the public. The evidence of guilt is conclusive. The accused are convicted by their own testimony. To the same questions they would again have to make the same answers. Now comes Mr. Wanamaker and says that he sent a man to Baltimore who made a re-investigation and reported that the men were innocent. He shirks his official duty, and denies evidence which he knows is true, and dodges behind a report which he knows is false. Mr. Roosevelt followed him before the committee, and, as usual, crushed him in a way to make the whole country ashamed of its postmaster-general. We give the following specimen:

It is difficult to discuss seriously the proposition that a man when questioned as to something which has just happened will lie to his own hurt, and six months afterward tell the truth to his own benefit. The honorable the postmaster-general, in speaking of the accused men, says; "When they declare that they have not made such statements, and they do that under oath, you are bound to take their statements." It seems to me that if in a private business of large size an investigation into one of its branches should disclose that twenty-one men were cheating, the men being caught red handed and confessing their guilt, it would be very unwise to accept the oaths of these same men six months later that they were innocent and had lied when they made their confessions.

THE position of Attorney-General Miller on the subject of raising money on the pay of government employes is demonstrated by himself. The other day he told the committee which is re-investigating the federal offices of Baltimore that his attention had not been called to the Baltimore cases until within a few days, when a copy of Mr. Roosevelt's report had been sent him. Also, that he could not be personally cognizant of all violations of the law, "even violations of the civil service law." He did not know for what purposes the Baltimore primaries, reported upon by Mr. Roosevelt, were held. He was immediately followed upon the stand by Mr. Roosevelt, who turned to his letter-book and produced the following copy:

WASHINGTON, August 4, 1891.

The Attorney-General:

SIR—By direction of this commission I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of Commissioner Roosevelt's report of an investigation made by him at Baltimore in respect to alleged violations of the provisions of the civil service law relating to political assessments by persons in the official service of the United States. A copy has also been sent to the President, the secretary of the treasury and the postmaster-general. The report will not be made public except with the consent of the President.

Very respectfully, HUGH S. THOMPSON,
Acting President.

To this Mr. Roosevelt added that he personally sent the report at the time. Mr. Miller is not capable of a falsehood in this matter. The report undoubtedly came to him in his mail, and if he noticed it at all, it was simply to throw it aside with a contemptuous feeling that he would not take the trouble to read it, and he has undoubtedly forgotten all about it. There was, however, a great deal of talk in the papers at the time, and it would be an unjust reflection upon Mr. Miller's intelligence to say that he did not at that time know that hundreds of public prints charged a wholesale violation of the law in Baltimore.

We believe that he has voluntarily given directions to the district attorneys to be on the lookout for trusts, but we venture to say that it never occurred to him that he had any duty to perform in connection with the use of public officers to provide funds or run primaries, and this, though twenty-five or twenty times that number should violate the law in a single city. Mr. Miller is at times very spicy, and, if he is on your side, entertaining. There is no doubt that the tone in which he said "even violations of the civil service law," made every spoilsman within hearing grin with delight. The sum of the matter is that efficient prosecution of violators of the civil service law can not be secured under this administration.

To the last statement there is one exception. Mr. George W. Jolley, the United States district attorney for the district embracing Owensboro, Kentucky, learning that the law had been violated, promptly called witnesses before the grand jury and six revenue officers were indicted for unlawfully soliciting and receiving money for political purposes. Before the house committee on the civil service, recently, Secretary Foster was asked and he answered in relation to this transaction as follows:

"THE CHAIRMAN. I have received a communication signed by C. C. Stewart and others, in which they refer to indictments in Kentucky, and say that parties who testified before the grand jury have been dismissed from the internal revenue service; while those who have been indicted have not yet been tried, and have been retained in the service. Are you aware of the truth or falsity of that?"

"MR. FOSTER. I have some knowledge about it which I do not care to make public at this time; but if it is true, these people have been wrongfully indicted."

At the same time Secretary Foster's attention was called to some cases in the revenue service in Baltimore, brought out in Mr. Roosevelt's investigation, as follows:

"MR. BOATNER. These parties are charged, and two of them admit, in answer to questions, that they consider any sort of fraud in a primary as entirely justifiable. You are the head of this department, and of course your judgment will prevail in the conduct of the business of your department. As a member of this committee I desire to know whether it is consistent with the law and with the good of the public service to retain such men in office? * * * The question I ask is simply, whether, in your judgment, the collector of the port should dismiss these men upon their confession of having committed these acts?"

"MR. FOSTER. I should want to investigate the subject before answering."

This is a secretary of the treasury to be proud of.

THE civil service commission gave District-Attorney Jolley the facts upon which he started the investigation by the grand jury. A Washington dispatch of May 4 to the New York Times contained the following summary of those facts:

Similar charges were made by L. H. Axton, of Owensboro, Ky., against officials of the second internal revenue district. John Feland is the collector in that district. Axton told the commission that in July last Feland permitted assessments of from $25 to $50 to be made on officers under his control. Those who lacked sufficient funds gave their individual acceptances, according to Axton, in favor of William Feland, son of the collector and chief clerk of the office. He charged also that several hundred dollars were raised in this way to support the candidacy of John Feland, Jr., for county attorney.

The remaining charges made by Axton were that the collector authorized N. S. Roark to collect throughout the district for him, H. G. Overstreet and Gabe Crutcher being implicated; also, that in April last Collector Feland, his son William, and the clerks under him were concerned in a general assessment of the minor internal revenue officials for convention purposes, $10 being the amount exacted from each person.

Axton enclosed in his communication to the commission a letter written by E. P. Adams, a district deputy under Feland, asking a fellow employee outright for a contribution of $25.

John W. Lane made affidavit that he was directly solicited by Adams and also by Roark, the latter demanding a contribution of $30. Lane said that he spoke to the collector in relation to the matter, and that the latter said he could do as he pleased, but that he (Feland) expected to do "his part."

J. S. Barnett submitted an affidavit reciting that he gave his check to Roark and that he was also solicited by C. N. Buchanan, to whom he gave his acceptance for $25 in favor of William Feland. He charged also that William Feland deprived him of $10 of his pay for political purposes.

An affidavit by I. O. G. Barnett was to the effect that he gave a check for $10, payable to William Feland as a political contribution. Roark had asked him for the money.

It is against such facts as these, believed and acted upon by the grand jury, that Secretary Foster says he has information which he will not divulge, but which makes him believe that these indictments were wrongfully returned. There has never been any unanimity in the world like the unanimity with which the Wana-makers and Fosters of this administration put themselves in the position of apparently deliberately shielding wrong-doers and criminals.

THE New York Evening Post brings to light a "confidential" circular which is being sent to postmasters by the American Protective Tariff League, Cornelius N. Bliss president. After stating that its object is to show "the benefits of protection and reciprocity," the circular says:

"Will you have the kindness to at once give us a list of the patrons of your office according to the enclosed blanks? The effectiveness of our work will depend upon the care with which you prepare these lists. Give the names of intelligent voters only, and of those who may become voters before the election of 1892.

"(A) Under 'Our Friends' give at the top of each blank the names of two active, reliable, influential republicans to each blank used.

"(B) Next, give the names of republicans who ought to take an interest in the cause of protection.

"(C) Under the head 'Opposition' give the names of all doubtful voters and reading democrats; that is, give name of every democrat who takes a newspaper.

"Immediate reports will be gratefully received, but take time to have the lists as perfect as possible. If you need additional blanks, please inform us at once.

"Please do not fold the blanks, but return them to us by the enclosed post-paid envelope. Give the names at your post-office only. If you can not furnish this information, kindly consult some leading republican, so that the work can be done thoroughly and promptly."

Senators Hawley and Platt, of Connecticut, have written a letter indorsing the scheme, and, in effect, with irresistible force coercing the postmasters of their state. Probably other members of congress have done the same for their domains. Thus the use of public offices for party and private purposes has come to its full bloom. First, democrats are turned out and republicans become holders of the offices. Then, instead of being confined to an impartial discharge of their duties, they, though paid by taxing all, are set to rendering the most powerful aid to the dissemination of a party tenet which is offensive to one-half of the American people. And at the same time, these banded legions of federal office-holders are put under the control of an association of protected manufacturers, who have a direct pecuniary interest in the work they are calling upon the office-holders to do. Of course President Harrison could by a word stop this corrupt use of public office.

A RECENT instance of Hillism was the escape of O'Brien, a notorious bunko criminal, as he was being transferred from the Clinton prison to Utica. The warden after thirteen years of faithful service had been displaced by Boss Murphy for a local heel-er with no qualification for the office except usefulness to the Hill machine. He made changes in the prison service to further parcel out spoil. O'Brien was put in the sole charge of a keeper of two weeks' experience who is believed to have connived at the escape of his prisoner. The prison association of New York with the assistance of the civil service reform association are taking advantage of the scandal of the O'Brien affair to urge a constitutional amendment necessary to get prison appointments under the civil service law. At the prison at Dannemora, of fifty seven prison officers fifty-one were democrats, and about forty were appointed through the influence of Boss Murphy at Troy and the rest were Smith Weed's men.

J. SLOAT FASSETT having been successful in getting Postmaster Flood removed is now charged with an attempt to dispose of another political enemy, Vanduzer, the Horseheads postmaster. Lately Wanamaker's post-office inspectors have been dropping in to see Vanduzer and they have been followed by captious letters from Wanamaker which Vanduzer considered the preliminary steps for his decapitation. He informed the postmaster-general at length of the situation in a letter which did not mince matters. Then he waited a week and went to Washington and called on Wanamaker who said he had not received Vanduzer's letter. Vanduzer was surprised and intimated that an investigation would be proper, but Wanamaker showed no desire to see the letter. Then Vanduzer withdrew and procured a copy which he saw safely to Wanamaker's desk. Finally, to complete his business with thoroughness and neatness, he saw Halford and related all the facts. According to the Washington report he talked to the President's private secretary as follows:

"Before Dr. Flood was removed the President told me he did not understand the merits of the case. I propose that he shall not be ignorant of the merits of this one. I do not propose to remain quiet and be blackmailed by either the postmaster-general or Mr. Fassett. If I am to be removed, I want the people of my district to know upon what grounds."

How Mr. Wanamaker must detest Vanduzer's indelicacy in letting not only him but the public know that he sees through the pious trick to oust him.

ANOTHER interesting tale of Wanamaker's department and his inspectors in Maryland was lately given in the New York Evening Post. The republican congressman had the post office removed from a good location to an inconvenient one where liquors were sold, though not in the same room. Complaint was made to Wanamaker and he referred the complainants to Clarkson. After several hours of waiting Clarkson saw the gentlemen and informed them in a discourteous tone that their complaints must be in writing. This was done and they went home to await the visit of the inspector. We quote the outcome of the visit:

"In three or four weeks after this interview the inspector came down. He sent for me, and said that as for my first reason, the office was within the number of rods from the railroad allowed by law, and that we must put up with its inconvenient location; that we could not expect to have everything just as we wanted it; then, that for a post-office in a saloon it was very well arranged, and that liquors were hardly an objection, as they were sold down stairs. I reminded him that that did not prevent people under their influence coming up stairs, and asked him if it was not against the law to have a post-office in a place where liquors were sold. He said, 'Why, certainly it is,' and took from his pocket a copy of that section of the law and read it to me, adding that if that were enforced half the post-offices in the South would have to be closed,' and asked me if I was willing to do without one at ———ville. I told him no, and that argument had no force here, as we had another place for it that was satisfactory in every respect. He asked, 'Where?' I said at ———'s store, where it had been so satisfactory hitherto. But he said, 'He is a democrat.' I said, 'He votes that ticket, but is no politician.' The inspector replied, 'When it comes to a choice between a democrat and a saloon, the saloon will get it every time.' Then in answer to my third reason he required me to give him the particulars of their carelessness, etc., which I did. He said I had good reasons for complaint on that head; that he would reprimand the postmaster and threaten him, and he had no doubt that things would improve in that respect [as they have]. Then I said to him, 'I suppose there is no chance of a change of place for our post-office.' He said he thought not, unless our congressman, who had it put where it is, would request Mr. Clarkson to make a change, which he was not likely to do. I have heard nothing more since."

THE Indianapolis Journal, of May 6, has the following dispatch:

MADISON, May 5.—The new republican city council to-night ousted all the democrats in subordinate offices and put in the following good, trusty republicans: Sexton, Earnest Argus; street commissioner, Benjamin Mayo; attorney, Solomon J. Bear; market master, Anderson Benson; janitor, Paul Wolf; engineer of light station, Frank McKay; linemen, Mark Mollyne and Samuel Medlicott; commissioners, James Hargan, Salathiel Grayson, James D. Taylor, John Clements and Patrick Wade.

THE Indianapolis Sentinel, of May 11, publishes the following:

ANDERSON, IND., May 10.—[Special.]—The new democratic council assumed control of affairs last night for the first time in four years. In five minutes after the newly elected members had taken their seats Councilman Forkner introduced a sweeping resolution, which fired out every republican holding a minor city office and appointed in their stead tried and true democrats. The city attorney, chief of police, ten policemen, city engineer, street commissioner and a half dozen other offices were placed in the hands of democrats. There is a great howl going up to day from republicans and they threaten to retaliate by firing out every democratic teacher from the public schools.

The new appointees were ward bosses and party heelers. This is a good instance of the almost universal corruption which exists in our national, state and municipal affairs in relation to appointments to office. In these cases there was no pretense of inefficiency of those dismissed or of efficiency of those appointed. It was plain freebooting. In most cases there is a pretense of efficiency yet the governing motive in the selection for appointment is favoritism and the action of the appointing power is therefore corrupt. The magnitude of the evil is colossal and the effect upon individual citizenship is degrading in the extreme. So widespread is this corruption that every other public question is dwarfed by the side of it. Party machines and managers as now constituted do not want this corruption removed or citizenship elevated. They like to enjoy this spoil and they have no means of political existence without it. They constantly attempt to distract the attention of the people by pushing forward some other question as the all-important one. That trick is now well understood. The one great object to work for now in American politics is the destruction of the spoils system. That can best be worked at from a position of cold-blooded indifference to mere party success.

A Boston Herald Washington dispatch, of April 12, says, regarding Mr. Andrew's bill "to exclude political influence in the appointment of labor under the authority of the United States:"

The federation of labor of the District of Columbia met last night, and, after a two hours' discussion of the bill by sections, voted to indorse it, with only one dissenting vote. It was also voted to appoint a committee to wait upon Mr. Andrew to urge the addition of a clause making it a penal offence for a public officer to violate the law if it is enacted.

Of the recent application of the system in the Washington navy-yard, Commodore Folger in his last annual report says:

It is perhaps unnecessary to state, and it is a fact which is generally acknowledged, that the gun factory at the Washington navy-yard has proved itself successful in the direction of economy and efficiency. Ordnance material of every description is now manufactured in this establishment cheaper than outside contractors will agree to undertake the work. This state of affairs is largely due to the methods which have been pursued in purifying the manner of making appointments, promotions, etc., in the labor force, and in the adoption of an administration based upon business methods, and it is believed that the merit system, which has become finally established, is satisfactory and beneficial both to the government and to the labor employed.

THE sale of the Indianapolis News by Mr. John H. Holliday is an event of great political interest. Mr. Holliday founded the News with a small capital, and carried it through all difficulties until it became a great newspaper, and sold, it is reported, for three hundred thousand dollars. It has been a great power in Indiana, with its 25,000 daily circulation and 100,000 daily readers. While not without mistakes, it has during its twenty years existence stood for the free exercise of the powers of citizenship unhampered by partisan bands. While the party papers of Indiana have ignored the facts, or have lied about them, the News has told the truth. Its stand upon public questions has been without fear or wavering, and with indifference to party effect. It has, in most cases, been right. It has been a persistent and powerful fighter of the spoils system in every phase.

MR. MORTON has published a statement in his usual clear and conclusive terms, of the solicitation of money by ex-Congressman Allen in the federal building at Chicago. The feeling among the boys here is very ugly toward Mr. Morton, not that they question for a moment the truth of his statements, but for "blowing," as one of them put it. Merrill Moores, chairman of the republican county committee, talks of having Mr. Morton expelled from the Columbia Club, a "swell" republican organization of this city. The last seen of Allen, he was hurrying across-lots to Washington where he ran around to the President and other officers to deny what he had not yet been charged with. It was a case of the wicked making rapid time in anticipation of pursuit.

THE President has placed the employees of the fish commission, 132 in number, under the civil service law. This was done at the urgent request of Fish Commissioner McDonald, and swells the number of additions made by the President to the classified service during the three years of his term to between eight and nine hundred. How full this measure of performance is can be determined by reference to the platform upon which he was elected.

THE President turned the Virginia federal offices over to Mahone, the Pennsylvania offices to Quay, the New York to Platt, and he let Clarkson displace forty thousand postmasters with his friends and partisans. Yet, to a man, these bosses are now his bitter enemies. With this fullness of ingratitude, poetic justice punishes the President for forgetting his oath of office and his duties under the constitution.

THE HENCHMEN IN ACTIVE SERVICE.

"No officer should be required or permitted to take part in the arrangement of political organizations, caucuses, conventions, or election campaigns. Their right to vote and to express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessment for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed."—President Hayes, June 22, 1877.

FIELD SERVICE FOR A MONTH.

[From the New York Times.]

Appointments, removals and transfers were numerous at the custom-house yesterday, and the special treasury agent's office came in for the lion's share of the "shake up." It began with Special Treasury Inspectors Morton Britton and Ignatius Dugan, who were removed. Both of them are republicans. Britton had been a long time in the service, and had had to do with some important cases. Chief Wilbur speaks well of his work, but that didn't prevent the sending of an order from Washington for his removal. It was gossip yesterday that some powerful influence had been exerted against him.—March 5.

Collector Hendricks has had many sessions lately with the local republican leaders, who are hungering for that amount of spoils represented by what is known as the Briggs contract. They have long fought for this slice of government patronage, and now they are in a fair way to get possession of it very speedily. This contract is for the cartage of goods to the general order stores. It is estimated to be worth $50,000 a year to the holder.—March 16.

Yesterday it leaked out at the custom-house that Ex-Sheriff Clark D. Rhinehart, of Brooklyn, was likely to come in for one of the shares, and that there was strong influence back of him. The story given to account for this new factor in the situation is rather a roundabout one, and has to do, more or less, with the factions in Brooklyn, where the friends of Secretary Tracy and Naval Officer Willis are arrayed against Revenue Collector Ernst Nathan. A month ago Gov. Flower ended the term of William H. Leaycraft as a port warden, an office which he had held since the time of Gov. Cornell. Leaycraft is leader in the nineteenth ward in Brooklyn, and is classed as a friend of Secretary Tracy. At one time he was looked upon as booked for an assistant appraiser-ship, but in the last few days it has been practically settled that he will not get the place. The New York seekers for the Briggs contract figure it out that it is as an offset to delay or failure to bring about Leaycraft's appointment that the scheme to give Rhinehart a slice of the contract and pacify his faction has been evolved. The result is that the leaders in this city are preparing to make the biggest fight they can to keep Rhinehart out, even if he has the support of Secretary Tracy. They are talking of all sorts of rash things if a Brooklyn finger is to be thrust into this particular custom-house pie.—April 9.

The Eleventh Assembly District Republican Association had a meeting last night at its headquarters, Broadway and Thirty-fourth street, which developed such a factional fight that the police were called in, and the meeting broke up in confusion. It is in this district that many republicans protested against machine methods which kept them out of the organization at the recent meeting of the republican county organization. The anti-machine men were in authority at the start last night.

Meantime "the machine" was on the sidewalk, unable to force its way in. Col. Bliss, Charles A. Peabody, S. V. R. Cruger, Alderman Morris, ex-Alderman J. C. O'Connor, and others were trying to get through the disorderly crowd on the stairs. Business was being conducted amid shouts and jeers and hisses. The leaders outside said it was a disorderly mob and they went for the police. Three or four officers came and crowded their way up the stairs.

"Put the Tammany democrats out," shouted some of the machine crowd.

"Put the Tammany police out!" replied some of the anti-machine crowd.

The officers said they could tell a Tammany democrat as soon as they saw him, and they at once began removing such as seemed democrats and passing them down the stairs. There were shouts and yells and a general scramble. The anti-machine men wore white buttons in the lapels of their coats. Some one had told the officers that these were the men to go, and there was a long line of white buttons passed down the stairs. Mr. Milholland stood on a chair and cried out that Tammany Hall had sent the officers to break up the meeting. Others joined in the cry and confusion reigned. When the hall had been cleared the leaders in the district took possession and decided to appoint a committee of five to investigate the trouble. Col. Bliss moved to adjourn and the meeting broke up. Several lively bits of repartee passed between Col. Bliss and Mr. Milholland and others. Col. Bliss said among other things that charges had been filed at Washington against Mr. Milholland for being an offensive partisan while holding a federal office.—March 23.

Considerable surprise was occasioned yesterday by the announcement that the official ax had fallen on the heads of three contract labor inspectors attached to the immigration bureau on Ellis island. John E. Milholland is the chief of the contract labor bureau. This reduction of his force is said to be the outcome of his quarrel with Col. George Bliss and other leaders of the eleventh assembly district.—March 28.

The pretty republican row in the eleventh assembly district, wherein John E. Milholland, with a very good backing, seeks to overturn the Col. George Bliss dynasty, took on a new phase yesterday. Scared at the inroads on their strength which Mr. Milholland had been making, Col. Bliss and some of his followers got together and prepared a circular. The circular, which is a rather remarkable local political document, is as follows:

"Recent occurrences in the eleventh assembly district induce us to make the following statement to the republicans of the district and the state:

"A complaint was presented at the last meeting of the republican county committee charging unfair dealing in the republican association in preventing republicans from joining it and in keeping the roll of members inaccessible. The paper was signed by 39 of the 800 members of the association. Its statements are untrue. No person desiring to become a member has been prevented from so doing longer than was reasonably necessary to inquire into his claim to become such member. The member who presented the paper to the association has himself been found proposing for membership persons who were not eligible. More than a third of the names proposed were found to be those of democrats, persons not residents, or who did not desire to join the association.

"The roll of the association has been always accessible on proper application, but has been kept from those desiring to steal it.

"Prior to the regular meeting of the association on Tuesday last, a gang of ruffians took possession of the room, excluded the officers and proceeded to act as the association. How they were brought to that meeting, and how the gang was made up, is indicated by the following advertisement which appeared in the Herald of that day:

"I can give temporary employment to twenty-five men. Apply to store 438 Fourth avenue."

"The 'store 438 Fourth avenue' is kept by a former member of the association who was expelled under the constitution, and the 'temporary employment' was to capture a republican association's room.

"He was there with them. They were aided by gangs recruited all over the city and paid, or promised to be paid, for going there. The proceedings were openly conducted under the supervision of an officer under the national government, who was not and is not a member of the association, though he and his gang went through the motions of electing him a member.—March 31.

Mr. Thomas C. Platt still lingers in Washington. He met with a series of disappointments this morning which would have disheartened a less seasoned campaigner. First he called at the White House and was informed that the President was unable to see him, owing to the fact that he had an engagement which would occupy several hours.

Mr. Platt pocketed disappointment and started for the treasury department. Yes, Mr. Foster was in, but he was engaged. Would Mr. Platt kindly call in the afternoon? This was the discouraging message New York's republican boss received through the colored gentleman on guard at the secretary's door. Mr. Platt made a virtue of necessity, and a few hours later he was closeted with Mr. Foster. Before evening he contrived to get an audience with Mr. Harrison.

"As stated in The Times this morning, the object of Mr. Platt's visit is to try to patch up peace in the ranks of New York republicans, which has been destroyed by young Mr. Milholland's performance in the eleventh assembly district. When Milholland came here last week to explain away the charges made against him by Col. George Bliss, and substantiated by Col. S. V. R. Cruger, he found that he had tackled an exceedingly difficult undertaking. The Union League Club influence had preceded him, and both the President and Secretary Foster were prepared to take him to task for his actions.

"Mr. Milholland asserted while here that he had smoothed the difficulty over, but later reports show that he was hauled over the coals in the liveliest possible fashion by his superiors. Soon after his return home, his force in the contract labor bureau was reduced and the public was informed that he had been rebuked.

"Now comes Mr. Platt to straighten out the difficulty if he can. He does not want Milholland to be disciplined further, and he wants Col. Bliss and the Union League Club to let the matter drop. He finds the President and the secretary of the treasury, who is his political right bower just now, anxious for peace and willing to sacrifice Milholland if it seems likely that such a course would prove advisable. Mr. Platt discovered that he had a good-sized job on his hands when he interviewed the gentlemen this afternoon. He has arranged for another session with Mr. Foster to-morrow."—March 30.

At 12:25 o'clock this morning information was received at The Times office from persons associated with the Col. Bliss faction in the Bliss-Milholland fight in the eleventh assembly district that Secretary Foster had demanded the resignation of John E. Milholland as supervising immigrant inspector as a result of his opposition to Col. Bliss. If the news is true, a big rumpus in the republican party in this city is very certain to follow. Nearly all of the big republican politicians here sympathize with Mr. Milholland. It will also intensify the interest in to-day's primary in the eleventh district, where the Bliss and Milholland factions will battle at the polls from 9 A. M. until 9 P. M. The election will be held at the Hamilton Club, Thirty-fourth street and Broadway.

The Milholland faction goes in under decided disadvantage. Col. George Bliss controls the organization, and particularly the inspectors of election. Many of the wealthy men in the district are with the Bliss faction.

Since Mr. Milholland has been making the fight against Col. Bliss the latter faction has called for help from the national administration and the official head of Mr. Milholland has been demanded. Mr. Milholland's refusal to sign the letter of withdrawal from the contest and his consequent decision to fight it out at the polls have aroused the Bliss people.

Cornelius N. Bliss said yesterday that it was simply a matter of Mr. Milholland's withdrawal. No compromise would be considered. He charged Mr. Milholland with not keeping faith. It was also declared that the whole matter of Mr. Milholland's removal from office was left by Secretary Foster in the hands of Cornelius C. Bliss, and the latter wrote to Mr. Foster yesterday demanding Mr. Milholland's removal.

John C. O'Connor, jr., chairman of the enrolled republicans of the eleventh district, stirred up a hornet's nest and stepped on a good many respectable republican corns yesterday by writing a letter which in most districts would help Mr. Milholland's cause. For instance, he made this remarkable statement in reference to the famous meeting of March 22:

"What else this gang of hirelings may have contemplated I know not, but I have been informed that prior to the assembly of these worthies it was arranged to overpower the secretary of the regular organization, take his books away by force, and also to pull the president from the chair and throw him out of the window. The window was on the third story. These acts became unnecessary, the officers of the association being unable to make an entry.

"This was the beginning of the Milholland movement. These are the people who comprise the Milholland element. You will readily understand that with the inaugurators of such a movement or the supporters of such people no conference is possible, nor, in my judgment, could any conference be held with them. They are beyond the pale of consideration, political or otherwise."

When asked last night about Cornelius N. Bliss's request for his removal, Mr. Milholland said.

"I have simply to say that I am not in the least surprised. The Col. Bliss crowd have been clamoring for my removal ever since I began the fight against the way in which they managed the district. They may convince the administration that it is its duty to interfere in this little assembly district row, and if they do, I don't think I shall worry much about it. I certainly shall not hesitate for an instant to keep up the fight, nor shall I or my friends, and I have plenty of them, recede one inch from the position that I have taken. I told Cornelius N. Bliss, when I met him at the personal request of Secretary Foster, that all the threats he or his friends could indulge in were wasted upon me, and that the only influence to which I would yield would be that which was presented by Chairman Brookfield, namely, the interests of the party.

"There is not a fair fighter among them. Their circular having proved a boomerang, they rushed off to Washington and tried to have me removed. They say now that they did not pretend to represent the Union League Club in making this request, and they did not threaten to cut off contributions to the campaign if I were not called down, but I say they did, and I can prove it by authority that they dare not question."—April 15.

Republican primaries were held yesterday in all the assembly districts of the city except the twenty-fourth, and men were selected to go to Albany to nominate as delegates to the Minneapolis convention those persons who were long ago selected by "Boss" Platt to perform that service.

In the eleventh assembly district John E. Milholland's effort to overthrow the regular ticket headed by Cornelius N. Bliss was a failure. There was, however, a lively fight all day long for supremacy, and the district was scratched over for voters by the ward-workers with great zeal and vigor.

The Bliss crowd set up a mighty cheer up stairs and down when the result was announced. John E. Milholland and his followers adjourned to their headquarters, on Sixth avenue above Thirty-fourth street, and there Milholland got on a table and made a speech. He accused the Bliss faction of unfair and illegal voting, and declared that the fight would go on.

He said that he had evidence in his possession to show that a number of the Bliss tickets were fraudulently voted.—April 16.

Last night Dr. L. L. Seaman, one of the best-known republicans in the eleventh district, sent a dispatch to President Harrison indignantly protesting against the interference of the administration in the Bliss-Milholland faction fight, as described on another page of The Times. Dr. Seaman also mailed to the President a letter in which he said:

"The newspapers say that Milholland's resignation is demanded, not for neglect of duty or any dishonorable act, but because he failed to arrange matters satisfactory with Bliss. What a text for democratic orators next fall! How they will ring the changes on it! It will be interpreted by the independent element of our party as an unwarranted interference in local affairs by the administration, a repetition of Hillism, an insult to a righteous effort to purify politics, and will be justly rebuked next November by a split in the party at the polls."

Ethan Allen wrote the following open letter on Mr. Milholland's removal:

"I can't refrain from uttering my protest as a republican against the action of the authorities in Washington in the most unwarrantable interference in the primary of the eleventh district yesterday.

"Mr. Milholland had as much right as any voter in the land to resort to fair means and an open fight for the supremacy of his views and wishes. It seems that he was repressed in his manly views by a cabinet minister, and removed from office because he interfered with the motives of a district boss, whose pocketbook at all times seems more powerful than his brains in party management.

"Boss Croker could have done nothing lower nor meaner than was expressed in the demands of this eleventh district republican magnate, nor could Tammany Hall have been more subservient than was the pliant powers of a republican cabinet.—April 17.

There was no lack of interesting features about the republican congressional district conventions which were held last night for the purpose of electing delegates to the republican national convention.

Through the medium of the conventions, T. C. Platt found a way to get a sharp slap at the administration, Col. George Bliss, and Cornelius N. Bliss for the removal of John E. Milholland from his position as supervising inspector of immigrants. Secretary Foster removed Mr. Milholland from his position last Friday because the Bliss faction in the eleventh assembly district demanded it. Mr. Milholland's friends were seeking to overthrow the Bliss dynasty in the eleventh, and that is why he was removed.

The politicians began to ask what Platt would do about all this. His plan only came out at the convention in the sixth congressional district last night.

Mr. Milholland was elected a delegate to the national republican convention with H. O. Armour. Only five days had elapsed between his removal by the administration and his election as a delegate to the national convention at which the head of the administration expects plain sailing to a renomination.

This incident indicates the feeling of the Platt people toward the administration.

With the exception of the delegates chosen from the tenth congressional district, practically all the delegates can be counted on for Platt, and they will be for whatever candidate he may determine, be he Harrison or some other man.—April 20.

Thomas C. Platt is mad. There is no more doubt about this than there is about the more interesting fact that by the removal of John E. Milholland and Charles H. Murray the administration, and especially Secretary Foster, intended to make Platt mad.

Mr. Platt said yesterday that these removals were the funniest things he had ever heard of, because both men removed were delegates to the national republican convention. He calmly averred that there was no politics in Mr. Murray's removal, and yet he said:

"The persons who removed him had not got wind of Murray's election as a delegate to the national convention."

"How about Milholland?" Mr. Platt was asked.

"Mr. Milholland is all right."

"What will he get?"

"Even," said Mr. Platt.

"The administration is quite chummy with me," was another of Mr. Platt's repletions.

Speaking of Mr. Milholland getting even, if nothing else, Mr. Platt said, with fine sarcasm: "I suppose we will have to see Mr. Cornelius N. Bliss and fix it up with him."

When asked about the possibility of Mr. Milholland being reinstated, he said:

"Oh, the administration would never do anything as wise as that."—April 23.

The rupture between Thomas C. Platt and the federal administration is now so pronounced that many officials who are now holding their places in government offices here through the Platt influence are in dire fear for their heads.

It was announced last night that Secretary Foster had followed up the removal of John E. Milholland from the office of supervising inspector of immigrants by dismissing Charles H. Murray, who was counsel to the immigration department at a salary of $8 a day. Murray is ex-supervisor of the Porter census in this city, a man for whom the administration had great use when the count in this city was attacked. He is the republican leader of the third assembly district, and is a protege of Platt.

Murray's removal is a direct slap at Platt, just as the Milholland removal was. It was made just before the congressional conventions were held in this city for the election of delegates to the national republican convention, although Mr. Murray declined to state positively last night just when he received the notification that his services would be dispensed with. He said no charges had been made against him, and no explanation was given him whatever. He was simply notified by Secretary Foster that his services would be dispensed with after April 30—April 25.

The fight between the administration and Thomas C. Platt assumed new proportions yesterday when Immigration Commissioner Weber appointed George K. Gilooly, of Brooklyn, supervising inspector of the immigration bureau in place of John E. Milholland, removed. The appointment was credited to Secretary Tracy, and was another attack on Platt's control of the party in this state. It is rumored that a lot more of Platt's appointees are to go by the board, and the administration is about as unpopular with the machine politicians here as it is possible to make it.

There was something of a rebellion among the other inspectors when the department order making Gilooly supervising inspector was sent out by Mr. Weber. Department orders have to be signed by each of the inspectors to show that they have full cognizance of them.

When a copy of the order was sent to Major S. C. Osborn, he wrote under his signature "Under protest." Mr. Weber called him into his office and asked him what he meant.

Major Osborn said he meant what he had written, and that the appointment was unfair to the other men.

Mr. Weber said this was insubordination.

Major Osborn said he could not help that.

Then Mr. Weber read a lecture to all the inspectors, in which he told them substantially that he was boss there and any one who did not like it could get out.

Some of the other inspectors are in a highly indignant frame of mind. Several of them are the right-hand political workers of such men as Senators Higgins and Allison. Major Osborn is one of Senator Allison's men in Iowa, and Captain C. H. Gallagher is one of Senator Higgin's men in Delaware. Mr. Gallagher was a candidate for Mr. Milholland's place, and so was Colonel "Tim" Lee, who hails from Virginia.

These men are in such an indignant frame of mind that some of them are going to their senatorial patrons and try to get them to take a hand in the row. Some of them expect to be removed because they were friendly to Milholland and because of their action yesterday.

They declare that Gilooly is incompetent and has only worked about one full week since his first appointment, two years ago.

"He did so little work," said one of the inspectors last night, "that some time ago his pay was reduced from $8 to $4 per pay."—April 26.

The following document, which seems to indicate that the Milhollanders are extremely virtuous these days, has been sent to Commissioner Roosevelt at Washington, accompanied by the signatures of 200 or more eleventh district republicans:

"We, the undersigned committee, representing the republicans of the eleventh assembly district, New York, desire to call your attention to the action of certain office-holders of the administration at the primary election held at 107 West Thirty fourth street, in the eleventh district, New York, on the 15th inst.

"Not less than twenty of these individuals took part in this primary, not merely to vote, but labored at the polls from the time they opened at 9 o'clock in the morning until they closed at 9 o'clock at night, neglecting their government duties, and apparently with the approval of their superior officers.

"Four of these officers were inspectors of election on that day, namely:

"George D. Overin, inspector, custom-house.

"James W. Leeds, inspector, custom-house.

"George Finkenbauer, gauger's laborer, custom-house.

"Henry A. Hill, messenger, barge office.

"The rest devoted themselves throughout the day to the work of electioneering for the machine.

"Andrew Peddic, deputy collector internal revenue.

"J. C. H. Smith, watchman, public stores.

"William Graham, gauger's laborer, custom-house.

"John T. Mayers, laborer, public stores.

"Caleb Simms, messenger, custom-house.

"Thomas H. Brown, messenger, public stores.

"Samuel Stokely, messenger, shipping commissioners.

"Benjamin A. Levy, examiner, public stores.

"Sherman Williams, examiner, public stores.

"Edward S. Flow, messenger, public stores.

"Daniel Morrison, public stores.

"William H. Baker, laborer, public stores.

"Robert Edwards, laborer, custom-house.

"Joseph Kirwin, laborer, custom-house.

"James Reilly, laborer, custom-house.

"A. Munson, laborer, custom house.

"Pierre Bargae, messenger, Ellis Island.

"Besides their work on election day, most of these men have canvassed the district for weeks previous to the election, some of them neglecting their government work to do so.

"The facts above stated are so well known that we assume that a mere statement of them is all that is necessary to lay before you. If, however, you need further proof in the form of affidavits, we shall be pleased to furnish them promptly."—April 30.

When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of office-holders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for re-election a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate and intelligent political action which must characterize a government by the people.—[Letter of Acceptance, 1884, Grover Cleveland.

John C. New, of Indiana, the President's able lieutenant of four years ago, who was rewarded with the consul-generalship at London, is said to be coming home to manage Mr. Harrison's campaign at Minneapolis.

The republican state convention met here to-day and was under the complete domination of the federal office-holders. Ninety counties are represented by more than average delegations.

Virgil S. Lusk was elected permanent chairman. It was then proposed to proceed to elect a new state committee, and an attempt was made by the Eaves faction to cut off discussion by calling the previous question. This precipitated a row that for two hours turned the convention into a howling mob.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, April 14.

The full list of delegates to Minneapolis from this state is as follows:

At Large—E. A. White, collector of internal revenue; John C. Dany, colored, collector of the port at Wilmington; Henry P. Cheatham, colored; Congressman Jeter C. Pritchard.

First District—C. M. Bernard and Hugh Cole, colored.

Second—C. A. Cook, United States district attorney; J. H. Hannon, colored, postmaster at Halifax.

Third—G. C. Scurlock and A. R. Middleton, both colored.

Fourth—John Nichols, chief of the mail and files division, treasury department; Edward A. Johnson, colored.

Fifth—Thomas B. Keogh, James A. Cheek.

Sixth—James H. Young, colored, inspector of customs, Archibald Brady, postmaster at Charlotte.

Seventh—Zeb V. Walser, deputy collector, and W. A. Bailey.

Eighth—L. L. Jenkins, postmaster at Gostonia, and Dr. J. A. Wilcox.

Ninth—C. J. Harris and R. W. Logan.

Except when otherwise stated the delegates are white men and hold no federal offices. Of the twenty-two, eight are federal office-holders and have been instructed for Harrison.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, May 8.

The election for delegates to the republican state convention, which was held throughout the state yesterday, was attended by some disorder in this city, and marked the preliminaries of what promises to be a lively fight against the continued rule of the Higgins wing of the republican party here. In the three wards where contesting delegate tickets were run, the Higgins candidates won easily, but the feeling was more intense than was indicated by the poll of votes, and resulted in several spirited rows. One of these, between Letter Carrier Sylvanus, an ardent Higgins advocate, and County Constable Brown, led to a battle at republican headquarters after the election. In the melee the letter carrier was savagely assaulted by Brown and two other constables and brutally beaten. Saturday morning Postmaster David F. Stewart, one of the leaders of the Higgins forces, issued an address to the employes of the post-office, directing their attention to the civil service regulations prohibiting the interference of federal employes in political primaries. In the afternoon, Postmaster Stewart was elected a delegate to the state convention from the tenth ward, with one of his clerks as a colleague, while the employes of the post-office and federal officials generally were conspicuous throughout the city for their eager work at the polls.—Wilmington, Del., Dispatch to New York Times, May 2.

At the republican convention of this state the following office-holders were present: Postmaster Hart, Collector Beard, Appraiser Dodge, Assistant Appraiser Dunham, Clerk Pousland, and the examiner of drugs and two inspectors, all of the custom-house, and a few others not of the custom-house.—Boston Civil Service Record, May.

Yesterday's convention was an office-holder's convention, pure and simple. Nearly every district delegation was represented by two or more office-holders, many of them owing their places to the generosity of President Harrison and incidentally to the influence of Thomas C. Platt. The office-holders from New York formed a veritable army. The custom-house was well represented by all the most influential office-holders. Collector Francis Hendricks, Surveyor George W. Lyon, and Naval Officer Theodore B. Willis headed the list.

Then there were Dennis Shea, deputy collector; Charles H. Murray, ex-attorney for the bureau of immigration; John Collins, deputy surveyor; John Simpson, bureau of immigration; Major W. H. Corsa, clerk of the third judicial court; John W. Jacobus, United States marshal; George B. Deane, custom-house contractor; Clarence W. Meade, police justice; John R. Nugent, food contractor in the barge office;

Barney Biglin, luggage contractor; Gen. Denis F. Burke, internal revenue collector; Charles W. Anderson (colored), clerk in internal revenue office; John H. Gunner, deputy collector; Frank Raymond, deputy collector; J. Thomas Stearns, custom-house auctioneer.

From the city of Brooklyn came Andrew J. Perry, Wallabout land appraiser; J. J. Scheusser, assistant custodian federal building; Theodore B. Willis, naval officer; A. R. Booth of the navy yard, Jesse Johnson, United States district attorney; John Kissel, navy yard; George Buchanan, navy yard; G. N. Dick, internal revenue officer; Ernst Nathan, internal revenue collector; Jacob Mass, secret service bureau; George H. Mason, book-keeper post-office; John E. Smith, secretary to the naval office; John H. Fisher, internal revenue officer; Joseph Benjamin, Wallabout land appraiser.

From the country districts were the following: Albany, Postmaster Gen. J. M. Warner; Allegany, Postmaster Glenn of Cuba; Auburn, Gen. John N. Knapp and Congressman Sereno E. Payne; Columbia, County Judge J. Rider Cady; Cortland, Assemblyman James H. Tripp, who owes his nomination to T. C. Platt; Erie, Assemblyman Mason H. Clark; Onondaga, Postmaster Carroll E. Smith of Syracuse; Postmaster John I. Platt of Poughkeepsie, Internal Revenue Collectors Robert H. Hunter of Poughkeepsie and Charles E. Fitch of Rochester, and a score or more of country postmasters.—Albany Dispatch to New York Times, April 30.

The visit of the honorable the secretary of the treasury to Ohio has not been without fruit. That high functionary is able to report to his chief, as the result of the energetic and faithful performance of the duties for which he was selected, that the administration will be indorsed by the Ohio republican convention, and that the Ohio delegation will support the renomination of Mr. Harrison.—New York Times, April 25.

The republican factions are hard at it again. This time it is the registration for the primaries which forms the bone of contention.

In the old eighth the registration was held in the rear of Thomas Sheridan's saloon, Barclay and Federal streets. The Gary officers were Richard B. Evans and Dorsey Whittaker, and the Johnson man appointed was J. R. Wetherill, but the two other officers did not allow him to take his seat because he did not have his commission and threatened to have him arrested if he persisted in remaining in the room. Sixty-seven names were placed on the poll-books, and of these the Johnson men declare that at least eleven are democrats and can be readily proved so. [Johnson is postmaster.]

In the Ninth ward the registration place was at German and Eutaw streets. The officers were Frank Duhurst and John G. Kipp, both Gary men. John Walters, the Johnson representative, was not allowed to take his seat either. So he and some of his friends contented themselves with standing outside the whole time the officers were there and keeping tab on the applicants for registration who went inside. One of this party of watchers, a federal official, says that twelve men passed the threshold of the door, yet the books show that twenty-three were registered.

In the thirteenth ward the two factions had a free-for-all fight in the registration room. The officers here were Harry Lardowsky, James Robinson and Harry Hartzel, all Gary men. One of these will, however, be relieved next Monday night and John A. Whitney, a Johnson man, put in his place.

John F. Thomas, in the registered letter division of the post-office, went to the registration place, 551 W. Baltimore street, with about a dozen of his friends. They were all refused registration on the grounds that they had not been registered at the last primary. Mr. Thomas said he saw George Conrades, 876 W. Fayette street, registered by the officers while he was there. He knows that Conrades is a democrat.

In the twenty-second ward about the same state of affairs, it is said, prevailed. One of the registration places was at Quaker Lane and Gorsuch avenue. Here again there were only two judges, both Gary men. Arthur Flitten was the Johnson man, but he was not allowed to take his seat. Mr. Flitten and Mouitor Watchman, the latter secretary of the Twenty-second Ward Republican Club, are responsible for the statement that a man whom they recognized as a democrat registered three times under different names last Monday night. The man, they say, changed his hat with his name each time. It is said that he was quite indignant, because he began with a new stiff hat of his own, and wound up with an old slouch belonging to some one else, and did not get his own hat back. His arrest was ordered by the Johnson men, but the policeman on duty there would not take him in charge, as he thought no law covered the case.

United States District Attorney Ensor was applied to for relief but could not give any. Mr. Ensor took Mr. Watchman, who complained, over to State's Attorney Kerr's office, and Mr. Kerr now has the case under advisement. The man, in the meantime, has become very much frightened and has confessed all about the job, saying that he did not know he was violating any law.—Baltimore News, April 9.

The Baltimore republicans held their primaries to-day, and the administration men and anti-administration men had a lively time of it.

The administration leader was Postmaster Johnson, and the opposition was led by James A. Gary, the national committee man and a capitalist, who wants to go to Minneapolis. There were many exciting scenes. In the twelfth ward the Johnson men pulled a Gary judge bodily out of the window, and had him arrested because they said, he was using a registration book of his own make.

In the eleventh ward the hottest fighting of the day took place. Hiram Watty, the colored leader, in a little discussion at the registration office two weeks ago got into trouble and was assaulted. To-day he had his revenge. Last night he stowed away 150 negroes in one house and locked them up. This morning at 6 o'clock he marched them to the polling place. The window did not open until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, but they stood there ten solid hours and carried the day.

The result is not settled to-night because the Gary judges in some wards refused to sign the returns; but the Johnson men have probably carried two legislative districts and the Gary men one.—Baltimore Dispatch to New York Times, April 26.

The delegates to the republican state convention, which will be held to-morrow, have arrived. There is more bitterness than has been displayed in a republican state meeting since 1876, when the convention was in this same town, and when the Blaine crowd was out-general and defeated.

The direct representatives of the administration, the federal office-holders and their men, are clamoring, but they are whipped out of their boots.

The district conventions in Baltimore to-day were more cruptive than usual. In the third the majority made an open assault on the office-holding crowd, who retreated and held a convention all to themselves. The amusing part of the whole situation is that the men whom Mr. Wanmaker and Secretary Foster are apparently protecting against the effect of the civil service laws have been unmercifully defeated, and are trembling, not because they violated civil service rules, but for fear that their failure to carry the city and state will lose them their positions.—Frederick, Md., Dispatch to New York Times, May 3.

* * *

Mr. Gary had carried the state against the federal office-holders and had arranged for an uninstructed delegation, but Southern Maryland, speaking through Captain Potter, bluntly said that all its men would vote against Gary unless the delegates were instructed. There was a stormy scene, and Gary tried every means to escape the demand, but he was finally forced to yield. This work is attributed to Internal Revenue Collector Hill who was not present except through representatives.

In spite of civil service investigation at Washington, Postmaster W. W. Johnson, of Baltimore, was there at work to-day, openly managing his henchmen and directing administration politics.—Frederick, Md., Dispatch to New York Times, May 4.

* * *

The testimony of Postmaster-general Wanmaker and Secretary Foster before the investigating committee regarding the violations of the civil service law in Baltimore, emboldened the office-holders, and the following actively participated in yesterday's convention: W. W. Johnson, postmaster of Baltimore; Dr. Tuck, postmaster at Annapolis; Mr. Mulliken, postmaster at Easton; George L. Wellington, United States sub-treasurer; W. D. Burchinal, surveyor of the port of Baltimore; Mr. Hill, United States revenue collector, and Clay Dodson, deputy revenue collector. To the work of these men is attributed the unexpected result of getting the delegates instructed for Harrison.—Baltimore Dispatch to New York Times, May 6.

The republican state convention, which meets in this city to-morrow, will have a majority of members who have been chosen through the active and persistent effort of federal office-holders, under the direction of Senator McMillan. They have controlled the primaries through a greater portion of state, many of their employees being given a vacation to engage in this work, while the private secretaries of both McMillan and Stockbridge have been serving as field marshals.—Detroit Dispatch to New York Times, April 13.

The republican state convention held in this city to-day was merely a ratification of the slate prepared by Senator McMillan and made a winner through the activity of federal office-holders and their employees in Michigan.—Detroit Dispatch to New York Times, April 14.

There gathered in Springfield early in the week a number of gentlemen who are paid salaries by the United States to attend to certain specific duties, among which the running of state conventions and the supervision of "booms" are not included. These gentlemen are exercising their "pernicious activity" not in obedience to their official superior, the President of the United States—for he is in favor of civil-service reform and the faithful discharge of duty by government officers—but in obedience to the orders of a superior unknown to the law—the senior senator from Illinois. That high dignitary is not on the ground. He remains at Washington and instructs his deputies by telegraph. He sits at the Washington end of the wire and dictates the quantity of ginger in the instructions and the number of rounds of applause with which they shall be received. Persons not in the secret will think that all that is done is the spontaneous act of the republicans of Illinois, but he knows better.

One of the deputy bosses of Illinois is Col. A. C. Matthews, the second controller of the treasury. He has been absent from his post—possibly without leave, certainly without the approval of the President—for the last three or four weeks. During that time he has been endeavoring to convince the republicans of Illinois that they are boiling over with enthusiasm to commit themselves on the presidential question a month in advance. The chief deputy boss, Sub-Treasurer Tanner, is also on the ground. Although he has just been appointed to an important financial office in Chicago, he has spent his entire time for three weeks in the rural "destricts" collaring "enthusiastic" delegates, and by threats, promises and entreaties inducing them to join the spontaneous movement for "instructions" in favor of his chief.

Other deputy bosses are there—Collector Mamer, Collector Hogan, Collector Starr—forgetful of their duty to the government in their eagerness to discharge their duty to the chief boss. Postmasters, pension agents, large and small, gaugers, storekeepers and all the other federal officials and employees are at Springfield, neglecting their duty and outraging the civil service reform feelings of the President.

They have no business there, for they do not attend as republicans, but as deputy bosses, seeking to impose on the convention a policy which pleases the chief boss, but not the mass of the republican voters of the state. They went to the capital to intrigue and terrorize, to hold out to one man prospects of rewards from the chief boss and to threaten another with his displeasure.—Chicago Tribune, May.

The republican party in Cincinnati is now divided into two factions—the government building crowd represented by Amor Smith and McClung, and the George Cox-Foraker element, which seems to be in almost complete control. Both sides are after the delegates to the national convention at Minneapolis. The administration office-holders feel it to be their duty to show Harrison that they represent a majority of the republican voters in the city, while Mr. Cox and his followers are just as anxious to prove the contrary.—South West, April 15.

The refusal of the convention to instruct for Harrison was looked upon as the best indorsement the convention could give Collector Wennecker, now in expectation of removal, at the request of Secretary Noble, for his friendship to Filley.—St. Louis Dispatch to New York Times, May 3.

The republican county convention held here today to select delegates to the congressional district convention, which will send two delegates to the national convention, was one of the liveliest affairs of the kind that ever took place. It was controlled by Gen. George H. Sharpe, through his son, Severyn B. Sharpe is one of Mr. Harrison's office-holders.

In the further proceedings William M. Hayes made a speech accusing Noah Woolven, the Kingston postmaster, of writing letters to postmasters in the rural districts threatening them with removal if they did not send the right kind of delegates to the county convention.

In response to this the postmaster said Hayes was a liar, and also that he had lied in the convention last fall. Mr. Hayes in reply said he had one of Mr. Woolven's letters in his pocket. Mr. Woolven dared him to produce it. In further remarks on the motion, G. D. B. Hasbrouck characterized it as tending to a tyrannical and outrageous use of power, of which only one family, Gen. Sharpe and his son, would be guilty.—Kingston, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, April 19.

The republican convention to elect two delegates to the national convention was held here today. When the delegates assembled vigorous canvassing was in order. Delaware, Ulster and Greene each had a candidate, but it was soon seen that Gen. George H. Sharpe was general manager for both Ulster and Greene counties, through his wide-awake son, Severyn B.

Ex-Assemblyman James Ballatine, of Delaware county, declaimed loudly against office-holders running conventions. He didn't believe it right that a federal office-holder receiving a salary of $700 a year and a postmaster should be forced on the party as their representatives to the national convention. He referred to Gen. Sharpe and Mr. Jacobs of Catskill. It had been agreed that the vote of each county should be cast by the chairman of each delegation. The result of this little game was that Gen. Sharpe of Ulster and J. Leroy Jacobs of Greene each received 18 votes, and George W. Crawford of Delaware 7.—Kingston, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, April 26.

A hot fight is on foot in the republican ranks between the supporters of Ernst Nathan, who holds the office of collector of internal revenue, and Theodore B. Willis, naval officer, and his supporters, over the choice of delegates to the national convention. Nathan, who represents T. C. Platt, and is more than suspected of close affiliations with the democratic leaders in the city, has shown a grasping desire to control the choice of all the delegates, after Willis and his friends had been assured that they would be recognized in the choice. The real purpose of Nathan is to secure the choice of such men as can be controlled in the interests of Platt, and can be used by him to support Harrison's renomination or the choice of some other man, if it should be deemed desirable. The opposition desire the delegates to be firmly bound to support the President for renomination, thus insuring, in the event of his re-election, the continuance of Secretary Tracy in the cabinet. Nathan is accused of treachery, and if the opposition to him can only solidly combine, he will be defeated at the primaries. But the men, to get ahead of the Mephistophelian collector, must rise early.—New York Evening Post, March 26.

* * *

The merry little contest between Internal Revenue Collector Nathan and Naval Officer Willis is going right along, and each side claims to be ahead in the fight for delegates to the national convention. The real contest will be at the primaries and conventions in the latter part of this month, when the leader of each faction will ascertain how many Harrison delegates he can control. Judging from the result or the past week's work Nathan will come very near winning.

Ex-Senator Birkett was the first one taken out, but he was quickly followed by Michael J. Dady, William Buttling and Israel F. Fischer. The latter was a Willis man until recently, but the Nathan bait was too attractive to be resisted. It was an offer of a comfortable job when Harrison begins his second term.

Nathan is waging this fight in his usual way, by depending upon ten or twelve ward bosses instead of upon the enrolled voters who will cast the ballots at the primaries. He expects each of these men to carry his ward and send delegates whom he can control to the conventions.—New York Times, April 10.

* * *

The dispatch relates chiefly to Capt. George J. Collins, who is at present the postmaster of Brooklyn. He was passing through Washington on his way to Fort Monroe for a week's vacation and was interviewed. He told the reporter that he was literally running away from the Brooklyn republican politicians who are just now engaged in a bitter fight for the control of the delegation to Minneapolis. The fight is between Tom Platt and Ernst Nathan, internal revenue collector, on the one side, and Naval Officer Willis, backed by Secretaries Tracy and Elkins on the other. The former pretend to be favorable to Harrison; the latter undoubtedly are so. Capt. Collins declared that he was worn out and could hardly go through another week like the past, so that he had been obliged to ask a week's leave to escape the "onslaught." "I have been," he says, "threatened, browbeaten and persecuted simply because I refused for some time to take action with either faction and desired to preserve harmony among my fellow-republicans of Brooklyn." Capt. Collins, we take it, must be a man of very considerable consequence in Brooklyn politics, but he would hardly have been subjected to such strenuous treatment if he had only his own vote to give at the primaries, or even, we fear, for the influence his personal example might exert. The correspondent explains why Capt. Collins's decision is a matter of such moment to the leaders of the contending factions. He gives a statement of the "patronage" that the postmaster, now moved into a new building, has to dispose of. It is as follows: One assistant custodian, one engineer, one assistant engineer, four watchmen, one janitor, one assistant janitor, eight laborers, six firemen, and finally, twelve charwomen. Here are thirty-five places in all. Capt. Collins having decided to take sides with the Willis faction, it is assumed that these places will be given where they will secure the most votes at the primaries for that faction, and thus promote the nomination to the chief magistracy of the greatest republic of the world of Mr. Benjamin Harrison.—New York Times, April 12.

* * *

The latest developments in the Nathan-Willis fight for control of the local republican machine is the conduct of Postmaster Collins in climbing down on the Willis side of the fence. He has held aloof from the fight as long as possible and has received nothing but the reproaches of both sides. Then he went on to Washington and saw Secretary Tracy, and the result was his declaration against Nathan. The postmastership is not usually worth fighting for, but just now, owing to the opening of the new federal building, he has the power to appoint about thirty-five subordinates, including twelve charwomen, and the great republican party in Kings county is not despising charwomen in these days.—New York Times, April 17.

* * *

The first step toward electing delegates from Kings county to the republican national convention will be taken on Thursday night, when primaries will be held in each ward and town.

From present appearances the fight on that occasion between the Willis and Nathan factions, one representing Secretary of the Navy Tracy, the other Thomas C. Platt, will be bitter.

A report was also circulated by the Nathan people that the employes in the navy yard had been ordered to get out at the primaries and work for Willis or take the consequences.

Naval Officer Willis returned from a trip to Washington on Saturday and, it is said, brought this order from the navy department. Of course, Mr. Willis denied this story, but there were politicians about town who knew men in the navy yard who had decided to do just what this alleged order called for, although until a few days ago they had not favored Willis.

George A. Buchanan, of the twenty-second ward, Brooklyn, was appointed a special treasury agent yesterday. He will serve under Special Agent Whitehead, who is in charge of the office at the custom-house. Buchanan's appointment is credited to the backing of Secretary Tracy, in whose interest he has been active in the squabble between the republican factions in Brooklyn. In fact, the fight across the river is becoming so lively and the demand for patronage is so great that the custom-house and other federal offices in this city are feeling the effects. Anything in the way of any office that is to be had these days is being sought by the Brooklyn leaders.—New York Times, April 19.

The republican primaries in Kings county were held last night, and neither of the factions, headed by Naval Officer Willis and Internal Revenue Collector Nathan, won the great victory which its leaders had predicted. The delegates elected to the assembly and congressional conventions, the former to be held to-night and the latter to-morrow night, will be about equally divided.

Nathan had a formidable combination to oppose, and was regarded as fortunate in having escaped an overwhelming defeat at the hands of men who have grown tired of the Platt management. As it is, he will go to the state convention with more delegates than Willis can control, and, will also name four of the eight delegates to the national convention.—New York Times, April 23.

* * *

The Willis-Nathan fight for control of the republican party in Kings county did not end with the primaries on Thursday night by any means. The various ward leaders were about yesterday working just as hard as ever, and conferences were held with Nathan and Willis all day long.

Willis said that when the conventions are held it will be found that he really won a great victory at the primaries and that some of the delegates who are now supposed to be Nathan men, will vote for his candidates.—New York Times, April 23.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN PLATFORMS.

"The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884 and continued to adhere to the democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because their candidate has broken his. We therefore renew our declaration of 1884, to wit: 'The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.'"

1892.

"We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the republican party of the laws regulating the same."

WE have devoted much space this month to uncovering the motive power which successfully operated the republican national convention, beginning at Minneapolis, June 7. The spoils system was in its full fruition. The successful candidate was successful because through his henchmen he had the convention literally by the throat. One hundred and forty place-holders at the lowest estimate had votes. On the best authority at least three thousand other place-holders gathered around and bore down opposition. All these were led by a place-holder who makes thirty or forty thousand dollars a year out of his place and who came specially from London for this purpose. The whole was superintended by the President who had wires connecting the White House with the convention, and who, as the Indianapolis Journal puts it, was busy "sending and receiving communications from the seat of war." It is to be hoped that our United States executive government has now reached its lowest point of degradation. It would not seem that political pirates and buccaneers could get or would want greater power.

It was not the fault of the President that Quay, Clarkson and Platt were opposed to him in the convention. It is doubtful if any man in the same length of time ever controlled such an amount of patronage as the President gave to each of these men. No doubt he now feels that they bunkoed him out of this spoil, but that is not the game with which the people are concerned. The matter which concerns the people is that before his election the President promised that the reform of the civil service "should be completed by the extension of the reform system already established by law to all grades of the service to which it is applicable." He also promised that "the spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments." All this was promised "to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided." General Harrison was elected, but these promises have not been kept. Was that a confidence game, too?

THE Lord Paramount literally fought his own battle, and with his faithful henchmen he has completely overthrown the greater and lesser barons, Quay, Clarkson, Platt, Wolcott, Miller, Fassett, Pettigrew and others who were in rebellion. His position at the moment of final triumph is described by the Washington special of the Indianapolis Journal, dated June 10.

The center of attraction to-day was at the White House. All the morning the President and his able and faithful lieutenants were busily occupied, as they have been for several days and nights past, in sending and receiving communications from the seat of war.

THE New York Evening Post, of June 9, gives two interesting incidents of the convention from the Minneapolis correspondence of the New York Press. One is a message sent from Washington June 8th, by Mr. Foster, the President's secretary of the treasury, to the Utah member of the national republican committee as follows:

"Whatever you can do for us at Minneapolis will be duly appreciated and gratefully remembered in Washington."

The other was a letter seen in Minneapolis on the same date, from the President's son, Russell Harrison, to E. H. Studebaker, of South Bend, in these words:

"Mr. George A. Halsey, of New Jersey, who is a delegate to Minneapolis, is said to be inclined to favor Mr. Blaine. Will you please use influence with him to get him to support father?"

How platoons and companies of place-holders swarmed to Minneapolis needs little illustration. For example, Land Commissioner Carter, Assistant Postmaster-General Rathbone, United States Marshal Ransdell, Fourth Auditor Lynch and Register Bruce led the Washington contingent. Postmaster Johnson led a club from Baltimore. The President's brother, United States Marshal Carter Harrison, had charge of the Tennessee delegation. Postmaster Thompson and his assistants, Wallace, Patterson, and Woodward, and United States Marshal Dunlap, Pension Agent Ensley, Collector Hildebrand and United States District Attorney Chambers headed the Indianapolis place-holders, while those of New York were led by Postmaster Van Cott, Naval Officer Willis and Collector Hendricks. This was the way throughout the United States.

WHAT were the repeated communications for days and nights to the seat of war? What would the President have to say or authorize to be said to a halting delegate? Again, what was it in relation to tampering with delegates that the Harrison managers threatened the Blaine managers to expose? Would Messrs. New and Michener have us believe that the Blaine managers bought delegates and that they got them back by moral suasion? Why do strong Harrison men who were at Minneapolis come back to Indianapolis and talk that the "southern niggers" were bought three or four times before the final vote?

ON receiving the news of his renomination the President made a short speech to the reporters and others who gathered around him. The burden of his thought naturally would have been that he had fulfilled the promises upon which he was elected in relation to his greatest duty under the constitution—the management of the civil service. But he was clearly not examining himself upon that point.

The weight then greatest upon him was evidently expressed in his words: "I have felt great regret that I was unable to find a suitable place for every deserving friend."

It is proper for every civil service reformer to inquire whether the promises of the republican platform of 1888 have been kept. That part of the platform when adopted was known to have been written by George William Curtis for and adopted in the platform of 1884. It was therefore chosen with deliberation. Its promises are liberal.

At its late meeting in Baltimore the National League provided for a committee to investigate assessment of office-holders and for a committee to investigate the interference of office-holders in campaigns and elections. Upon the first committee Mr. Curtis has appointed John C. Rose, Baltimore, Lucius B. Swift, Indianapolis, C.W. Watson, New York; and George A. Merser, Philadelphia, with one vacancy yet to be filled. Upon the second he has appointed Moorfield Storey, Boston; Lucius B. Swift, Indianapolis; Herbert Welsh, Philadelphia; John C. Rose, Baltimore; and Edward Cary, New York.

MR. CHARLES A. LEWIS, of this city, has taken up, on a large scale, the distribution in Indiana of the address of Mr. Curtis at Baltimore. Any one desiring to co-operate may communicate with him. This is important in order to keep the distribution systematic. Mr. Lewis has had some whole counties listed, and will there completely cover the field. Will not some of our Fort Wayne, Evansville, and Terre Haute friends join in this matter? The price is $18 a thousand, and orders should be sent to John Hemsly Johnson, Box 793, Baltimore.

HARPER'S WEEKLY of June 4, answering a correspondent in relation to the relative merits of Harrison and Cleveland, says:

"This is the test by which Mr. Harrison is to be tried. He had behind him what Mr. Cleveland had not, a strong reform sentiment in his own party, with the most vehement party declaration for reform, and the most unconditional party pledge to keep its pledges, with its own detailed and specific engagements, some of them made a year or two before in censure of Mr. Cleveland's course. Practically, Mr. Harrison has kept none of these pledges, although the reform, impelled by public opinion, has advanced decidedly during his administration. * * * The President has sustained examinations under the law as Mr. Cleveland did. He has supported the commission as Mr. Cleveland did, except that Mr. Harrison has not adopted its most important recommendation, that for the dismissals in Baltimore. He has extended somewhat the classified service, as Mr. Cleveland did."

Many reformers will not balance the accounts in this manner. They will say that Mr. Cleveland amply supplied any lack of party pledges in favor of civil service reform with his own written pledges in different forms and shapes, and that he was elected in reliance upon his personal pledges, which the constitution gave him ample powers to keep. That a President is in no sense a trustee of his party with a duty to look out for its welfare, but that it is his duty to conduct his part of the government upon business principles without regard to party advantage. That Mr. Cleveland let his civil service commission go to the dogs. That it is impossible to compare favorably his administration of the civil service law with that of Mr. Harrison; otherwise, however, the two administrations are not greatly different. But they will also say that favorable comparison with the preceding administration is not the true test. That the question is, What ought the President to have accomplished? That the sum of all favorable allowances is insignificant by the side of the fact that in distinct violation of his own and his party pledges the President has refused to extend the classified service, and has divided more than 100,000 federal offices as spoil among his relatives and personal friends and among a pestiferous and dangerous set of political manipulators, and has shamelessly used the offices to secure renomination, and ought not to have his acts ratified by re-election. That Mr. Cleveland was defeated, and therefore his acts were not ratified. That he is undoubtedly sincerely in favor of civil service reform. That he can look for no future renomination or re-election. That he will probably profit by experience. That he knows that the democrats who wrung the most spoil from him before do not want him for president, and he will not be likely to yield to them again. That, in short, the advantage to civil service reform in the next four years would be much greater with the defeat of Harrison and the election of Cleveland. That in saying this they mean to be understood as expecting more of the latter than was expected of Harrison for the reason that the standard of requirement of abstention from spoil is constantly being raised and that it is about time that a president should comprehend that the use of any office as spoil is unconstitutional and is in violation of his oath, and that it is his first duty to devise and enforce plans totally exterminating the whole practice—and this without regard to what he or the platform has said.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"To the Victor Belong the Spoils."

THE LORD PARAMOUNT.

I am an advocate of civil service reform. My brief experience at Washington has led me to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens. * * * [Senator Benjamin Harrison.]

Only conceive such a lure held out to this great people, and all the little offices of the Government thus set up for the price of the victory, without regard to merit or anything but party services, and you have a spectacle of baseness and rapacity such as was never seen before. No preaching of the Gospel in our land, no parental discipline, no schools, not all the machinery of virtue together, can long be a match for the corrupting power of our political strifes actuated by such a law as this. It would make us a nation of apostates at the foot of Sinai.—From a Sermon by Rev. Horace Bushnell, in 1840.

"I do not want federal office holders at the Minneapolis convention," was the order which the President issued last week, and forthwith Secretary Foster, Secretary Elkins and a number of other prominent officials announced their determination not to attend. If the President is really in earnest in this matter, there will be considerably over one hundred absent delegates. It is a fact that at the convention which is to meet to select the republican candidate for the presidency one man in every eight will be a federal office-holder, appointed by President Harrison who is himself a candidate for nomination.—Washington Post, May 22.

"I do not believe that individual disappointments will control the convention at Minneapolis."—From President Harrison's talk with the World's Washington correspondent, May 26.

* * *

The remark about "individual disappointments" indicates how thoroughly the President misapprehends the nature of the opposition to his candidacy, and also how wise is the American system of frequent changes in the personnel of the government. It is astonishing how quick and easy is the process by which a man comes to look upon the place he holds as his private property. He becomes accustomed to the exercises of power, and to the homage which follows in the train of high authority, and he soon regards it as little less than impious to suggest that he would better make way for another. * * Now I am what our mugwump friends delight to stigmatize as a "practical politician." I look at things as they really are. * * The charge against Mr. Harrison's supporters can not so easily be set aside. It is a much to be regretted fact that the President has placed his campaign in the hands of those who hold office under him, and has even recalled men from their posts abroad. It will be a serious matter, if, by any chance, he should be nominated, should this fact give rise to the charge that he was forced to give his campaign to these men because he could get no others to assume the task."—From Tom Platt's Answer, United Press Dispatch, May 31.

* * *

"I do not look for a snap judgment on the part of the Minneapolis convention," said Mr. Miller. "There will be no 'stampede' of the delegates. I have no doubt that President Harrison will be renominated."

"Have you anything to say of the remarks of President Harrison printed in the World to-day?"

"No, although perhaps I may say that some of the 'individual disappointments' to which General Harrison refers are felt by gentlemen for whom much has been done. There are men for whom you can not do enough. Load them with favors, and like the often quoted 'daughter of the horse-leech,' they are not satisfied. Such men become disappointed. Disappointment may possibly develop a revengeful state of mind. When the President says that disappointment will not prevail at Minneapolis, I quite agree with him."

"The President says he has declined to call on his friends for assistance. What are his friends doing?"

"His friends, personal and political, need no requests, no stimulation. They are going before the convention and they will present his name for renomination. They do not anticipate any sensations or stampedes."—From the World's Washington Correspondent's Interview with Attorney-General Miller, May 29.

There are already many Harrison men in Minneapolis prepared to do missionary work among the delegates as soon as they arrive, and others are preparing to get away in a day or two. Nothing more has been heard of the alleged order which Mr. Harrison issued last week calling upon office-holders to remain away from the convention. There are more than 100 of these who will be seated as delegates. A prominent republican said this evening in regard to this matter:

"The President was not aware that so many men who draw pay from the government had been selected as delegates. When he discovered that the office-holding class was to have such a large representation he was very much dissatisfied. But, if he contemplated issuing any such order as was reported, it must soon have occurred to him that it would be not only impracticable, but decidedly hazardous at this stage of the game. So he decided to take no action. I think it was the wisest thing he could do under the circumstances. He would be playing into the hands of his enemies by adopting any other course."—New York Times, June 1.

President Harrison's telegraphic facilities for reaching the men who are engineering his fight have been increased. A wire has been put into the White House which will give instant communication with the leaders in Minneapolis. Expert operators have been employed and bulletins will be sent direct to the executive mansion by the telegraph companies. This and some other incidents would seem to indicate that the President is very much absorbed in the question. For some reason he saw fit not to go to Gettysburg to-day, as he had half promised to, but remained within easy reach of his wire. The arrivals of his friends and enemies at Minneapolis are duly noted.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, June 2.

There are two sensations in the air here. The first is caused by the publication of the authorized dispatch of the associated press announcing that Blaine will write no more letters. This is interpreted to mean that he will put nothing further in the way of the men who are resolved to make him a candidate. It has frightened the Harrison contingent very badly. They had already begun to weaken, and they now show signs of staggering. Two of their most earnest workers are on the ground in the person of John R. Lynch of Mississippi, the colored orator, and Thomas Carter of Montana. Mr. Lynch is fourth auditor of the treasury and Mr. Carter is commissioner of the general land office. Mr. Carter, although an office-holder himself, is too shrewd and long-headed a politician not to recognize the gross folly of the President in using the creatures of his executive favor, and the White House family influence, to push his interests in Minneapolis. It was first arranged that "Prince" Russell Harrison should come on here and work with the Montana delegation for his father, but Mr. Carter made a personal visit to the White House, it is understood, to insist upon the President's putting his veto upon this scheme. His arguments prevailed and the young man was kept at home. Mr. Carter came here to look the field over and see what the chances looked like. He has made his canvass, and the result is that he has run up the danger signal. In response to this a car-load of office-holders will be poured into this city at once to direct and lead the forlorn hope. Most of them will come from Washington and be clothed with the insignia of Presidential authority. The arrangement, before Mr. Carter left Washington, was that these office-holders were to be kept at home unless the Harrison cause looked deplorably blue. Their release, therefore, wears an ominous aspect.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Evening Post, June 5.

* * *

"Mr. George A. Halsey, of New Jersey, who is a delegate to Minneapolis, is said to be inclined to favor Mr. Blaine. Will you please use influence with him to get him to support father?"—Letter of Russell Harrison to E. H. Studebaker, New York Evening Post, June 9.

President Harrison's two brothers—J. Scott Harrison, of Kansas City, and Carter Harrison, of Nashville—are here.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 9.

* * *

The center of attraction to-day was, of course, the White House. All the morning the President and his able and faithful lieutenants were busily occupied, as they have been for several days and nights past, in sending and receiving communications from the seat of war.—Indianapolis Journal, Washington Dispatch, June 10.

* * *

Word was given to a pronounced Harrison man in each of the delegations to notify only the members from his state who were known by him to be friendly, and wherever the chairmen were favorably inclined they were asked to make a careful poll and bring with them all those who were sure to go for Harrison. By a quarter to 1 o'clock this afternoon the dingy hall was fairly packed with delegates, the only outsiders present being a few members of the national committee, perhaps a dozen gentlemen who have been here from the first in General Harrison's behalf, and the Journal's correspondent. The door was guarded by Sam Miller, son of Attorney-General Miller, Gerald Pierce, of North Dakota, and B. Wilson Smith, of Indiana, and each delegate as he entered the hall gave his name, state and preference for the presidency.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 10.

The news which they received was said to be uniformly favorable. About noon the premises were invaded by a company of newspaper correspondents and other privileged individuals, who established themselves in the rooms and hallways of the upper story and awaited fateful tidings with as much composure as they could muster. The President, meanwhile, was in his private office surrounded by the members of his cabinet, who received every few minutes the successive telegrams from Minneapolis and made calculations from them. Secretary Tracy kept the tally-sheet, Secretary Elkins and Attorney-general Miller did the heavy figuring, and the other cabinet officers rendered whatever assistance they could. In the telegraph room across the hall, Private Secretary Halford took down the first draft of the figures as they came over the wire, and sent duplicates in to the President. The room was full of subordinate officials, newspaper men and other interested parties. Postmaster-general Wanamaker made excursions from one room to the other, and did some very accurate and business-like figuring from time to time.

For three hours or more, during the long struggle, characterizing the ballot, the most intense excitement prevailed in the upper rooms. Until about four o'clock it seemed to the White House people there would be no choice on the first ballot, and there were many speculations and criticisms in regard to the strength displayed by the McKinley vote. After Ohio and Pennsylvania had been passed, however, the probabilities of the President's immediate success dawned upon the company and caused a flutter of pleasant anticipation, in the midst of which, at exactly ten minutes past five, the record of the roll-call was momentarily interrupted as the telegraph instrument ticked out the words: "Harrison is nominated." At once there was a shout, and all those in the room, including the postmaster-general and Private Secretary Halford, rose and made a rush for the President's room.—Indianapolis Journal, June 11.

When he was congratulated last Friday night on his renomination, the most noteworthy thing the President found to say was:

"I have felt great regret that I was unable to find a suitable place for every deserving friend; but I have insisted that I did not disparage those I could not appoint to place." —Indianapolis Journal June 11.

* * *

The President is reported by a simple-minded organ as being "deeply grieved" at the action of Senator Chandler in declaring for Blaine, despite the fact that all the "good things" in New Hampshire had been freely at his disposal. In like manner he is said to be "much pained" at the ingratitude of ex-Minister Langston in turning on his "benefactor," and working among the colored men for Blaine, notwithstanding the patronage conferred upon him by Mr. Harrison.—New York Evening Post, June 16.

THE CHIEF HENCHMAN.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or fendatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of fendatories was always ready, enlisted and mutually prepared to muster.—Blackstone.

Counsel-General John C. New arrived Saturday afternoon on the City of Chicago. When asked his views on the presidential situation, he said: "Harrison will be renominated and will be elected. I am so certain of his being the choice of the convention that I shall have nothing whatever to do with influencing delegates to the convention in his favor. It is a mistake to say that my object in coming home at this time is to manage the canvass of President Harrison at Minneapolis. That has been said of every minister and consul who has got leave of absence and come home. It is natural that all of them, good republicans as they are, should desire to be at home and attend the convention. I should very much like to attend myself, for I believe my place is there. I have attended every national convention since 1856, with the exception of that of 1864. I feel all the more desirous to go this time, because I am the oldest member of the national committee.—New York Dispatch to Indianapolis News, May 23

Gen. John C. New took hold of the President's interests in earnest to-day. He spent most of the day at the White House in conference with Harrison and Elkins. To-night there was a meeting in his room at the Shoreham of a number of administration men. Mr. Elkins dropped in for a few minutes to see that the arrangements for an aggressive campaign were well under way. Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Rathbone was one of the gentlemen who met Mr. New. The conference continued until a late hour, and a number of people who called to see Mr. New were told that he was busily engaged.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, May 25.

Consul-General New reached home yesterday afternoon to remain a few days before going to Minneapolis. Mr. New had but little to say yesterday regarding political movements which has not been already reported. When asked as to the probability of Robert T. Lincoln being named in the convention, he said he was authorized to state that Mr. Lincoln would not be a candidate. As to Mr. Blaine he knew nothing of his intentions except as they have been expressed in his letter and his interviews.—Indianapolis Sentinel, May 28.

John C. New, consul-general at London, one of President Harrison's most trusted political lieutenants, reached Chicago to-day, en route to Minneapolis. He will probably remain in Chicago until Wednesday. Speaking of the permanent chairmanship of the convention, Mr. New said: "Mr. Harrison's friends have no candidate. Any one of several names suggested would be acceptable. Major McKinley, who has been mentioned, would suit very well." The executive committee of the republican national committee will be here to-morrow, and Mr. New may have some suggestions to make to them as to the appointment of a temporary chairman of the convention, which is in the hands of the committee.—Chicago Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, May 30.

The early opening of the Harrison headquarters is a surprise to the Blaine men, who expected to be first when they came in with the national committee to-morrow. In short, the President's friends have stolen a march on the Blaine boomers, and their sudden arrival means fight from start to finish. It is said that their unannounced arrival and quick opening of headquarters was at a telegraphic suggestion from Washington. President Harrison had got his back up and the men sent here and to come to-morrow are the same ones who did so much for Harrison's nomination in 1888. Gen. Michener and John C. New will be in command.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 1.

* * *

About the time that this group of anti-Harrison men arrived, Gen. John C. New, consul-general to London, arrived with Harry S. New and a few of Harrison's Indiana friends. These men diluted a little the flood of journalists that had crowded through the corridors of the West Hotel without much admixture of statesmanship and politics for twenty-four hours. The managers had not been here long before they began to talk sharply about one another.

Gen. New finds something in Col. Conger that exasperates him. Col. Conger has said, in an interview, that Harrison's interview, in which he spoke of the opposition of the disappointed, placed him on an equal footing with Blaine regarding an instructed delegate. Gen. New does not like that. He says:

"Col. Conger knows better, and ought to tell the truth. He understands English well enough to know that the contents of the President's letter bears no resemblance to the Blaine epistle, and means moreover that Mr. Harrison wants a renomination.

"The trouble about Col. Conger is that he has a political sore toe and is showing it all over because his man was not appointed postmaster at Akron. The President chose to take the advice of the Ohio senator instead of Conger, a private citizen. Hence Conger's attitude of opposition to the President. I don't approve of Col. Conger's conduct, nor of the opposition to Harrison by a man who hasn't brains enough to see straight over his eyeglass."—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 2.

John C. New, and A. L. Conger of Ohio, Blaine leader, had an encounter in one of the corridors of the West Hotel last night. They had been talking at one another through the newspapers, but had not met before.

"I know what is the matter with you, Conger," said New. "You didn't get your man appointed postmaster at Akron. That is all there is to it, and that is the only explanation of your anti-Harrison attitude."

Conger replied indignantly, and the words ran pretty high, though both men kept their tempers.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Evening Post, June 3.

The Harrison men were stirring at seven o'clock, and an hour later they had begun their work in the state delegations. The admirable organization of the President's forces compels the admiration even of his enemies. For more than a week the whole convention membership has been blocked out by state delegations and each block has been put in charge of a trusted lieutenant of John C. New. These lieutenants have reported to Mr. New three and four times a day, and as often they have talked with the Harrison men in their delegations and reported immediately any sign of weakness. The greatest argument which Mr. New has used from the beginning of the canvass is the table of votes by states. It was made up as soon as he arrived in Minneapolis, and it has been revised every day. To every doubtful delegate the Harrison men have displayed this table, urging him at the same time to "get into the Harrison bandwagon." The table has been the strongest argument to bring recruits, and the strongest argument to hold doubtful Harrison men in line. On every man who was not sworn to support Harrison right through the fight, the idea has been impressed as strongly as possible that it was only necessary to hold the assured Harrison strength together and his nomination on the first ballot was certain. The final coup came yesterday when Mr. New brought his forces together in caucus for a showing of strength. This meeting was held less for the purpose of giving Mr. New assurance of Harrison's strength than for the purpose of holding the Harrison men in line just before the test vote was made. As soon as the meeting was over the Harrison men spread the story of it through the corridors of the hotel and about the state headquarters. It created an enthusiasm which undoubtedly had its effect on the first ballot in the convention last night. The second ballot showed the moral effect of the first for it increased the apparent strength of Mr. Harrison and gave renewed confidence to his managers. They found when they started in this morning that it needed little encouragement to hold their men in line.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Evening Post, June 10.

John C. New, who has figured as largely as anybody in Harrisonian councils, was in fine spirits. He said that the President has given the country a splendid, safe, honest and courageous administration. He had the people with him and he would be elected. Mr. New said he had made a hard fight and had to meet men who were skillful opponents, but he had nothing to say against them.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

* * *

The evening trains brought back to the city a goodly number of tired pilgrims. They have practically the same story to tell. They are all for Harrison now, or, at least, with few exceptions, they say they are. Hon. John C. New, who arrived to-day, says the prospect for victory was never better. After calling on the President Mr. New visited the state department, and left Washington at 4 o'clock for New York. He sails on Wednesday for London.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 14.

* * *

The battle at Minneapolis has been fought over and over several times to-day at the White House. The door to the President's private room has been swinging inward at frequent intervals, and the victorious generals have been telling the President just how it was brought about that they and their brother office-holders carried the Harrison banner to victory.

Col. A. M. Hughes, the chairman of the Tennessee delegation, was there to-day. Two members of the Virginia delegation and Col. John C. New have also reported. Colonel New, it is announced, will soon go back to his duties as consul general at London, which position, it will be remembered, he left, as he said, on a short leave of absence "to attend to some private matters," some weeks ago.

Colonel New's meeting with the President is said to have been unique. For the first time in all the excitement of the past two weeks the President is said to have shown some signs of melting and to have displayed some emotion. At all other times he has been as cool and calm and unmoved as the Washington Monument. He is said to have listened while Colonel New told him how Platt, Clarkson and Quay, and the others of their crowd, had set up the Blaine image and commanded all the people to fall down and worship, like the scriptural king who built the great golden image in the plain of Babylon.

There is a story that the President, drawing from his store of scriptural knowledge, carried the incident to its climax by recalling that the old king after it was all over, was forced to "eat grass as oxen," and it is gossiped that up in the White House there was a good laugh at the figure of Platt and Quay thus humiliated. Colonel New having completed his matters of personal business is scheduled to return no later than the last of this week.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, June 14.

* * *

Gen. John C. New, United States consul-general at London, who came to the United States "on a little private business" a short time ago, was at the Gilsey House yesterday. Very few persons called upon him. Those who did were not members of the New York delegation to Minneapolis.

"I met Tom Platt on the street when I went out this morning," said Gen. New, "and he said it was all right."

"With regard to supporting the republican ticket?" Gen. New was asked.

"Oh, yes. Mr. Platt said he was in favor of the ticket—now."

"Will Mr. Platt do any active work for Mr. Harrison?"

"It doesn't make any difference whether he does or not. Mr. Platt and myself have been in conventions for twenty years. We have fought together for our man. We have, politically speaking, starved for our man. But that is all past. Mr. Platt's dice on this occasion were not loaded. He made a mistake. But he told me he would support the ticket."

"Will the men who supported Blaine at Minneapolis stand up for the ticket during the campaign?"

"Well, I saw a telegraphic interview with Mr. Clarkson, who still remains in Minneapolis, in the Philadelphia Press yesterday. In that interview Mr. Clarkson showed more temper and less judgment than I should have expected of him. He said, for instance, that Harrison was only nominated by the aid of copious promises of offices by myself and Mr. Depew, and that the men who already held office were given assurance of four years' further tenure of their jobs. Mr. Clarkson even said that the mission to St. Petersburg was to be one of the rewards of Harrison's best worker.

"Didn't I work pretty hard for Ben Harrison at Minneapolis? Well, I'm going back to London to-morrow morning. I was offered the St. Petersburg mission three years ago. If I wanted to go to Russia couldn't I have gotten the assignment?"

"Mr. Clarkson says that the St. Petersburg mission was offered to three men when he first took hold of the national committee," said the reporter.

"Mr. Clarkson said so, did he? Have you figured up where Mr. Clarkson will be, politically speaking, a year hence, when the republican party will once more resume its regular business of making history? Some of the newspaper men compared Mr. Clarkson at Minneapolis with Puck, Cupid, Ariel, and so on. The newspaper men struck it about right. Mr. Clarkson has a wand that doesn't wield. In Iowa they worship false gods occasionally. Mr. Clarkson might get into the Iowa legislature some time for that reason."

"Is there any possibility of the republican split healing before November?" Gen. New was asked.

"Split? There hasn't been any split. The fellows that shrieked for Mr. Blaine will be out-doing themselves, two months hence, in the style of their bell-crowned high white hats. There wasn't any bitterness. There wasn't any split. The men whom I have mentioned as being insane on the Blaine subject have lost their grip utterly unless they fight for the republican nominee."

"Shall you be in this country between now and November?"

"My private business may call me here within a short time."

"It has been said that in your interview with Mr. Harrison yesterday a certain scriptural king who ate grass was mentioned."

"I never saw any pasture lands at Bar Harbor," said Gen. New, "and I have been there several times. But I want to say that there was not the least sort of an alfalfa tone to my conversation with Mr. Harrison yesterday."

"Were you in any wise responsible for the result at Minneapolis?"

"No, sir. As a citizen of Indiana I did my duty. Chauncey Depew touched all the buttons. He's the only man in America that can touch a button and secure results without his actual presence."

Gen. New and his daughter will sail for Europe this morning.—New York Times, June 15.

* * *

Gen. John C. New, United State consul in London, who helped to manage the Harrison campaign at the Minneapolis convention, sailed yesterday for his post by the steamer City of New York. He was accompanied by his daughter, and wore in the lapel of his coat a new badge with a silver grandfather's hat attached. There was no delegation to see him off, but on board he met the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, who is a passenger on the same steamer. Gen. New hopes to come over again when the campaign becomes lively.—New York Times, June 16.

UNDER-HENCHMAN CARTER.

It is only a few weeks since Senator Pettigrew (Rep. S. D.), because of alleged neglect at the hands of the administration declared that he would so fix matters that the eight delegates to be selected would be opposed to the renomination of the President. His challenge was accepted by Land Commissioner Carter, who went to South Dakota, and the liveliest political skirmish the state has known for some time took place. The result was the complete defeat of Pettigrew. The eight men selected are pledged to the support of Harrison. Pettigrew himself will not deny this. Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, May 29.

* * *

Soon after noon Land Commissioner Thomas H. Carter arrived at the West Hotel from St. Paul. He has come from Washington with his wife and baby on his way to Helena, and will interrupt his journey long enough to see the convention get under way. He is a strong arm to the Harrison men, better perhaps than Clarkson and Fassett together, and almost a match for Platt and Fassett.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 2.

* * *

All day Harrison men were being sent out to buttonhole delegates and others, and principally Land Commissioner Carter and Mr. Michener were on hand to receive the assurances of those who came in. Mr. Carter said: "We are perfectly serene. The people at headquarters are absolutely confident. They have received assurances that their delegations are going to stand firm."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 6.

I have just seen Land Commissioner Carter who is looking cheerful. In answer to my question as to how things were going, he said: "We are as strong as ever. The Harrison line is without a break anywhere. We have our own notions of the action of the national committee in slating men for the temporary organization who have no right to be there, but it has not yet reached the point where it will hurt us. We know our men, and can count our votes on paper in plain figures. We can whip those fellows, and we are going to do it. We shall waste no time or energy on side issues or preliminaries. When the fighting begins we shall all be there and the other fellows won't."—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Evening Post, June 7.

* * *

The chief of President Harrison's triumvirate in Minneapolis is Land Commissioner Carter. After consultation with the other two, Michener and New, he summed up the situation in their headquarters to-day just before leaving for the convention for the day's battle. Carter and Michener had been in conference several times before since daybreak with Senator Cullom and other prominent Harrisonians, and they have arrived at an understanding as to the policy to be adopted before the convention in regard to the Blaine tactics of the day. Mr. Carter said:

"We fully realize that the opposition to the President dare not go to a vote between the President and Mr. Blaine, as the President would defeat him by 100 majority on a square vote. Under these circumstances we expect that the opposition will employ means at their command to put off the ballot on candidates. We do not intend to interpose any objections to the employment of all the time that any reasonable person may consider necessary for the investigation of questions at issue on credentials and the perfection of permanent organization, but when it becomes obvious that dilatory tactics are being employed to keep the convention from expressing its free voice, we are satisfied that the convention will take the matter in hand and dispose of all frivolous and dilatory opposition in very short order."—Minneapolis Dispatch, New York Evening Post, June 8.

* * *

In answer to further inquiries Mr. Depew said he and the President had talked over the fight at Minneapolis as a matter of history. History is always an interesting subject, said he, especially when it is inside history. There were some men who had done excellent work at Minneapolis and had not received due credit for it in the newspapers, and Mr. Depew took care that the President was fully informed with relation to these men. Among others he mentioned were Michener of Indiana, "Long" Jones of Chicago, and Thomas H. Carter [laud commissioner] of Montana, all of whom rendered valuable services.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 19.

AN ARMY OF FEUDATORIES.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

United States Marshal Ransdell will go to Minneapolis to help out Harrison.—Washington Dispatch to Courier Journal May 27.

B. W. Smith, postmaster of La Fayette, Ind., talked warmly for Harrison, and it is astonishing how many Harrison votes the letter of resignation made in La Fayette yesterday.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 6.

* * *

Postmaster C. R. Higgins, of Fort Wayne, who has been an industrious hustler for Harrison, as in duty bound, is known as an incorrigible wag. The other day, when the news of Mr. Blaine's resignation was received at the Harrison headquarters, an eloquent silence fell upon the boomers therein assembled. It lasted for half a moment, and until broken by Mr. Higgins's exclamation: "Well, I have got no use for a man who will resign a good office until he has a sure thing on a better one."—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 7.

* * *

Higgins is postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., and Greiner is postmaster at Terre Haute. Higgins is for Harrison: Greiner is supposed to be for Blaine, and wears a Blaine badge. Higgins meets Greiner, falls into an argument with him about the merits of the candidates, and Greiner is convinced, takes off his Blaine badge, and becomes a Harrison convert. This happens several times a day in localities discreetly selected.—New York Times, June 6.

Col. D. S. Alexander, of Buffalo, United States district attorney, and formerly of Indianapolis, arrived yesterday. After an hour's conference with General Clarkson, he said: "I believe

Mr. Harrison will be nominated, and I feel certain Mr. Blaine's name will not go before the convention in any form. Clarkson, Quay and Fassett are not sweating the dye off their suspenders to nominate Blaine. They are working for the defeat of Harrison, and there is now a movement on foot of which you will hear within twenty-four hours, by which it is hoped to nominate a third man whose name I am not at liberty to give you. Blaine will not be heard of in the convention."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 7.

* * *

At a meeting of the Ohio delegation this afternoon twenty-nine votes were pledged for Harrison, against seventeen for Blaine. The boasted Foraker strength did not pan out. Immediately after the meeting Col. D. S. Alexander [United States district attorney], of Buffalo, formerly of Indianapolis, met Governor McKinley, and asked him what he would do about the effort of the opposition to the President to force a McKinley boom. "It will not materialize," was the reply. "I shall take occasion to suppress it."—Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

* * *

Business about the federal building this week is quiet almost beyond precedent. Judge Baker, District Attorney Chambers, Assistant District Attorney Cockrum, Marshal Dunlap, Postmaster Thompson, Assistant Postmaster Wallace, S. G. Woodward, chief of the money order department of the post-office, and others perhaps of those having offices in the building are at the republican convention at Minneapolis.—Indianapolis News, June 9.

* * *

The Columbia club delegation [of Indianapolis] arrived this morning. The patriots looked quite natty, and have been on dress parade all day, admiring themselves immensely. These office-holders are the leading features in this kid-gloved galaxy of youth, beauty and virtue. U. S. Marshal Dunlap, Pension Agent Ensley, Assistant District Attorney Cockrum, Postmaster Thompson and three of his assistants, Wallace, Woodward and Patterson, are among the party, and even Collector Hildebrand came along. [All Indianapolis office-holders.] Among other arrivals of the day were D. S. Alexander, U. S. district attorney at Buffalo, formerly of Indianapolis, and Harrison's private secretary during the campaign of '88, and Judge Taylor, of Fort Wayne, Mississippi river commissioner.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 6.

* * *

Smiley Chambers [United States district attorney] and Hugh Hanna are in charge of the public Indiana headquarters.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 6.

Dan Ransdell [marshal District of Columbia] said: "We are in excellent shape, and I firmly believe the President will be nominated on the first ballot. The opposition has the noise here to-night, but we have the votes."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

For the first time the Columbia Club went wild for Benjamin. Rhody was lifted upon the shoulders of U. S. Marshal Dunlap and Postmaster Thompson and carried through the lobby at the head of the procession, which the Columbians instantly formed. Rhody waved a huge picture of Harrison at the end of a fifteen-foot pole. For fifteen minutes the Columbians circled about Rhody and Ben's picture like Indian ghost dancers, singing:

Every mother's son from Maine to Oregon
Is a son of a gun if he don't vote for Harrison.

Suddenly Rhody jumped off the shoulders of Dunlap and Thompson and made a dash for a colored delegate who happened to be so unfortunate as to catch Shiel's eagle eye. Placing his arm around the negro's neck, Rhody disappeared toward the bar, and the ghost dance broke up. Then a quartet, consisting of Bruce Carr, O. H. Tripp of North Vernon, Postmaster De Motte of Valparaiso, and Postmaster Greiner of Terre Haute, went from one street corner to another repeating the refrain of the song, "Every mother's son," etc.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 9.

* * *

The Harrison men at the Indiana headquarters were wild with enthusiasm this afternoon. They say their faith in the Harrison boom has developed into positive knowledge. The following message was sent whizzing over the wires to the White House expressive of the feeling which permeated the Harrison contingent:

E. W. Halford, Washington, D. C.:

The Harrison delegates have just had a meeting in Market Hall, presided over by Chauncey M. Depew. A roll-call by states showed 521 votes for the President, not counting contested seats. He will be nominated at the first opportunity to ballot.

D. M. RANSELL,

[Marshal District of Columbia.]

—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 9.

* * *

Hon. Smiley N. Chambers [United States district attorney], was then introduced. He looked as if he had done a hard day's work, and his voice was husky. When the applause that greeted his appearance had subsided, he said:

"One week ago, yesterday, my fellow citizens, we left this city for the great convention, carrying with us, as we felt then, and now know, the best wishes of all of you, that victory might be ours."—Indianapolis Journal, June 12.

Ever since certain republicans set about to defeat the nomination of Chase for governor, some people have been busy creating the impression that President Harrison and the Indiana republicans at Washington do not desire to see Governor Chase nominated. The report has been circulated until the story has been accepted as true by many of the politicians. But things have taken a different turn the last day or two, since the arrival here of Dan Ransdell, United States marshal for the District of Columbia. The friends of the governor who were at Minneapolis called the attention of the administration people there to the report that was in circulation, and asked that something be done to counteract the injury the governor's cause was suffering. When the matter came up, Mr. Ransdell, so it is said, stated to some of Chase's friends that he was for Chase, and that, if it was necessary, he would come to Indiana and remain until after the state convention and do something to help along the governor's cause.

Mr. Ransdell did come to Indiana, and he will probably remain until after the state convention, and he is urging that Chase be nominated at Fort Wayne next week. Mr. Ransdell said to-day:

"I have heard that some one is circulating the report that the administration, which, I take it, is intended to mean the President and the Indiana republicans in office, is opposed to the nomination of Chase. This story is without foundation."—Indianapolis News, June 17.

The Brooklyn republican delegates and others who purpose to attend the Minneapolis convention will start on Thursday by a special chartered car over the Pennsylvania railroad. They have arranged for a trip of ten days, including five days in Minneapolis and one day in Chicago. In the party will be Naval Officer Willis.—New York Evening Post, May 28.

* * *

The custom-house will not lack for representatives at the Minneapolis convention, although the customs officers on the list of delegates and alternates are not many. Naval Officer Willis is a delegate and Deputy Collector Shea is an alternate. Collector Hendricks will be one of the spectators of the proceedings. So will Surveyor Lyon, Deputy Collectors John H. Sunner and Frank Raymond are going, too, along with Gen. Dennis F. Burke, assistant appraiser. Others to make the trip will be Gen. Wheeler, chief custodian of the custom-house and Edmund C. Lee, who once did valiant battle with the General for the possession of the office now held by the father.—New York Times, May 28.

* * *

Federal office-holders make up the major part of the state delegation to the national republican convention. The state convention broke up in a big row, and two sets of delegates for the state at large were sent, both claiming to be regular. The first delegation is headed by James Hill (colored), postmaster at Vicksburg. His associates are, A. F. Wimberley, late internal revenue collector for the district of Louisiana and Mississippi, who was removed by the President for participation in the attempt to re-charter the Louisiana State Lottery Company; W. E. Mollison, colored, chancery clerk of Issaquena county, and John McGill, formerly mayor of this city, whose defeat in January, 1888, was the subject of investigation by the senate of the United States. These delegates are uninstructed.

The other side's delegates are, John R. Lynch, colored, fourth auditor of the treasury; W.

H. Gibbs, postmaster at this city; George M. Buchanan, of Holly Springs, deputy collector of internal revenue, and George W. Goyles, colored, a member of the house of representatives from Bolivar county. This delegation is instructed for Harrison.

The district delegates are:

First District—H. C. Powers, of Starkville, collector of internal revenue for the district of Louisiana and Mississippi, and Mr. Shannon, a fourth-class postmaster.

Second—John S. Burtin, United States marshal for the northern district; Frank B. Hill, colored, deputy collector of internal revenue.

Third—A. G. Pierce, colored, deputy collector of internal revenue, and Wesley Creighton, colored.

Fourth—S. S. Mathews, late United States marshal for the southern district (removed under charges, and now deputy postmaster at Winona), and W. D. Frazee, assistant United States district attorney.

Fifth—W. H. Mounger, of Jasper; J. J. Garret, colored, of Yazoo.

Sixth—Fred W. Collins, United States marshal for the southern district, and George F. Boyles, colored, of Natchez.

Seventh—E. E. Perkins, colored, postmaster at Edwards, and E. E. Eugharth, postmaster at Rodney.—Jackson, Miss., Dispatch to New York Times, May 30.

Senators Felton of California, Powers of Montana, Teller and Wolcott of Colorado, Jones of Nevada, Dubois of Idaho, and Gallinger of New Hampshire, are the recent departures from that end of the capitol. Every one of them is a pronounced Blaine man. They will find at Minneapolis Senators Stockbridge and McMillan of Michigan, Hansbrough of North Dakota, Washburn of Minnesota, Cullom of Illinois, Quay and Cameron of Pennsylvania, and Hiscock of New York. Possibly Aldrich of Rhode Island and Higgins of Delaware will join them.

This large crowd of anti-Harrison men will be to some extent offset by Marshal Dan Ransdell, Commissioner Thomas H. Carter, Director of the Mint E. O. Leech, Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General Rathbone, and other office-holders who will join Consul-General New and the other Harrison workers.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 2.

The Harrison delegates from Kings county left town at 1:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon and started for Minneapolis on the Pennsylvania railroad. In the party were Naval Officer Willis, * * * They were all positive that Harrison would be renominated, practically without opposition. They will stop over in Chicago to-night.—New York Times, June 3.

* * *

Nine carloads of delegates and visitors to the Minneapolis convention left the Grand Central Station at 10:20 o'clock this morning. Few of the republican leaders were in the crowd. Platt, Depew, Fassett, Chairman Brookfield of the state committee, and the other men who will dictate the action of the New York delegation had already started for Minneapolis. The most prominent man on the train was Collector Hendricks. Among the delegates and visitors were: David Fricdsam, George Hilliard, ex-Coroner John R. Nugent, Michael Goode, Deputy Collector Dennis Shea, William Henkel, ex-Police Justice Jacob M. Patterson, John Reisenweber, Charles F. Bruder, Collector Francis Hendricks, John S. Kenyon, secretary republican state committee, Deputy Collector Frank Raymond, H. Henry, M. B. Bryant, William C. Roberts, Internal Revenue Collector Ferdinand Eidman, William I. Martin, Henry Gleason, Internal Revenue Collector Michael Kerwin, Judge Rooney, Wilbur F. Wakeman, Robert W. Taylor, Deputy Surveyor John Collins, Isaac T. Stoddard, David F. Porter, Deputy Collector John H. Gunner, R. M. Lush, T. W. McGown, Secretary William H. Bellamy of the republican county committee, Col. E. A. McAlpin, president of the state league of republican clubs, Charles B. Page and W. V. Ruppert, of this city.—New York Evening Post, June 3.

John R. Lynch [fourth auditor of the treasury], the well-known colored politician from Mississippi, was at the Palmer house talking for Harrison. "The Blaine boom is wind," he said. "Harrison's treatment of the colored men has been very satisfactory, and there is no concerted movement on their part to secure the nomination of any other man."

In contrast with Lynch, ex-U. S. Senator William Pitt Kellogg, of Louisiana, "the colored man's friend," is at the Auditorium. Mr. Kellogg heads the Louisiana delegation, and he has a long, sharp knife which he expects to use in crippling the Harrison forces. He declares that Harrison has practically given nothing to the colored men of the north, but that Bruce [register of deeds] and Lynch, of Mississippi, where votes do not count, got all they wanted.—Chicago Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 3.

* * *

Special Treasury Agent Miles Kehoe, one of the delegates at large from Illinois, left for Minneapolis this afternoon. He says the Blaine boom will not last longer than Sunday next, and Harrison will have a clear field before him when the convention meets. Post-office Inspector Stuart, Maj. John Burt, of the immigration department, Assistant Treasurer John Tanner, and other federal officials, will leave for Minneapolis Saturday night.—Chicago Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 3.

* * *

United States Marshal S. S. Mathews, of Winona, Miss., was a conspicuous figure at the Grand Pacific. "Our four delegates-at-large," he said, "are instructed for Harrison, and a majority of the others are favorable to the President. It must be said, however, that there is a remarkably strong undercurrent of enthusiasm for Blaine."—Chicago Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 3.

* * *

Contrary to the belief generally held, there are but three federal office-holders in the delegation, Collector Feland, United States Marshal Burchell and Surveyor of the Port Collier. To the Times correspondent Col. Bradley expressed the belief that Blaine would not allow his name to go before the convention, for the reason that, however much he might desire the nomination now, his letter removed him from the field of candidates, and that he could not permit his name to be used without being palpably guilty of a breach of faith.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 4.

* * *

The city's delegation on the special included Collector Hendricks and Postmaster Van Cott, who are for Harrison and who thought it too hot to talk politics; Jacob M. Patterson, chairman of the republican county committee's executive committee, who said that the delegates were going to Minneapolis to do the best they could; Deputy Collectors Denis Shea and Frank Raymond, who thought it was pretty hot for men of their size to go traveling, a belief that was shared in by John H. Gunner, another deputy collector, and John D. Lawson.

Deputy Surveyor John Collins helped to swell the office-holding contingent that went out to shout for Harrison if their official heads seemed to demand it. John Reisenweber, Charles F. Bruder, Michael Goode, Wilbur H. Wakeman and William Henkel were also aboard.—New York Times, June 4.

The New York delegation to the republican convention at Minneapolis left here on a special train of eight cars, from the Grand Central depot, at 10:20 o'clock this morning. Most of the prominent leaders of the party started a few days ago. Among those who started to-day were Collector Hendricks, Secretary Kenyon, of the republican state committee; Jacob Patterson, W. H. Bellamy, Deputy Collectors Frank Raymond, Denis Shea and John H. Gunner, Internal Revenue Collector Ferdinand Eidman, Deputy Surveyor John Collins. On either side of each of the eight cars in the train is a strip of white canvas with the words, "New York Delegation, National Republican Convention," printed in large, black letters.—New York Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 4.

There were some bets made during the evening, of which the largest was $1,000 even on Harrison's nomination against the field. Marcus Johnson, revenue collector at St. Paul, took the Harrison end of the bet, and Delegate Eustis, of Minneapolis, a Blaine man, the other end. Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 4.

* * *

The first of the New York delegation to arrive was John W. Dwight, of Dryden, the advance guard of the Blaine forces. Dwight, Fassett, Armour, Frank S. Witherbee and Collector Frank Hendricks, who is not a delegate, and who is the only loyal Harrison man in the outfit, have rented a palatial residence and installed a French chef for the entertainment of their friends.

Edward C. O'Brien, who holds a position under the administration, followed Dwight by a few feet, and off set the former's sinister slurs against Harrison by declaiming on his excellent qualities and the fine record he has made. Then followed Fassett, who took much pleasure in firing a number of case shot into the administration, a part of which he once was.

The majority of the New York delegation—and they are all expected to arrive on Sunday morning—will occupy the quarters secured for them several months ago by Dwight Lawrence at the West. Messrs. E. B. Bartlett and Naval Officer Willis, of the Brooklyn contingent, will occupy two rooms, the six other delegates having found quarters in private houses.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 4.

Chauncey I. Filley, a member of the national committee and delegate-at-large from Missouri, made another lightning change last night. When he reached Minneapolis the Harrison sentiment seemed very strong. Mr. Filley immediately announced that under instructions from the Missouri convention he would vote for Harrison. Following the Blaine boom's lively impetus received last night Mr. Filley this morning says he is going to vote for Blaine in spite of his instructions.

"When instructions were given for Harrison," he said, "they were given under the impression that Blaine would not accept the nomination. There were 137 office-holders in our convention who instructed us for Harrison, but Blaine is the choice of the people of Missouri." Mr. Filley adds that all of the district delegates from his state vote for Blaine.—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Evening Post, June 4.

Leaders of the anti-administration forces held a secret conference to night lasting several hours. There were present Chairman Clarkson, Senators Washburn, Stockbridge, Quay and Hansbrough, Secretary Fassett, Conger, of Ohio; H. C. Payne, of Wisconsin, and Chauncey Filley, of Missouri. The statements previously published purporting to give the delegates unplaced were placed before the gentlemen, and were carefully considered. The roll of delegates were canvassed, state by state, and their preferences, so far as could be determined from the information at hand, were tabulated. When the meeting was over, Senator Stockbridge stated that the gentlemen of the conference were of the opinion that Harrison could depend upon 347 all told, of whom 144 are federal office holders, while there were opposed to him 551 delegates.—Indianapolis Journal, June 4.

Utah has come to Minneapolis with a lively contest which the convention will have to settle. United States Marshal Parsons, of Salt Lake City, who heads the Harrison crowd from the territory, is confident that their claims will be upheld. Naturally he is "satisfied with the candidacy of President Harrison."—New York Times, June 5.

Emmons Blaine went to Minneapolis to-night at 6 o'clock. He disappeared as completely as though the earth had swallowed him, when the first whisper of the news of his father's action began to get abroad. No information concerning the son could be obtained, either at his office or his residence, except that the first train this evening bore him to Minneapolis. A thrill of excitement ran through the crowded rotunda of the Grand Pacific at the reception of the intelligence from Washington. Hundreds of politicians were in the great apartment, and in a moment all else was lost sight of. "Such a thing was never before known in American politics," exclaimed Justice Harlan, of the United States Supreme Court. The distinguished jurist checked his astonishment and comments suddenly, however, and refused to discuss the bearings of the matter in connection with the Minneapolis convention.

"It is too late. He should have done it before," almost shouted the celebrated Webster Flanagan, United States collector at El Paso, Tex., who became famous with his convention query of "What are we here for, if not for the offices?" When seen he said that the general verdict was that the news meant business now from the word go.—Chicago Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 5.

* * *

Within a few moments after the reception of President Harrison's acceptance of Mr. Blaine's resignation, Mr. Wolcott, the eloquent senator from Colorado, was called upon for his views in reference to the sudden change of the political situation. He said: "It does not change the situation materially, except to accentuate the result which the President in his interview and Secretary Miller and Foster in theirs, attempted to inflict upon him. His friends have realized for some time that the President sought to aggrandize the effects of the wisdom and sagacity of the secretary of state, but it appears that they not only desire to ignore him, but because he did not seem disposed to 'write a letter' every few minutes, they saw fit to throw mud. The resignation may be of some help here, as it leaves vacant another office to be peddled for Harrison votes. The assistant postmaster-general, the chief of the bureau of engraving and printing and scores of heads of departments fill the lobbies, and promise offices and favors promiscuously, but they are having no effect."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 5.

Webster Flanagan [collector at El Paso] of Texas ("What are we here for?"), says that his delegation and most of the southern delegations are for President Harrison.—Indianapolis News, June 6.

Ex-Governor Warmouth, of Louisiana, a man of strikingly handsome presence, says: As a federal office-holder, I feel a little diffident about expressing myself. But if I might dare to speak, I would say that Louisiana is for Harrison, and that the electoral vote of that state will be cast for him this fall. Of course you know that we have a contesting delegation. * * The sugar, rice and lumber interests are very strongly for Harrison and the republican ticket because of what the McKinley bill has done for them." Hon. John R. Lynch, the colored leader of Mississippi, was temporary chairman of the convention that nominated Blaine, but he is not for the plumed knight this time. He has been a member of congress from the "Shoe-string" district of his state and is now an appointee of the Harrison administration as fourth auditor of the treasury. "It is an unfortunate thing," he said to-day, "that the delegates to this convention should be called upon to decide between Blaine and Harrison."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 4.

* * *

Fred Douglass [late minister to Hayti], notwithstanding his age, is actively at work in the Harrison cause addressing the colored men and stiffening the lines where they are inclined to waver.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

* * *

Ex-Senator Bruce [register of deeds], Auditor Lynch and other colored men are working for Harrison. An effort was made to win over Mr. Langston to the President's support, but he told the committee in an outspoken, vigorous manner that he was on the other side. He claims that Virginia will vote for Blaine with the exception of four or six delegates. Others give the President at least eight votes from Virginia.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

* * *

Nearly all the southern delegates were named by the federal office-holders. They were selected, of course, in Harrison's interest, and most of them were instructed for him. If he can hold them he will be nominated. As his people have offices to promise in addition to plenty of cash to pay down, they ought to be able to hold their own at the auction. John C. New and Dan Ransdell and Michener, it would seem, should be as handy at this sort of business as Quay, Clarkson & Co., but there are indications to-night that the latter have got the start of them and that Harrison will lose a large number of his colored delegates. If so, it is all up with him.

Ben Thornton is at the head of a force of colored detectives employed by the Harrison managers to watch "the coons," as they are usually styled by the republican politicians here. Thornton is a pretty good detective, but he has the biggest contract on his hands that he has ever undertaken.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 7.

* * *

There sat at the head of several delegations from the south certain federal office-holders, who voted their delegations as if they had been so many cattle. Talk about plantation manners! When one of these delegates arose the chairman called to him:

"Sit down, blank you, sit down!"

The delegate sat down. When another started to leave the hall, the chairman, turning sharply, exclaimed:

"Where in thunder are you going?"

And the delegate returned and took his seat. One body of these southern delegates was herded in the top floor of a hotel at night and marched to and from the convention with about the same volition that a chain-gang moves. It was not pleasing to the winners that such a condition helped on the victory. The recollection of how certain southern delegations were handled leaves a sore spot for the side which won.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat [Rep.].

* * *

When the Louisiana contest was heard, ex-Senator William Pitt Kellogg and ex-Gov. H. C. Warmouth [collector at New Orleans] headed their respective forces. Kellogg, who appears as the regular delegate, prevailed before the sub-committee, beating Warmouth, who led the contesting delegation in every district except the sixth, where the sub-committee split the two votes evenly between each faction. In the third and fifth districts the Warmouth men withdrew their contests, and in the first, second and fourth districts they lost the fight. This is a Blaine victory.

Wright Cuncy [collector at Galveston], the colored national committeeman from Texas, licked his competitors from the Lone Star state, who are known as the "lily whites." The point he worked to advantage was that the contestants were an anti-negro organization and therefore hostile to the principles of the republican party. The point was well taken, the committee deciding not to admit the so-called "lily-white" delegation to the convention. It appears that the color-line was drawn in the selection of delegations, which action the committee regarded as un-republican, and they decided, therefore, that the paper presented was not admissible as a communication from a republican body.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

An amusing story is told of an interview between Carter Harrison, United States marshal for Tennessee, and brother of the President, and Crawford Fairbanks, of Terre Haute. Fairbanks came as far as Chicago on the train bearing Postmaster Greiner and other republican patriots from Terre Haute en route to the convention. On the same train was Carter Harrison in charge of the Tennessee delegation. Greiner introduced Fairbanks as a republican and a Harrison boomer. Fairbanks played the part well and was soon engaged in a confidential chat with Harrison over the situation.

"The only thing I fear," said Fairbanks, "is that the Blaine crowd will buy our niggers away from us."

"Yes, that's the danger," replied Harrison. "We picked out the most reliable ones we could find but they're mighty uncertain. We shall have to watch them every moment, and even then they are liable to give us the slip."—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 7.

The Blaine men are greatly exasperated because of participation in the convention of so many office-holding delegates. They are constantly referring to the fact. In the arguments that take place office-holders are flatly insulted as "hirelings" who are "earning their money for their masters," and weatherbeaten old politicians like Senator Teller talk of their "ubiquitousness" with a horror that would be more impressive if it were not humorous. They would be glad to have all the office-holders for Blaine, however. There are 100, more or less, of business appointees in the roll of delegates. Some of them will be glad to vote for Blaine. Then there are shoals of postmasters, revenue officers, customs officers and others in the Harrison vote, all inclined to be fearful of the result should their man be defeated in the convention. A republican ax will kill a republican should Harrison go out as remorselessly as if he were a democrat. Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 6.

* * *

"The promises of the Blaineites are potential, those of the Harrisonites real. The Harrisonites have got the offices. There is where, in the contest for delegates, the Harrisonites have got the advantage." So spoke a shrewd observer. There is a force in the fact that there is already a good deal of loud talk at the number of office-holders here, and it is not confined to the Blaineites. They are the first and fourth assistant postmasters-general, the commissioner of the land office, the commissioner of the navigation office, the director of the mint, the superintendent of the bureau of engraving, the marshal of the District of Columbia and collectors of internal revenue and postmasters not to be named, not counting the 147 office-holders who are delegates. It is making comment among the President's friends that these office-holders should be apparently in charge of his interests. Sam Miller, son of the attorney general, is here. Maj. George Steele is here, and apparently full of business. Horace Speed [United States district attorney for Oklahoma] is at this point descending on the greatness of Oklahoma and Harrison, with Harrison in the lead.—Indianapolis News, June 6.

There was the usual collection of notables just behind the chairman's platform. Senator Carey and Senator McMillan sat side by side under the gallery. Assistant Postmaster-General Rathbone was in his accustomed place.—Evening Post, June 6.

* * *

Postmaster Brandt, of Des Moines, afterward presented resolutions adopted by the Tippecanoe club in Iowa. No action was taken on the resolutions.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 7.

The Harrison managers have summoned to Minneapolis an officer of the post-office department, who has under his orders twelve detectives, who are tracking the Blaine agents about to see that they do not corrupt the Harrison delegates. Our dispatches to-day report that the Harrison managers not only employ these detectives, but have served notice upon the Blaine managers that if they continue their policy of trickery and delay, a complete exposure of the detectives' discoveries will be made in the convention. There seems to be nothing to add to this picture.—New York Evening Post, June 9.

The first Alabama case called was from the eighth district, and here the report of the national committee was approved with substantial unanimity. The anti-Moseley delegates were permanently enrolled. A fight was made on Hendricks and Fitzpatrick, the representatives of the faction headed by Stevens and Goe of the New Idea and known as the anti-Moseleys in the Third Alabama district, but a poll showed 27 Blaine to 21 Harrison votes, and they were also enrolled. In the fourth district it was also demonstrated that there was a good working majority and Bland and Wilson, the anti-Moseleyites, were sustained in their right to seats. The fifth district was also carried, but when it came to the delegates-at-large and the contest over one seat in the first district the administration forces mustered strong and executed a skillful coup d'état. They surprised the other side and carried the day temporarily for the Moseley or office-holders' faction by a vote of 24 to 23. In describing how it was done one of the members of the committee said: "A couple of fellows suddenly jumped over to the other side, one sneaked and another was absent."—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 9.

* * *

There was quite an exciting time this morning in the meeting of the Missouri delegation and Kerens was chosen committeeman by a vote of 19 to 13 for Filley, one for Maj. Warner, and one absent. In the present political fight Filley has been for Blaine and Kerens for Harrison. The Missouri delegation is a little slow on going on record about the presidential nomination, but the probabilities are that Harrison has twenty-one or twenty-two out of thirty-four delegates. The trouble got very hot before the meeting was over. Major Warner and District Attorney Reynolds, both of whom are for Harrison, came to blows. Both are impetuous, hot-headed men, and a row of words terminated in Major Warner shooting out his fist with such effect that Reynolds was knocked down. Afterward a reconciliation was effected.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 9.

* * *

Ex-Senator Platt was of the same opinion as Mr. Clarkson regarding the importance of the Harrison gathering. He characterized it as a pow-wow of office-holders, office-holding delegates and alternates, together with a number of outsiders. "About one third of those present were Blaine curiosity seekers," he said, "while the whole number present was less than 450."—Indianapolis Journal, June 10.

* * *

John A. Sleicher [civil service commissioner New York], of New York, had a point to make against one vote in that delegation, but Mr. Fassett explained it away.—Indianapolis Journal, June 10.

Then Webster Flanagan [collector at El Paso] of Texas, came to the edge of the platform to speak for the Lone Star state.

"What are we here for?" cried some facetious individual.

"To nominate Benjamin Harrison," quickly responded the doughty Texan.—Indianapolis Journal, June 10.

* * *

Neil McGroarty, ex-councilman of the old sixteenth ward, who, until a short time ago, was a rampant anti-Harrison man, now has nothing to say. Mr. McGroarty's reticence is due to his appointment to a lucrative position in Revenue Collector Craven's office.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 10.

* * *

Carroll E. Smith [postmaster], editor of the Syracuse Journal, explained the policy of the Harrison forces to-day as follows:

"If there is a fight in this convention, the Harrison men will not be found in it. We don't propose to make a contest on anything but the nomination, and we have that to a certainty. Nor do we propose to allow the impression to be spread broadcast over the country, for effective use in the doubtful states, that the republican party is split beyond redemption. It is our policy to conciliate and not to antagonize the members of our own party. If the Blaine forces desire to fight, I trust they will fight among themselves. They can't involve us. We can afford to be magnanimous."—Minneapolis Dispatch to New York Times, June 10.

* * *

When the vote of Texas, cast by negro office-holders, secured Harrison's renomination, the Harrison delegates and office-holders in the galleries cheered for a few minutes.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

* * *

A huge six-by-eight portrait of the President was borne down to the grand stand, and Fred Douglass [late minister to Hayti], the leader of the colored race, led the mighty ovation by mounting a chair and waving his hat high in air, his white hair swung to the breezes.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

* * *

A little flutter of applause greeted the report by Senator Quay that the Hon. David Martin [collector of internal revenue], of Philadelphia, had been selected as Pennsylvania's member of the national committee. Martin was Quay's candidate and his selection indicates the continued sway of the senator in the Keystone state.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

* * *

Senator Wolcott, of Colorado, seems to have an unique way of "talking out in meeting" that is not pleasing to the republican bosses. We extract the following from his brief but instructive remarks at Minneapolis:

"I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a list of 130-odd office-holders who are delegates to this convention, nine-tenths of whom live in states where there is a hopeless democratic majority. [Applause.] The trouble in this committee as to these contests comes not alone from these men, but comes from the government office-holders who swarm the corridors of the hotels and fill these galleries, haunting the delegates who ought to be in Washington and elsewhere attending to other business. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman—[Cries of 'sit down.'] I won't sit down. I will speak. [Applause.] We republicans from republican states would like to have a little voice in naming a candidate for the presidency. Possibly the office-holders will name him, but we don't believe it. We from the republican states ask the office-holding contingent who are bringing a solid south against us to at least conduct their side of the case in common decency and common honesty, so we won't be ashamed to vote the republican ticket."

In connection with this, the following figures of the vote nominating Harrison may prove of interest:

	For Harrison.	For all other Candidates.
Solid South (including Delaware).....	245 1-6	69 5-6
New Jersey.....	18	2
Alaska (ice-wagon district).....	2
New Mexico.....	6
Utah.....	2
Total	273 1-6	71 5-6

This morning Platt, Quay, Clarkson, Miller and Wolcott were in consultation nearly an hour considering the proposition of Senator Wolcott to exclude from the convention 142 federal office-holders. The convention is operating under the rules of the fifty-first congress, which provide that members shall not vote upon measures in which they have pecuniary interests. These 142 delegates holding office under Harrison, Wolcott claimed, were financially interested to the extent of their annual salaries, and voting to continue Harrison in office four years they were also voting to continue themselves in office. Platt and Miller opposed this bold proposition, and it was only after great pressure was brought on Wolcott that he desisted from offering a resolution to oust the federal office-holders.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

* * *

Three months ago an assessment was made on the office-holders by the national committee for the purpose of organizing the campaign. This money was used for Clarkson, Platt et al. to buy off Harrison delegates, but they encountered a big obstacle in the state. The majority of the delegates are office-holders under Harrison and they could not be bought. The remainder took the Blaine money, but were brought back by the Harrison men. There were 5,000 federal office-holders in the city to draw upon.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 11.

Field Marshal Lew Payn was more outspoken than most of his colleagues of the Blaine persuasion.

"Why is President Harrison so unpopular?" asked the reporter.

"Because of his unrivalled ability for offending every one. For weeks previous to the convening of the convention, Secretary of the Navy Tracy, and the office-holders, big and little, throughout the state, were at work day and night to secure a Harrison delegation. They distributed patronage, promoted men, and removed others who could not be won over to their schemes. Never in all my experience have I seen such a shameful interference by the administration for the sole purpose of capturing a convention."—New York Times, June 11.

* * *

The vast majority of the returning delegates who passed through Chicago to-day did not leave the depots, being anxious to reach their homes as soon possible. The Young Men's Republican Club of Baltimore, headed by Postmaster W. Johnson, escorted the Maryland delegation into the city and immediately scattered to various parts of the city for a brief rest before leaving at 5 o'clock to-morrow morning. "Our club was for Harrison," said Postmaster Johnson, "and we are consequently happy."—Chicago Dispatch to Journal, June 12.

* * *

The nomination of Harrison was very coldly received by the republicans here. The only member of the party celebrating to-night is Postmaster Patterson.—Memphis Dispatch to New York Times, June 11.

* * *

At the meeting of the republican city central committee last night, William R. Williams, who was an enthusiastic Blaine man, offered a resolution congratulating the delegates on concluding their work. It was adopted. But when W. F. Otis, a federal employe, made a motion that the congratulations of the committee be extended to President Harrison, it failed to pass. Three cheers, proposed for Blaine, were given with a hearty good will.—Newark, N. J., Dispatch to New York Times, June 13.

* * *

Postmaster Cornelius Van Cott said, in speaking on the topic last night: It seems to me that Mr. Hendricks [collector], is pre-eminently the man to take charge of the republican campaign in this state this year. He has no enemies in the party and his judgment is magnificent. You can not quote me too highly in the praise of ex-Senator Frank Hendricks. I know him well. I was in the state senate with him.—New York Times, June.

* * *

Dan Ransdell, United States marshal for the District of Columbia, will arrive in Indianapolis this evening, and will probably have some advice to give the republicans as to the nomination of a governor at Ft. Wayne. Mr. Ransdell is at Lebanon to-day, visiting his mother.—Indianapolis News, June 15.

To-day's victory places Chauncey M. Depew at the head of the republican organization in New York State, with Collector Francis Hendricks, of Syracuse, as his second in command. Mr. Hendricks was one of those "pernicious office-holders" who was here on the ground, and it is due to his skill and sagacity that the Blaine delegation was no larger. He was so quiet and unobtrusive and modest that the Blaine leaders underestimated his power as a politician and his skill as a leader.—New York Times, June 11.

COMMISSIONED HENCHMEN.

Delegates to the Minneapolis Convention.

It assumes, however, that official patronage can be made a strong factor in securing the renomination and re-election of a President, which is very doubtful. It must be remembered, also, that a President who would prostitute the office in this way would be just the kind of man that the people would turn out at the end of four years. In the present state of public opinion on this question, it would be sure defeat for any President to have it known that he had used the power and patronage of his office to secure his renomination or that he was using it to secure his re-election. The people are not easily hoodwinked about such matters, and they can not be trifled with at all.—Indianapolis Journal, June 14, 1892.

Take New York, for instance. In that state Mr. Theodore B. Willis, the native officer of the port, openly exerted the power of his official position to secure the delegation for Harrison, if possible, and succeeded in having himself elected from the fourth district, with a subordinate as his fellow-delegate. Geo. H. Sharpe, of the board of appraisers, testifies his appreciation of the good care bestowed upon him by going as a delegate from the seventeenth district, and E. C. O'Brien, who fell into the commissionership of navigation after he had fallen out of a senate office, and who has been an ardent Harrison man ever since, is also fixed in a delegate's position. Then there is S. W. Allan, of Auburn, who is one of the commissioners of the World's Fair by appointment of the President; Charles H. Murray, who was supervisor of the census in New York City, and Jacob M. Patterson, who said, when he was here a few days ago, that he had been promised an office. There are said to be also a number of other office-holders on the delegation. In the Nebraska delegation the interests of the President will be watched by C. H. Gere, the postmaster at Lincoln, while another friend of the administration is found in the Minnesota delegation, of which ex-Representative Darwin S. Hall, who was provided with a place in the Red Lake Indian commission after he had been defeated for congress, is a member.

Michigan's delegation contains a federal postmaster, Gen. J. H. Kidd, of Ionia, but as he is an earnest friend of General Alger, his presence is hardly a victory for the administration. In New Hampshire, Delegate George T. Croft is postmaster at Maplewood, while Henry B. Quimby, of Lakeport, is a relative of General Batchelder. The latter, by the way, was appointed quartermaster-general by the President, and is now adding his efforts to those of others to secure Mr. Harrison's renomination. The head of the New Hampshire delegation is Frank Churchill, of Lebanon. His brother is the postmaster at that place. Even in far-off North Dakota the interests of the administration were not neglected. John A. Percival, the receiver of the land office at Devil's Lake, found a resting-place in the delegation along with Thomas Marshall, who has a large number of contracts with the government for surveys, and to whom a special agent was sent direct from delegates who were elected. In Kansas, Cyrus Leland, Jr., one of the delegates from the first district, is the internal revenue collector for the state.

While the list of office-holding delegates from northern states is by no means complete, it affords some idea of the endeavors which have been put forth to secure men who might be relied upon to vote for the President. It is in the south, however, where the republicans naturally acquiesced in rather than resented federal manipulation that the delegations show such an array of office-holders as to present a remarkable spectacle. Georgia leads the list with twenty-two office-holders out of twenty-six delegates. Here is the list:

A. E. Buek, United States marshal.
*W. A. Pledger, railway mail service.
W. W. Brown, railway mail service.
M. J. Doyle, postmaster.
*S. B. Morse, custom-house employee.
*B. F. Brimberry, postmaster.
*C. B. Barnes, internal revenue service.
*Chas. E. Coleman, railway mail service.
*E. S. Richardson, railway mail service.
A. J. Laird, postmaster.
John T. Sheppard, internal revenue.
*C. C. Wimbush, custom-house employee.
E. A. Angier, assistant district attorney.
R. D. Lock, postmaster.
*Frank Disson, post-office employee.
W. T. Blackford, internal revenue service.
Madison Davis, postmaster.
S. A. Darnall, internal revenue service.
J. M. Barnes, postmaster.
*J. H. Devreux, custom-house employee.
*W. H. Matthews, deputy collector internal revenue.

In Alabama there are two sets of delegates, one of them representing what is known in that state as the Moseley faction, in honor of Robert A. Moseley, Jr., who is the federal collector of internal revenue. While Collector Moseley is not personally on the delegation, he has not allowed it to lack for want of other office-holders. Here is a list of them:

William H. Smith, special United States assistant attorney.
D. Baker, postmaster, Mobile.
Charles O. Norris, mailing clerk, Montgomery.
Henry Boyd, postal clerk, Selma.
Julian H. Bingham, register United States land office.
Benjamin W. Walker, marshal southern district.
T. A. Miller, postmaster, Tuscaloosa.
Owen T. Harris, special receiver public lands.
M. F. Parker, postmaster, Cullman.
James Jackson, assistant United States attorney.
Robert L. Houston, postmaster, Birmingham.
A. L. Matthews, mail carrier.

The anti-Moseley wing will send only one office holder, Alfred H. Hendricks, a postal clerk at Opelika.

There is also a contesting delegation from Mississippi, but the office-holders are in both. In the regular delegation there are the following:

James Hill, postmaster, Vicksburgh.
H. C. Powers, internal revenue collector.
Dr. John Burton, United States marshal, northern district.
F. P. Hill, deputy revenue collector.
A. G. Pierce, revenue collector, fourth district.
W. D. Frazee, assistant district attorney.
F. W. Collins, marshal, southern district.
*John R. Lynch, fourth auditor treasury department.
†George M. Buchanan, deputy revenue collector.
W. H. Gibbs, postmaster, Jackson.

Two more of the eighteen delegates from Mississippi, a state which is counted in the Harrison column, are A. T. Wimberly, the internal revenue collector, who was recently deposed by the President, according to the statements made at the time his successor was nominated, because he opposed the sending to Minneapolis of a delegation friendly to the President, and S. S. Matthews, the United States marshal, who was recently dismissed.

In Texas, N. W. Cuney, the collector of customs at Galveston, leads the delegation with Deputy Internal Revenue Collector John W. Rector and L. M. Daniel

*Colored.

†Contestants.

recently appointed an alternate on the World's Fair commission, among his numerous office-holding colleagues. In Arkansas, Henry M. Cooper, internal revenue collector, is the most prominent office-holder on the delegation. Delaware's small contingent contains George V. Massey, who was appointed a World's Fair commissioner by the President, while North Carolina comes to the front with the following:

E. A. White, collector internal revenue.
*John C. Dancy, collector customs, Wilmington.
C. A. Cook, United States district attorney.
*J. H. Hannon, postmaster, Halifax.
John Nichols, chief division, treasury department.
*James H. Young, inspector customs.
Archibald Brady, postmaster, Charlotte.
Florida has eight delegates, and of these four are office-holders, as follows:
*Joseph E. Lee, collector customs, Jacksonville.
E. R. Gunby, collector customs, Tampa.
John F. Horr, collector customs, Key West.
Henry S. Chubb, deputy collector internal revenue.

In the proportion of office-holders to delegates, South Carolina makes even a more generous showing than Florida. Of the eighteen men who will go from the Palmetto state to Minneapolis, eleven are drawing pay out of the United States treasury through the kindness of the President. The instructions, therefore, to vote for him are borne with easy grace. The office-holders are:

*E. A. Webster, collector internal revenue.
E. H. Deas, deputy collector internal revenue.
G. J. Cunningham, United States marshal.
*C. H. Fordham, deputy collector internal revenue.
*S. E. Smith, postal clerk, Aiken.
J. P. Scruggs, deputy collector internal revenue.
J. F. Ensor, deputy collector internal revenue.
*J. E. Wilson, postmaster, Florence.
T. B. Johnson, collector customs, Charleston.
J. H. Ostendorf, deputy collector customs.
*R. H. Richardson, postmaster, Wedgefield.

There are no federal office-holders on the West Virginia delegation, although Prof. T. C. White, the geologist of the West Virginia University and one of the district delegates, is a brother of United States Marshal White. Maryland sends one office-holder, John T. Ensor, United States district attorney, but there would have been a large number if the efforts of the administration men had been more successful. In the adjoining state of Virginia the list is considerably larger, as follows:

A. W. Harris, inspector of customs.
S. Brown Allen, deputy collector internal revenue.
V. D. Groner, World's Fair commissioner.
Edgar Allen, special attorney department of justice.
S. I. Griggs, United States court commissioner.
H. C. Wood, United States court commissioner.
P. H. McCaull, internal revenue collector, Lynchburg.
C. M. Loutham, deputy internal revenue collector.
P. W. Strouther, deputy internal revenue collector.

The Kentucky delegation has been also pretty well packed, no less than seven federal office-holders finding places within it. They are as follows:

John Feland, collector internal revenue.
Jordan Jackson, government storekeeper.
A. D. Crosby, deputy collector internal revenue.
T. B. Matthews, deputy collector internal revenue.
T. P. Tarlton, deputy collector internal revenue.
Dr. Collier, surveyor port, Louisville.
D. J. Burchett, United States marshal.

In Louisiana a condition of affairs somewhat similar to that in Alabama exists. Under the leadership of Henry C. Warmoth, collector of customs at the port of New Orleans by the grace of the President, a convention was organized, and it was arranged that the delegates elected should vote for the President at Minneapolis. These delegates are nearly all office-holders, or, as in the case of Pearl Wright, who is a broker at the custom-house, have some reason to be attached to the administration. The office-holders are:

James Lewis, inspector of customs.
J. Vigneaux, United States marshal, western district.
J. B. Donnelly, United States marshal, eastern district.
J. K. Small, employed in federal building.
Lucien B. Carmouche, employed in federal building.
J. B. Budd, employed in federal building.
A. R. Blount, employed in federal building.
D. Young, employed in federal building.
J. G. Donato, employed in federal building.
E. J. Barrett, postmaster at Alexandria.—Washington Post, May 22.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

Indianapolis, Ind.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN PLATFORMS.

1888.

"The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884 and continued to adhere to the democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because their candidate has broken his. We therefore renew our declaration of 1884, to wit: 'The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.'"

1892.

"We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the republican party of the laws regulating the same."

THE CHRONICLE last month with great care set out the facts relating to the Minneapolis convention. These facts were taken from original sources and there is nowhere any pretense of denying them. The shame of the whole proceeding does not grow less with time and it ought not to. It will be in accordance with the Minneapolis example for federal employes to now turn themselves into Harrison election agents, and we shall doubtless soon have a large spectacle of this kind before us. Few things ought to stir the blood of honest citizens more than to compare these things with the republican platform of 1888. It is worth while for every voter to ask himself to what class of governments those which attempt to control popular action by the efforts of thousands of agents paid from the public treasury have always belonged?

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS.

1888.

"Honest reform in the civil service has been inaugurated and maintained by President Cleveland."

1892.

"Public office is a public trust. We reaffirm the declaration of the democratic national convention of 1876 for the reform of the civil service, [Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the government business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot box, be a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor, assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men, nor the instrument of their ambition] and we call for the honest enforcement of all laws regulating the same. The nomination of a President, as in the recent republican convention by delegations composed largely of his appointees, holding office at his pleasure, is a scandalous satire upon free popular institutions, and a startling illustration of the methods by which a President may gratify his ambition. We denounce a policy under which federal office-holders usurp control of party conventions in the states, and we pledge the democratic party to the reform of these and all other abuses which threaten individual liberty and local self-government."

THE republican party has a body of what may be called passive civil service reformers. They are in a general way opposed to the spoils system, but they never lift a hand to assist those who are actively fighting it. This has been their course during Harrison's administration. In the great struggle which has been carried on now for three years under the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt against the Wanamakers and Clarksons of the administration, they have never raised their voices to tell the President that he ought to keep the promises of the platform upon which he was elected. And now when an election is drawing near, their party machine, needing a covering of respectability, reaches out and pinches them and they wake up to astonishment that there are civil service reformers who will not vote for Harrison again. In remonstrating, they do not pretend that Harrison has kept the promises, but they say that opposition to him on the ground of bad faith "will make it impossible for him to do anything for this reform." It seems as though in years past and under other skies we have heard something like that before. And now again it has the sound of coming from very near the presidential chair. The answer is that the cause of civil service reform does not need the patronage of any President. It can make its own way and it can not be overthrown. It expects that a President will do as he agrees, and the question now is, Why has not President Harrison kept his promises?

THE Indiana state democratic platform carefully avoids committing the party to the merit system in the state service, and we followed the corresponding republican plank with interest to see what the end would be. The end was a demand for "an absolute non-partisan management of the benevolent and reformatory institutions of the state through boards whose members shall be appointed by the governor from the different political parties of the state." As a reform measure, the establishment of a non-partisan board is very nearly a humbug, and those who got up this platform probably so considered it. The places are given out by favoritism the same as before, the only difference being that the minority member is usually allowed to distribute some share of the favors among his partisans. The only civil service reform worth fighting for is that which provides for the appointment of laborers according to the Boston labor system, and which gives the other subordinate places to the successful competitors in competition open to all, without regard to politics, religion, color or any other improper consideration.

THERE is a disposition in some reform quarters to attempt to make Stevenson, whom the democrats have nominated for vice-president, presentable. It is impossible; he is simply another Clarkson, and his nomination for that reason was the last expiring kick of Tammany Hall. No independent would vote for him if there were any way to leave him out. The dislike is mutual, and never ought to be reconciled while Stevenson holds his present spoils views. As vice-president he will, if elected, be the usual vice-presidential cipher.

LIKE the resort to Paris for pure French, to London for the best English, and to the seaside for the best enjoyment of the products of the sea, so in the population around New York harbor is to be found the highest development of the American system of politics. True, it requires a mind trained like a race-horse to keep up with the ever-varying struggle. Now Hill, by a quick turn, takes the Brooklyn bridge from McLaughlin, and then McLaughlin wrenches it away again by threatening Hill's chances for nomination at Chicago. Now Collector Erhardt snubs Platt, and then the President kicks Erhardt out to placate Platt. Elsewhere will be found the latest picture made by this troubled sea. Just a little while ago Naval Officer Willis was irresistible, and carried everything for the Harrison delegates. But lo! Collector Nathan has his district enlarged by his democratic allies, and Willis now lies very flat. The kaleidoscope is nothing to this.

NOTWITHSTANDING its party pledges to abridge the spoils system, the republican majority in the senate has tacked to the appropriation bill that Wanamaker may employ at free delivery offices mail collectors who shall simply collect mails and whose pay shall be $600 a year. The object of this is undoubtedly to find places for republican workers during the coming campaign. Mr. Andrew, of the house, however, has been promised by the democrats that no such amendment shall pass unless the appointments are made under the civil service rules. In the face of such a condition the Wanamaker crowd will doubtless lose interest in the matter.

ONE of the most satisfactory things which has lately happened was the Indiana crowd of, at heart, Hillites going to the Chicago convention to shear Mr. Samuel E. Morss, the editor of the Indianapolis Sentinel, and themselves coming home very closely clipped. Mr. Morss is the most valuable addition that has been made to Indiana democratic politics for a generation. He succeeds not at all because he is a boss or a political manipulator, but because he takes a stand that is right and can not be scared out of it. It is a revolution to have the Sentinel favor the merit system in the state institutions.

WE have many complaints that the CHRONICLE is not received by those to whom it is sent. For instance, the library of Cornell University has not received half of its numbers. The number of errors is so large and in so many different directions that the fault can only be chargeable to the mails.

THE Indianapolis Journal of June 25 has the following:

The Indiana CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, a sporadic sheet, fills its latest issue with accounts of the office-holders who went to Minneapolis to work for President Harrison's renomination. It is filled with horror at the very idea, and is evidently under the impression that its showing will induce somebody or other to bolt the republican ticket and vote for that champion of political purity and perennial office-seeker G. Cleveland. Perhaps in the next issue the CHRONICLE will tell how many of Cleveland's appointees worked for him in Chicago. It can begin with five of his ex-cabinet officers. Stevenson was only an assistant secretary, but there was an army of still smaller fry whose names will help fill the CHRONICLE's pages, though they can not make them interesting.

The Journal of June 14 may answer the Journal of June 25:

In recent times opposition to a second term comes from two classes: First, those who honestly oppose it in the interest of good government, believing that restriction to one term would make a President more independent and remove entirely the temptation to use the power and patronage of the office to secure his renomination and election. This view, when honestly entertained, is entitled to respectful consideration. It assumes, however, that official patronage can be made a strong factor in securing the renomination and re-election of a President, which is very doubtful. It must be remembered, also, that a President who would prostitute the office in this way would be just the kind of man that the people would turn out at the end of four years. In the present state of public opinion on this question it would be sure defeat for any President to have it known that he had used the power and patronage of his office to secure his renomination, or that he was using it to secure his re-election. The people are not easily hoodwinked about such matters, and they can not be trifled with at all.

MR. THOMAS A. HALL, of Chicago, has subscribed for seventy-five copies of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE to be sent to libraries and reading-rooms, and particularly to the Young Men's Christian Association reading-rooms in Illinois. It is to be hoped that the latter will take better care of them than seems to be the case with the Young Men's Christian Association of this city. Soon after the June number came out it was not found in the reading-room and was asked for at the desk. After fumbling around a little, the attendant said, "I can't just now lay my hand on it." He was then asked for the file since January and said "I haven't got them." Was the fumbling around a pious deception, and is the paper in fact thrown into the waste-paper basket as soon as received? If any of our Illinois friends do not want the paper we shall be glad of an intimation to that effect and it will be discontinued. As we have said elsewhere, the facts from month to month published in the CHRONICLE are unpalatable, and to none are they more so than to civil service reformers. Whenever the facts in relation to the management of the civil service become pleasant, its reform will have been accomplished, and there will be no need of reform papers. But in the meantime, we insist that it is well to salt religion with those facts; it will make better citizens. The church should not forget the time when it winced under the bitter gibes of the anti-slavery agitators.

DIVERGENT VIEWS.

PHILADELPHIA, June 30, 1892.

To the Editor of the Civil Service Chronicle:

DEAR SIR—Please discontinue sending me your periodical. I am a member of the civil service reform association of this city, and I am a thorough believer in the principles of civil service. No one could go further than I would in the application of the reform to existing evils, but your periodical is in my opinion so blindly rancorous in its reference to President Harrison, so partisan and unfair, and in my judgment so wilfully insulting, that I do not wish to see the paper any more. In my opinion, it does the cause more harm than good, and shows plainly, I think, that there must be some animus for such labored denunciation of the President other than merely a love for civil service reform. If any other political party offered a satisfactory alternative; if any other party was more sincere in regard to civil service reform, there might be some excuse for the indulgence of such expressions as "Pirates," "Buccaneers," "Lord Paramount," etc.

Under Cleveland's administration the Philadelphia post-office was nothing short of a national scandal; and the friends of civil service certainly can not consistently endorse the democratic nominee for vice-president. As stated above, your blind and unjust partisanship in my opinion does the cause more harm than good, and you will therefore please strike my name from off your lists, as I wish to continue to believe in the reform, which is gaining ground, notwithstanding the harm done by overzealous friends of the cause.

HENRY JUSTICE.

WE have always believed that the Philadelphia post-office under the late administration was a national scandal, and the editor of the CHRONICLE at the time denounced it and other like scandals with all his might and at considerable expense. He also did all he could to secure the defeat at the polls of those who caused those scandals. The writer of the above letter does not dispute the facts which are from month to month set out in the CHRONICLE, and it does not seem that his mind ought to be so powerfully affected by the condition of the Philadelphia post-office four years ago, without being similarly affected by the circumstances of the Minneapolis convention, which are scarcely four weeks old, and which are truthfully related in the June CHRONICLE, and which make up the greatest single national scandal that has ever occurred in connection with the federal service. Nor would it seem that his mind ought to be unaffected by the recent spectacle of Wanamaker shielding law-breakers in Baltimore, and for proof of this he need not regard reports of committees, but needs only the testimony taken by Mr. Roosevelt. Nor would it seem that the three years' career in which the President, through the Quays, Clarksons, Mahones and Plattes, until he quarreled with them over the division, has looted the federal service, ought to be ignored. The way to fight the spoils system is to tell the facts about it, not only under a democratic administration, but under a republican administration. These facts are very unpleasant, but that is the fault of those who create them, not of those whose duty it is to bring them to the notice of the people. The use of any office as spoil is absolutely and without qualification illegal, and the comparison which the CHRONICLE has urged between the American spoils system and feudalism and piracy, is apt and just. There is no question of any other party being "more sincere in regard to civil service reform." The question is whether outrageous acts now going on shall be ignored. If they are ignored now, similar ones, if they occurred, would have to be ignored under the next administration, though it might be democratic.

THE CLARKSON STANDARD.

In the course of his remarks, thanking the national committee for the offer of the chairmanship, Mr. Clarkson said:

"I have spent twenty-five years in politics, and I believe, from my experience that the best place to serve the republican party is in its ranks. In my political life I have found that in that field can be made, and are made, the most precious friendships of one's life. There are more sacrifices made in that field than in any other. There is more heart in politics than in any other walk in life, and I say fearlessly and honestly that men engaged in politics will go further to serve a friend than in any other sphere of man's existence. In 1884 we had a hard working committee and lost. In 1888 we had a harder working committee, and, to my knowledge, no campaign was ever conducted more cleanly, more honorably than the campaign of 1888. I know Senator Quay and Colonel Dudley and I hope there is not a republican in this land who will ever cease to render due honor to these two honorable men who went into the hottest fire for the republican party and emerged victorious and without detraction. I have known many men—I have large friendship in the United States—and I want to say to you, gentlemen, that upon my dying bed, before my family, I could not name two men more to be loved and honored than Senator Quay and Colonel Dudley.

"I want to warn you, gentlemen of the committee, against a growing tendency in the republican party, under the hypocrisy of the times, not to defend its party leaders. The cases of Senator Quay and Colonel Dudley afford vivid examples of this practice. They were attacked by a party whose success is derived by the use of the knife in the south and the assassination of character in the north. They were attacked, not because Senator Quay was guilty of any wrong in the campaign, but because he won a victory for the republican party and restored the government to an honest basis. The democrats saw in Senator Quay a corrupter and began their abuse, and a cowardly republican press soon became their allies. No man who has the good of the republican party at heart can do otherwise than to put his honest, strong hands between this accusation of the democratic party and the gentlemen I have just named. So far as I am concerned, if I ever have another boy to name, I will be glad to confer upon him the name of Senator Quay or Dudley, and this as an evidence of the affection I have for the men. In conclusion, I want to state that no man on this continent desires to help the republican ticket or will do more, according to his ability than I."

THE QUAY STANDARD.

[A reminiscence of David Martin, appointed by President Harrison collector of internal revenue, and lately chosen member of the republican national committee.]

Three men sat in the cabinet room in the White House one bright morning in the year of our Lord 1889. One was the President of the United States. The second was Matthew Stanley Quay, senator from Pennsylvania and chairman of the republican national committee. The third was James McManes, the sturdy and wealthy Scotch-Irishman, whose sterling qualities had won for him the respect and confidence of all the residents of the Quaker city.

The President raised his eyes inquiringly to Senator Quay. Obviously he did not know the object of the consultation. Neither did the silent senator. He had been requested by his companion to introduce him to President Harrison and had fulfilled his part. In turn he looked towards Mr. McManes.

Meanwhile the old Scotsman's eyes had been fastened upon the impassive countenance of Benjamin Harrison. When the time came for him to speak he leaned forward in his chair and spoke the few words which he deemed it his solemn duty to utter with all the earnestness at his command.

"I have come here, Mr. President," he said slowly, "to protest against the appointment of David Martin to one of the most important federal offices in this country. He is a disreputable rascal, and his appointment as collector of internal revenue would be an insult to every respectable citizen of Pennsylvania."

The old man half rose from his chair as he continued. His language took on the tinge of the rich North Country accent of his youth and the muscles of his fine face quivered from the indignation burning within his breast. Hastily he sketched Martin's early career. He denounced him as a ruffian at the polls and a manipulator of ballot-boxes. He declared that he was a dispenser of corruption funds contributed by the liquor interests. He held him up, with all the scorn born of contempt, as a willing tool of that element in the social life of Philadelphia which defies law, order and decency. He closed with the remark that no President could afford to appoint such a man to a position of honor and trust.

When he had done the President moved uneasily in his chair and then glanced appealingly at Senator Quay, whose astonishment, though apparent, was not sufficient to loose his silent tongue. The silence was broken by Benjamin Harrison.

"They say," he observed in measured tones, "that the charges against Mr. Martin are not true."

This was more than the honest Scotsman could bear. With all the fierce impetuosity of Roderick Dhu he burst forth in resentment of what seemed to him a reflection upon his veracity.

"Mr. President," he cried, "I have lived long in Philadelphia. I am well known there. You can not find in that whole city a single responsible person who will say that I ever uttered an untruth. There sits Senator Quay. He knows me. I ask you, Senator Quay, if I am not respected in Philadelphia as a man of my word."

"Mr. McManes's word is above question," quietly observed the one addressed.

"Then, Mr. President," continued Mr. McManes, "I reiterate all I have said concerning David Martin. Senator Quay informs you that my veracity is above question. I say to you again, sir, that the appointment of David Martin would be a disgrace to your administration and an insult to every honest citizen of Pennsylvania. That is all I have to say."

Again Benjamin Harrison turned to Matthew S. Quay. This time he secured a response.

"The two senators from Pennsylvania desire this appointment, Mr. President," was all he said.

Mr. McManes made no rejoinder. He bowed to the President of the United States and left the room.—New York World, October 20, 1890.

THE MUGWUMP.

The result is that the politicians of both parties, who are fond of speaking of any who refuse to obey the orders or accept the mandates of the party leaders as traitors and apostates, regard the mugwump with utter abhorrence. They themselves may arrange "deals" by which certain candidates are "knifed" in the interest of the opposition; they may "cut" the ticket, or even within certain limitations "bolt," and not lose caste. All that is legitimate when done in the way of "politics." But that men should actually vote one ticket one year and refuse to vote the same the next from principle—from principle, mark ye—why what will the world come to at that rate? For the creed of your working politician is:

*I don't believe in principle,
But O I do in interest.*

The worst epithet in the politician's vocabulary is mugwump! An oath may add sonority, but does not really increase its ignominious force. That a candidate has the approval of the mugwumps is sufficient cause for voting against him. When Ira Davenport ran for governor of New York against David B. Hill, in 1885, he was defeated by the republicans because the mugwumps favored him. When Edward Murphy, jr., chairman of the New York democratic state committee, put forth his pronunciamento at Chicago against Mr. Cleveland the burden of it was that the regular New York democrats did not like Mr. Cleveland because the mugwumps did. Bourke Cockran, in his speech before the convention, presented the same great objection to the ex-president with wonderful rhetorical fullness and force. It really does seem extraordinary that the fact that a candidate is liked by an element outside his party and promises to draw votes therefrom should make him unpopular with his own party.—Indianapolis News, June 28.

I.

The republican county committee held an harmonious meeting in Grand Opera House Hall last night until near the ending, when a firebrand was thrown by ex-Police Justice Patterson which destroyed all the harmony, and a scene was enacted such as is usual at the meetings of the committee. * * * a protest from some republicans against the present machine in the twentieth district was made. It charged upon the organization a continual deal with Tammany Hall, and declared that the organization was spiritless and ineffective.—New York Evening Post, January 22.

II.

The decent republicans of Cincinnati have been trying to escape from the domination of their party by Geo. B. Cox, the illiterate ex-saloon keeper who secured control of the organization a few years ago and has ruled that great city ever since. But the attempt was a failure. The reformers found that they had to fight not merely Cox and his republican gang, but also the whole democratic machine, which threw all of its strength in favor of the republican machine. The republicans of the citizens' movement cast about 6,200 votes and were not allowed one more than they cast. The Cox ticket was credited with 11,000 votes, but a large share of them were cast by democrats and a good many men voted more than once. The Times-Star, a republican newspaper, says of the proceedings:

"The democrats who were in office were just as eager for the election of the Cox ticket as city republican office-holders. At the primaries there seems to be little or no protection against wholesale voting of democrats for republicans. In certain precincts it is stated that some of them voted twice. It is developed that under our by-partisan system of city government the controlling machine in each party is worked for the benefit of the other, and in yesterday's primaries Mr. Bernard's machine turned out as strongly for Mr. Cox's machine as it was possible. Jerry Mulroy and Mr. Furst were quite as active in yesterday's primaries as they ever were in any democratic primary."

III.

There was a similar "combine" of the two party machines against the reformers of one party in Philadelphia a couple of months ago. Four magistrates were to be chosen. Two of the incumbents had been exposed as having shared their fees with the notorious embezzler Bardsley. Nevertheless, both of them secured a renomination. The decent republicans put two independent candidates in the field against them, and it might have been expected that their majority would have been cut down, if indeed they were not beaten. But the delinquent officials were not at all worried. They made an arrangement with the bosses of the democratic party by which the latter refused to exercise their right to nominate four candidates for magistrates, and put up only two, and threw all of their strength in favor of the two republican rascals. The result was that, although the two independent candidates received about 6,000 votes, the two against whom the movement was directed polled several thousand fewer votes than their respectable associates on the republican ticket.—New York Evening Post, April 27.

IV.

The announcement that Boss McKane will support the democratic ticket this year is of interest and importance. McKane is the man who rules the town of Gravesend, which includes Coney Island, and he rules it with a rod of iron. In 1884 this town gave Cleveland 667 votes and Blaine 295. Not long afterward McKane quarrelled with the leaders of the Kings county democracy, and in 1888 he came out against his old party, the result being a vote in Gravesend of only 397 for Cleveland, while Harrison had 833. Harrison rewarded McKane by allowing him to name his man for United States marshal. In 1890 the boss still opposed his old party, and allowed a most popular democratic candidate for sheriff to poll only 233 votes, while his republican opponent was given 1,023. Before the election of 1891 a peace was patched up, but McKane had previously promised to vote his town for the republican state ticket, and he kept that promise, giving Fassett 1,908 votes against only 180 for Flower, while the democratic county ticket, which was acceptable to him, received about 1,800 votes, as against only about 250 for the republican.—New York Evening Post, July 6.

V.

The Brooklyn republican politicians who have been fighting one another steadily for five years are engaged just now in another wrangle, and the lines of battle are drawn on the old Nathan and anti-Nathan basis. Ernst Nathan [internal revenue collector], who is very closely related, politically, to certain democratic leaders, was able to induce the aldermen at a recent meeting to alter the boundary of his ward, the twenty-third, by annexing to it a large section of the twenty-fifth ward, containing about 3,000 voters, of whom 2,000 are republicans.

In this way Nathan is able to control enough votes to name the candidate in his assembly district, and with the help of the twenty-first ward, to name the candidate in his senatorial district. This practically makes him boss of the party in Kings county, and the anti-Nathan forces are beginning to grumble. United States District Attorney Jesse Johnson took the initiative yesterday and lodged a formal protest against the change with Acting Mayor Coffey. It was in the form of a letter asking for a chance to be heard before the resolution was signed.—New York Times, July 2.

VI.

Naval Officer Willis returned from Washington yesterday, and when told that the democratic aldermen had cut out part of the twenty-fifth ward and handed it over to Nathan in the twenty-third ward, he said:

"There is no doubt in my mind but that the change was made to pay Mr. Nathan for the favors that have passed between him and Mr. McLaughlin and Mr. Shevlin. Why, everybody knows it. It's as plain as day. The democratic party, it is easy to see, did not make those changes for its own benefit in the twenty-third and twenty-fifth wards. They would never have proceeded in the way they did if their desire was to make the best possible profit of the circumstances. It was done for Nathan, and, if I am right, will not help him materially. He, of course, thinks differently. Of one thing I am certain, and it is this:—This move has demonstrated to a great many people that Nathan and McLaughlin and Shevlin are on very good terms. The story of their friendship is an old one and very generally known, but until this move a great many did not pay much attention to it. They are all convinced now."—New York Times, July 3.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"To the Victor Belong the Spoils."

THE LORD PARAMOUNT.

I am an advocate of civil service reform. My brief experience at Washington has led me to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens. * * * [Senator Benjamin Harrison.]

Only conceive such a lure held out to this great people, and all the little offices of the Government thus set up for the price of the victory, without regard to merit or anything but party services, and you have a spectacle of baseness and rapacity such as was never seen before. No preaching of the Gospel in our land, no parental discipline, no schools, not all the machinery of virtue together, can long be a match for the corrupting power of our political strifes actuated by such a law as this. It would make us a nation of apostates at the foot of Sinai.—From a Sermon by Rev. Horace Bushnell, in 1840.

A. D. Shaw, deputy third auditor of treasury, will be given a reception on Thursday evening June 2, at Grand Army Hall, 60 Clifford avenue, by his Grand Army, railroad and Knights of Pythias comrades and friends.—Indianapolis News, May 28.

* * *

Ruckle Post hall was illuminated last night and upon the walls hung many flags and yards of hunting. Col. A. D. Shaw, deputy third auditor of the treasury and supervisor of railroad votes for the Harrison administration, formerly, plain "Gus" Shaw, boss of the Big Four yards in this city, was to be received. He was to be welcomed home, as it was announced "by his comrades of the Grand Army, and brethren of the link and pin and fraters of the great pythian order." "It was an auspicious occasion," remarked Harry Mounts, a deputy in Collector Hilderbrand's office, when he called the meeting to order. He told the large audience, principally composed of Grand Army representatives, that they had met to give greeting to their old comrade, who had come home to spend a few days.—Indianapolis Sentinel, June 3.

Shaw [deputy third auditor], Mounts [United States custom-house] and the other Indianapolis railroad men are here using the blue book against Chase and are trying to organize a laboring men's demonstration against him for this evening.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 27.

* * *

Charles Martin, Harry Mounts and Frank Alley have been reinforced by Gus Shaw, deputy third auditor of the treasury. When a railroad man is proclaiming against the parson he is a follower of Gus Shaw, the officeholder. * *

Shaw is still paying for his place in the treasury department by operating for the administration against Chase, and Alley is assistant. * *

During this speech, Harry Mounts, secretary of the Conductors' Brotherhood, and a trainman wearing a Chase badge got into an argument about the merits of Murray's speech. It was quite heated at times, and closed with this remark from Mounts: "I will vote for Chase, but he is not the man to nominate. He will weaken the ticket, and the desire to nominate him is to weaken poor Ben Harrison."

The value of this remark will be appreciated when it is recalled that Mounts is a deputy in the custom-house, and Murray, the conductor, an employe of McKee, the never-wavering friend of Harrison.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 28.

* * *

Henry Mounts, of the custom-house, the leader of the "railroad" opposition to the "parson," rushed up to the nominee, and grasping his hand in a tight grip, declared, "I am for you, Governor." Less than a week ago Mr. Mounts was busy circulating dodgers, which in burning words asserted that if Chase were nominated he would lose the votes of ten thousand railroad men in Indiana, of whom it was understood Mounts was many. Now Mounts declares himself not one of the ten thousand.—Indianapolis News, June 28.

A. D. Shaw, deputy auditor, has returned from Indiana and elsewhere, after a month's absence.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 4.

United States Marshal Dunlap and Assistant District Attorney Cockrum arrived at noon.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 25.

John B. Cockrum [assistant United States district attorney], has Smiley N. Chambers's boom in hand. He is working like a man who sees the district attorneyship in his grasp, in case he wins for his chief.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 27.

* * *

Al. Moore, deputy United States marshal, Ed. Conway, deputy United States marshal, John Cockrum, assistant United States attorney, Henry Mounts, of the United States custom-house; Eugene Saulcey, of the United States revenue department; Billy Patterson, of the United States postal department; Benno Mitchell, of the United States government at large, are among the high-toned visitors who are honoring Fort Wayne with their presence.—Fort Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 27.

* * *

It was the voice of the meeting that if Chase is to be beaten, the opposition must be organized at once. The merits of the various men mentioned were considered, and it was voted that Judge Elliott would be the strongest candidate to put up against the governor. The only person present who objected to Elliott was Warren G. Sayre [Indian commissioner], who stated his reason to be that when he [Sayre] and Robertson were having their trouble with Green Smith, Judge Elliott was asked to swear in the lieutenant-governor, and declined on the ground that the question at issue might get into the courts and possibly come before him for judgment.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 27.

* * *

It is averred that Mr. Chambers never had any idea of being nominated, and that he consented to enter the race for the sole purpose of taking away some of the strength that threatened to go to Chase. Whether this story is true or not, it has been evident that the men who have been here pretending to be for Chambers have been much more industrious in opposing Chase than in furthering the chances of Mr. Chambers. John B. Cockrum [assistant U. S. district attorney], who has been managing the Chambers boom, has been ready and anxious for two days to promise Chambers's strength to any one upon whom the anti-Chase people might unite. Mr. Cockrum was in the "round-up" anti meeting last night and pledged Chambers's support for Elliott. The true friends of Judge Elliott have no hand in the movement to make him a candidate.—Fort Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 28.

FEUDS.

In spite of the sweltering atmosphere there was a large gathering at the Carnegie music hall, Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, last night, at the ratification meeting held under the direction of the republican club. Letters of regret were read from Vice-President Morton, Senator Hiscock, J. Sloat Fassett, William M. Evarts and Warner Miller. But not one word came from ex-Boss Platt.—New York Times, June 22.

* * *

The voluble Clarkson probably sees by this time how he cheapened himself by his precipitate haste in getting back into the Harrison camp. Those more astute campaigners, Quay and Platt, have a higher idea of their own worth, and are calmly waiting for the invitations which they are sure will come all in good time. Quay says he feels "the need of a long rest," as he is "tired," and must "nurse himself," and the erstwhile loquacious Platt has "not a word to say." It is already given out at Washington that "there is no disposition on the President's part to punish Platt or Miller or Quay," as he is ready to "let bygones be bygones and to encourage everybody to come together and work harmoniously for the success of the ticket."—New York Evening Post, June 18.

* * *

The Herald says: "Ex-Senator Thomas C. Platt received his first overture from the Harrison administration yesterday. Secretary Tracy met him at the Manhattan Beach Hotel, and they were in close consultation for two hours. The conference was a satisfactory one. As a result of it Mr. Tracy left the hotel shortly after it was over, although he had expected to spend the night there, and took an evening train back to Washington to carry the news to the President. Just what was asked of Mr. Platt and was promised to him it will be impossible to say until these things develop in the approaching campaign. It is understood that Mr. Tracy came here with the express purpose of taking initiatory steps to placate the man who controls the republican machine in this state. That Mr. Platt was willing to receive the secretary and talk over the situation in good spirits, is the best of evidence, say the politicians, that he is in a frame of mind to be placated."—New York Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 21.

General Clarkson, chairman of the republican national committee, had a long conference with the President at the White House to night in regard to the political situation.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 26.

There is a general agreement that the truce entered into between Senator M. S. Quay and C. L. Magee at Harrisburgh last year has been broken, and that the battle for supremacy in the republican party of the state, of which the defeat of Delamater for governor in 1890 was an incident, will be taken up again. The two leaders have been drifting apart for some time. The positive attitude of each against the other at Minneapolis strained their bonds to the breaking point. Senator Quay's persistent opposition to the confirmation of George W. Miller for internal revenue collector for the twenty-second district is expected to be the last straw. Magee's paper, the Pittsburgh Times, this morning printed a Washington dispatch, in which these words were used:

"It is asserted that should Mr. Quay attempt by his opposition to Mr. Miller's confirmation to continue the assumption of a proprietary right in the political affairs of the state in which he has in recent years received a severe rebuke, he may expect to receive a reprimand direct, instead of through his man, as in the gubernatorial election of 1890."

This is construed to mean that Magee will take off his coat to prevent the return of Quay to the United States senate.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, June 30.

Messrs. Hiscock and Platt were both at work among the committeemen in the corridors of the hotel last night. Among other prominent republicans in the corridors were ex-Congressman Henry J. Burligh, ex-Railroad Commissioner Isaac V. Baker, Congressman James W. Wadsworth, Congressman N. W. Curtis, Congressman John M. Weaver, Howard White, editor of the Syracuse Standard; Willard A. Cobb, editor of the Lockport Journal; Ellis H. Roberts, assistant treasurer; William Leary, John A. Sleicher, Collector Frank Hendricks and ex-State Senator Sweet.—New York Times, June 28.

* * *

A gentleman who talked with Land Commissioner Carter to-day asked him what he thought of the organization of the New York republican state committee, and Mr. Carter is quoted as replying, "It looks as though they had given us a cold deck." It is the impression among the republicans in the national committee that if there is to be any work done in New York for Harrison, it must be done by the national committee. The state committee will do nothing for Harrison.

Mr. Platt is reported as having said that there was no trouble in getting promises from Mr. Harrison; he had a barrel full of them now, all several years old and unfulfilled. To work for Harrison's election would be to simply accept a number of promises that would be broken almost as soon as made.

There is no doubt among Harrison's friends that if anything is to be done in New York for him it must be done by the national committee, and by his friends. The organization of the state committee is regarded as a menace to Harrison's success in the state. In order to be sure that Harrison is looked after, a branch of the national committee will have to be named for New York, as there is a distrust of the intentions of the Platt and Warner Miller faction.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 1.

PUBLIC OFFICERS AT THEIR DUTIES.

There was some doubt last night whether Land Commissioner Carter, of Montana, would accept the secretaryship of the national committee. Mr. Carter believes that he could materially assist in making Montana purely republican this year, including the legislature, which will elect a United States senator, if he could only give the state his undivided attention.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 30.

* * *

Who will be chairman of the republican national committee? Mr. Campbell reached Washington this morning and made known his decision to the President as soon as he could gain admittance to the White House. He had, in fact, arranged for a conference at the White House, and it began soon after Mr. Campbell arrived. Besides the President and Mr. Campbell, there were present Land Commissioner Carter, Secretaries Elkins and Rusk, ex-Senator Spooner of Wisconsin, and L. T. Michener.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 6.

Chairman Campbell, of the national republican committee, arrived in the city on the noon train from Chicago. He was met at the depot by Mr. Michener, the President's personal friend. They immediately took a carriage for the Arlington Hotel. Mr. Campbell did not register, but went directly to the room of Commissioner of the Land Office Carter, who is also secretary of the national republican committee, where Mr. Carter, Mr. Michener and Mr. Campbell held a consultation lasting about half an hour. They afterwards left the hotel together, going directly to the White House, and were in conference for four hours with the President, Secretary Elkins, ex-Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin, and Secretary Rusk.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 6.

* * *

Mr. William J. Campbell, who has put aside the chairmanship of the republican national committee, was very busy in Washington to-day up to the time of his departure for New York. In the morning he had a long conference with Col. Dudley and Gen. Michener of Indiana, and then he went to the White House and was closeted with the President, Secretary Elkins, and Land Commissioner Carter. The composition of the executive committee was discussed, but after the conference Mr. Campbell said he was not yet ready to announce the committee. He said he might announce it after he reached New York. It was generally understood that he desired to consult with Gen. Clarkson before completing the list. There has been a decided hitch concerning this committee, the President desiring to have several men on it whom Campbell and Clarkson do not favor.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 7.

* * *

Chairman William J. Campbell, of the republican national committee, arrived at the Imperial Hotel, Broadway and Thirty-second street, early last evening, having left Washington a little after noon. "Do you expect to confer with Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Platt while here?"

"I should be glad to see them both if opportunity presents itself, but I have made no arrangements for any meeting with them."

A story was passed through the corridor last night that "Sam" Fessenden, of Connecticut, Land Commissioner Carter, Secretary of the Treasury Foster, General Clarkson, and possibly one or two others, were to meet Mr. Campbell and make an attempt to select some one to take up what seems to be the unattractive task of managing President Harrison's campaign.

Mr. Campbell said that while it was true that Commissioner Carter was on his way to this city he did not think it was for the purpose of conferring on this particular topic.

"If Mr. Carter is here during my stay, probably I shall see him," said Mr. Campbell. "I do not know that Secretary Foster is coming, or that his visit would have any connection with the selection of the committee if he did come."—New York Times, July 7.

HENCHMEN IN ACTIVE SERVICE.

The republicans opened their campaign here this evening, John L. Griffiths and John B. Cockrum [assistant United States district attorney], of Indianapolis, making addresses.—Lebanon Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 14.

* * *

The Indiana republican association of Washington will have a ratification meeting at G. A. R. Hall, No. 1,411 Pennsylvania avenue, at 8 o'clock to-morrow night, at which the nominations made by the Minneapolis convention will be indorsed by resolution and speeches. The principal speaker will be the Hon. William M. Marine, collector of the port of Baltimore.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 2.

* * *

Indiana republicans in Washington feel that the cause of republicanism was given a very decided impetus at their ratification meeting last night. There was an immense turnout of Hoosiers, quite all of the members of the Indiana republican club and many others being present. President John C. Cheney presided. The speech by William Marine, collector of the port of Baltimore, indorsing the nomination of Harrison and Reid, was a great success. It was largely devoted to the personal character of the President, and was a high tribute. Thomas H. McKee, Frank Swigart and A. D. Shaw [deputy third auditor] also delivered short, but eloquent speeches.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 4.

* * *

The political allies of President Harrison are already confessing that they expect to see him make a very poor showing in Kings county on election day, and they do not hesitate to give their reasons. They merely point to the fact that that old political trickster, Ernst Nathan, is again in the saddle, and ask all inquirers to point to a single year when Nathan led his party to anything but ignominious defeat.—N. Y. Times, July 3.

* * *

There is no doubt about the fact that Nathan, who was badly beaten by Naval Officer Willis at the primaries which decided the complexion of the Kings county delegation to the Minneapolis convention, is again at the head of affairs. By a neat trick he elected one of his own tools, Michael J. Dady, chairman of the executive committee, and then forced the election of Francis H. Wilson as chairman of the campaign committee. Through these two men he will have absolute control of the approaching fight, and the candidates must call on him for support or get up an internal fight which would prove fatal.

"The outlook is certainly not very cheerful," said one of the few friends President Harrison has made in Brooklyn, "for this fellow Nathan is the most pliant tool Thomas C. Platt has in this state. He has been keeping hold of his office of collector of internal revenue, given him by Harrison, solely for the power it confers upon him, yet he did not hesitate to use that power in his efforts to defeat the President's renomination."

"There are certainly no republicans in this city who do not know of the fight made by Nathan to send anti-Harrison delegates to the convention, so that none of us can be deceived now by his assertion that he was for Harrison all along and had never favored any one else. He has not even the self-respect to resign the office given him by the President, and yet he knows that he would have been removed before this if it had not been that Gen. Harrison realized that he could not afford to dismiss a public officer solely because of that officer's personal treachery to him.

"But it is very humiliating, I can tell you, to be compelled to go to this political jockey for every single thing we want during the next four months. What is more, a great many of the best men in the party won't do it. I know half a dozen who have already refused and who declare they will take no part in a campaign managed by Nathan.—New York Times, July 3.

* * *

The employes at the Brooklyn navy yard were surprised to learn yesterday that Edward F. Page, chief of the Ordnance Department, had been removed by Secretary Tracy.

Page is a good republican, but is said to have expressed a belief that Harrison could not be re-elected, and to have worked in his ward to send an anti-Harrison delegate to Minneapolis.

"I have not the slightest idea why I have been discharged," he said yesterday. "I went to Washington to ascertain the cause and demanded the right to face my accusers. The secretary merely said that he had been told that I had neglected my duty. That is false, no matter who says it. My books, all written up to date, prove it."

J. W. Beaty, the opponent of ex-Senator Birkett in the fourth ward, and a Harrison worker in the recent faction squabble, expects to get the vacant place.—New York Times, July 1.

The President to-day sent to the senate the nomination of William H. Leaycraft of New York to be assistant appraiser of merchandise in the district of New York. For years Leaycraft has been the republican boss of the thirteenth ward, and has been able to carry around in his pocket the delegates elected from that ward to the nominating conventions in the ninth assembly, the third senatorial, and the third congressional districts. He was a devoted follower of Thos. C. Platt until the latter lost the legislature and Leaycraft was put out of his position as port warden. Since then he has trained with Naval Officer Willis, and his appointment now is regarded as a slap at Platt and Nathan.—New York Times, July 7.

Some racy testimony against the republican office-holders in Alabama will be considered by the house committee on civil service reform at the meeting which Chairman Andrew has called for to-morrow morning.

The matter comes before the committee on the resolution offered Monday by Representative Herbert (Dem., Ala.), for an investigation, and the striking feature of the charges is that they are signed by William J. Stevens, chairman of the republican executive committee of Alabama, and dated June 25, 1892.

This state committee represents the anti-office holding element in Alabama, and it is evident from its complaints that it is not ready to wheel into the Harrison column, even though the President has been renominated. Mr. Stevens, in his letter to Representative Herbert, incloses a copy of the resolutions unanimously adopted by the republican state convention at Montgomery on April 28, 1892, charging most flagrant violations of the civil service law.

He goes further than this, however, and declares that the United States marshal and receiver of the Mobile and Girard Railroad Company's lands has not managed his trust in the interest of the government, and that many thousands of dollars have been disbursed without vouchers or receipts being taken.

He makes serious charges against the United States district attorney and declares that he has continued cases on the promise of defendants that they would return home and use their influence in controlling conventions, and has dismissed cases in order to secure indorsements as a candidate for judicial honors. It is further declared that he has used his prestige to control the action of juries, and, in one case, has called men from the jury room in order to change their votes and action before the jury.

It is further declared that the collector of internal revenue has not only violated the civil service law, but has levied, collected, and borrowed large sums of money from numerous applicants for office, said money having never been repaid. Numerous witnesses are cited to sustain the accusations, and affidavits are made to some of them.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, June 30.

A CALAMITY.

"What would the nomination of Mr. Cleveland mean?"

"It would mean the destruction of the regular organizations in the great democratic cities of the state and in the state itself."—Murphy, Tammany Boss, at Chicago, June 17.

EXAMPLES.

I

All persons who think of getting on the Brooklyn police force are advised to see to it that they have a political "pull" before they endeavor to pass the civil service examination.

They will find it very useful later on.

That has been the recent experience of Nicholas Callan, prize fighter. He decided some time ago that there was more money to be made in raiding prize fights than there was in conducting them, so he consulted ex-Assemblyman Sheridan about getting on the force.

In due time he appeared for his competitive examination, and passed well toward the head of his class, standing No. 6. This was really embarrassing, for Callan had arranged to participate in just one more fight before retiring, but if he was appointed a policeman he could not do it.

Sheridan was appealed to, and again he "fixed" things, so that Police Commissioner Hayden appointed thirty-three new patrolmen, but left Callan out. The latter thereupon took his place in the ring and was badly whipped. He at once yearned for the police force, and the commissioner very accommodatingly turned back on the list a few days ago and appointed him.—New York Times, May 30.

II.

The recent appointment of Alexander McLean as acting janitor of the new grammar school, No. 62, on One Hundred and Fifty-seventh street, near Cortlandt avenue, by Tammany trustees of the twenty-third ward, in which the school is situated, is a striking illustration of the way in which the organization rewards its supporters, "without regard to race, color, or previous condition."

McLean has had dealings with the board of education for more than six years, receiving many jobs of repairing school buildings in the twenty-third ward. His bills for this work have not always been found correct when sent to the comptroller's office for payment. Instead of making these accounts out in his own name, he used at different times the name of E. A. McLean & Co. and M. E. McLean, which was found to be the name of his twelve-year-old daughter, by Superintendent of School Buildings George W. Debevoise, who was asked by President Simmons of the board of education to make an examination. This request by the president was explained in a letter to the clerk of the board of education, in 1886, by E. V. Loew, comptroller, declaring that many of McLean's bills were "false in fact, and that if payment were made by this department upon the strength of the certificates attached to the vouchers, the city would be defrauded."

When an inspector of the comptroller's office made an investigation he found that many false charges had been entered by McLean. One of them was for "2,400 brick, four days' labor for mason, five days' labor for laborer." The alleged repairing was done at the branch of school No. 60, at Brook avenue and One Hundred and Forty-first street. The inspector found that not a brick was in the building except the chimney, and no work of any kind had been done by McLean. Another instance was where, two years previous, McLean had slated the roof of grammar school No. 60, at College avenue and One Hundred and Forty-fifth street without authority. He attempted to charge for it, but the account was not indorsed by the superintendent of school buildings.

The reductions recommended in the report of the inspector from the comptroller's office were made, and no demand for payment in full was received from McLean.

During the term of office of George W. Debevoise as superintendent of school buildings, the trustees of the twenty-third ward made frequent attempts to have McLean, who is a Tammany "heeler" in that section, appointed as a janitor. Mr. Debevoise knew the man was unfit for the position, and refused to sign his license. The trustees who are backing McLean are William Hogg and Samuel Samuels, whose devotion to Tammany is well known. There is a third trustee who votes with them in these matters, and by his aid the appointment of McLean has at last been made. The other three trustees in addition to Hogg and Samuels are: Thomas J. Rusk, James A. Ferguson and Dr. A. F. Brugman. The position will net McLean about $800 a year, with no rent, and free coal, after he pays his assistants and all necessary expenses, leaving him ample time to continue his work as "repairer" of public schools.—New York Evening Post, May 9.

III.

State Railroad Inspector Thomas W. Spencer has been asked for his resignation, to take effect July 1. Mr. Spencer has occupied the position nine years. He is peculiarly well qualified for the office, having spent many years in charge of the building and equipment of several important railroads. His record in the position has been admirable, as he is a man of the highest integrity and ability.

The place is to be filled by the appointment of Frank K. Baxter, ex-city surveyor of this city, and a close political partner of Railroad Commissioner Beardsley. His main qualification for the position is his ability to run a caucus or engineer a convention in the most approved Hill style. He is utterly incompetent as an expert, and has had no experience in railroad work whatever.—Utica Dispatch to New York Times, May 3.

IV.

The dictation of Senator D. B. Hill and the influence of State Comptroller Frank Campbell in the matter of the appointment of game and fish protectors for the Lake Keuka district have renewed the license of the fish pirates on that lake, and virtually notified them that they may go on with their illegal netting of salmon trout with the same immunity from interference by the protectors under Governor Flower's administration that they enjoyed to the utmost during Governor Hill's time. It was only a few years ago that Lake Keuka, the fairest of New York's inland waters, provided the best salmon trout fishing of any water in the country. It was Seth Green's favorite fishing place. Twelve-pounders were not uncommon, and a four-pounder was not regarded as much of a catch to brag of, so plentiful and superior were these princes of game fish.

Four or five years ago Governor Hill appointed a saloon keeper of Penu Yau, John Sheridan, to take charge of the fish interests of Lake Keuka. Sheridan was and is a local Hill healer of the most enthusiastic kind. He knew nothing about salmon trout or their importance, but he knew many of the most persistent fish pirates of the lake, for there were many of them who were regular patrons of his saloon.

Protest after protest went to Albany, during the administration of Governor Hill, against the retention of so palpably unfit a man, through personal interest and association, as guardian of the fish interests of the lake, but they were never listened to. The fish pirates had votes, and they were not likely to go against the wishes of the governor's game protector.—Hammondsport Dispatch to New York Times, June 7.

V.

Christopher C. Collins was made captain of the Park police by the Park board yesterday to succeed Capt. Thomas Beatty, who died on March 26. The appointment is a curious one, and it illustrates the beautiful workings of local civil service reform as the system is now administered. Collins, who has been a sergeant of the Park police for a few weeks, was born in Ireland in 1852, and became a gate keeper in Central Park in 1879, as a member of the Park police force. He was made a park keeper in March, 1880, and a roundsman in 1885.

Then came a set-back to Mr. Collin's career. In 1887 he was reduced from roundsman to park keeper. He held that place until March 24, just two days before the death of Capt. Beatty. He was then made roundsman again, and his later promotions have come with a rapidity that is singular. After serving as a roundsman for a month and a few days Collins was made a sergeant by the Park board on May 5. This promotion was not made because of any special service he had rendered the department, but because it had been planned by the Tammany leaders to make him a captain, and he had to be a sergeant before he could take the civil service examination for the captaincy.

The sergeants who took the civil service examination were James B. Ferris, who got a rating of 98.75; Louis Flock, the senior sergeant of the force, who has been in the service for twenty years, and who got a rating of 96.50, and Collins, who got a rating of 96.52. Collins was chosen at yesterday's meeting without opposition by the votes of Commissioners Dana, Gallup and Tappen. Commissioner Straus was not present and Sergeant Flock thought that he would have stood a better chance had Mr. Straus been there.

Mr. Gallup, in explaining why Collins was chosen, said that the department wanted new blood, and that Collins was a man of strong individuality. Mr. Gallup thought that a retired cavalry officer, who would be "a good horseman and a gentleman," would make the ideal police captain; but there was no retired cavalry officer on hand. Collins, he said, would look well in the saddle.

Capt. Collin's salary will be $2,750. He is a relative of Mrs. Richard Croker and he is a member of the Tammany Hall general committee.—New York Times, July 1.

VI.

Drs. Abraham Jacobi and T. Mitchell Prudden have withdrawn from the health department of this city. The reason they give for this action is that the board has become a political machine, and as their connection with it was purely in a non-partisan and scientific capacity, they concluded that their usefulness was fast drawing to a close.

Dr. Jacobi said last night: * * *

"When I say that the department has fallen into the hands of a political machine, of course I mean Tammany Hall.

"The trouble dates back to the peremptory demand for the resignation of Dr. W. A. Ewing, sanitary superintendent, which was without warrant, only that his place was wanted for a Tammany man. The way in which Ewing's resignation was demanded was simply disgraceful. I was told by him that on the day he resigned, President Charles Wilson, of the board, asked him for his resignation, and he said he would take twenty four hours to consider it, but President Wilson told him that he must have the resignation that afternoon, and added: 'If your resignation is not forthcoming at once, mine will be demanded by the powers that be.'

"I was very reluctant to sever my connection with the department, for it was I who suggested the Willard-Parker Hospital for scarlet fever and diphtheria while I was president of the state medical society. Besides, the best methods for doing good for the health of the community are through the health department, and I had hoped to be of much more service than I had been, but the outside pressure was too great and I could not consistently remain in the position."

Dr. Prudden was reluctant to discuss his resignation. "My connection with the board of health," he said, "was solely in a scientific capacity. I am not a partisan of any kind, and when I saw matters shaping the department into a political machine, I did not consider that my professional duties were any longer required. The forcing out of Dr. Ewing and Counselor Prentice, two men of great worth to the board and its impartial work, was the beginning of the trouble."

Dr. Ewing reiterated what Dr. Jacobi had said in regard to his sudden withdrawal from the board and how impatient President Wilson was for his resignation.

"Now," said the doctor, "I wish it understood that the position of sanitary superintendent came to me from President Wilson in the spring of 1889 unsolicited. I am not a politician but a physician, and devoted myself to the impartial service of the city as its chief sanitarian. I do not in the least regret leaving the position. The simple fact is Tammany wanted the place for Dr. Cyrus Edson and had to have it. So I got out."—New York Times, June 25.

VII.

Drs. Richard H. Derby, Daniel M. Stimson and Joseph O'Dwyer resigned yesterday from the medical consulting board of the health department. The reason actuating them was the same as that which caused Drs. Janeway, Jacobi, Prudden and Smith to leave the board—the infusion of too much politics into the administration of the department. By the withdrawal of these last three gentlemen, the consulting board is practically wiped out, only one member, Dr. George F. Shradly, remaining.

"My resignation," said Dr. O'Dwyer to a reporter, "is to be attributed to the same cause that led to the resignation of the other members of the consulting board. It is a protest on my part against the introduction of politics in the administration of the board of health. I have no objection to urge against Dr. Cyrus Edson, the new sanitary superintendent, on the score of his ability, but Dr. Ewing was equally able, and there was absolutely no excuse for discharging him."—New York Times, July 6.

VIII.

Now that the Chicago convention is over and the Kings county leaders want to show to the world that they will cordially and honestly support Cleveland, the story of how and why they agreed to support Hill is gradually leaking out.

To those who knew how McLaughlin denounced Hill last fall as a trickster and fraud for his treatment of Alfred C. Chapin, it was a surprise to hear that he had fallen in with the February convention plan, and had agreed to stand by Hill to the last.

Those men said then that there was some deal, and they were right, although they didn't know just what it was.

As a matter of fact, there was a sale by Hill, and the article disposed of was the New York and Brooklyn bridge.

This statement is made, not on the word of some "well-informed man," but as an actual fact, and The Times can substantiate it. Hill went about the state buying up delegates wherever he could not bulldoze them into supporting him, and he found that the thing Hugh McLaughlin most wanted was the control of the big bridge, which he had lost through the stupidity of ex-Mayor Chapin, Controller Jackson, and a few others.

So Hill sent one of his numerous emissaries over to Willoughby street with this message:

"For a full delegation from Kings county I will give you the bridge."

McLaughlin considered the matter and accepted the bargain. But he did not have much faith in Hill's promises and was ready to dump him and his presidential aspirations overboard even as late as the Hoffman House conference.

A gentleman who was at that conference said to a Times reporter yesterday:

"McLaughlin went over to that meeting solely to see Hill and ascertain if he was going to keep to his part of the bargain, and they had a long talk on the subject in my hearing. Hill vowed by everything that he was dealing straight, and closed the conversation by hammering his fist upon the table and saying: 'I assure you, Mr. McLaughlin, that the bridge will be yours. This fellow Wagstaff will resign at the next meeting.' And he did."—New York Times, June 26.

A subscriber at St. Cloud, Minnesota, writes: "The CHRONICLE has been to me of the highest worth. It has fanned a spark of patriotism that greatly needs kindling, in a latitude where one is tempted to believe that every man has his price, and where few believe that office is public trust."

Another subscriber from Buffalo says: "I wish to congratulate you on the first number of the fourth year. You do manage to hit the bull's eye on what you have to say on this question, about as often as you shoot. There is nothing, to my mind, like saying what you have to say in such shape that no one can misunderstand it."

"I enclose one dollar, my usual subscription, to your paper. I see an intimation in the last number that after the present year its discontinuance is probable. The field you occupy is so important, and the service you are rendering so valuable, that I can not but view your retirement with extreme regret.

"The fight for civil service reform is but just begun, as I view it, and to give up any of our positions now is hazarding everything.

"Very truly yours, JOHN H. MAGEE.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Ind.

THE CHRONICLE will be glad to receive information from all sources relating to the participation of office-holders in the campaign. The facts are often shown in newspapers, and the favor of wrapping and mailing will be much appreciated.

THE pictures the CHRONICLE is able to give this month of the progress of the campaign are interesting and vivid. The great triumph of the month is the Placation of Platt and Quay. They blocked all progress, and when the Placation was announced the Indianapolis Journal said, as its load of anxiety rolled off, "Now that Senator Quay and ex-Senator Platt have got into the republican band wagon the procession is ready to move." The other noticeable feature of the campaign is the ceaseless activity of the President, in which he is openly aided by a large number of his great office-holders like Collector Hendricks of New York. On every hand the question arises, What are "the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage"?

IN a speech at Malone to "old soldiers," President Harrison declared himself to be in a non-partisan mood, and this was the only condition fit for the occasion. Expressing his reflections as a non-partisan he declared that we are a favored nation, free from contiguity with great military powers; but that, nevertheless, we have duties and responsibilities. He was not very definite in pointing out those duties and responsibilities, except to say that we should resume our "once proud participation in the ocean-carrying trade of the world." It is a pity that while in a non-partisan mood he did not consider, and in good set terms, such as he knows so well, reflect upon a President who uses the full power of the civil service to secure the selection of delegates favorable to himself, among whom are 140 who hold places in the service absolutely at his will, and who has another office-holder, to whom he has given a chance to make $40,000 a year, come from London to manage the convention of these delegates, and who sits at the ends of two wires running into the official presidential residence for days "sending and receiving messages from the seat of war," until he has by these means accomplished his renomination. There is much which could be said as to our responsibilities and duties in relation to such a President.

IN the general laudation of President Harrison, which is going on among his partisans and the general boast about his "clean administration," we have looked patiently for some expression concerning his management of the civil service as compared with his platform. Among other places we have looked in the New York Tribune, in Colonel Elliott Shepard's paper, and particularly in Senator Hoar's article in the July Forum, and we have watched a large list of eastern and western papers. On every hand there is silence. We call attention to this, for if a favorable comparison can be made it will be of the greatest advantage to the candidacy of President Harrison, and will save him the loss of several close states, including Indiana.

WITH the cholera approaching, it is possible that this city will examine the conduct of some part of its affairs. We have the best city government that we have ever had. Nevertheless no one can return from eastern cities without being impressed with the comparatively scandalous amount of dirt that lies on the streets and sidewalks of Indianapolis. We pay a large sum weekly for street hands. It would be interesting to know where in the world these men put in their time. Are we being swindled by "politics," and are these men hired not for their services but to give them places? Do they get in and stay in by political "pulls" and work about as their feelings dictate? Will not the mayor and the board of public works render this city the greatest service and give it the worth of its money as they can by introducing the Boston labor system? There is no cleaner city than Boston. Secretary Tracy with this system has revolutionized the work of the navy-yards. New York under Tammany was one of the dirtiest cities in the world, but its few months under this system is rapidly making it one of the cleanest.

THE Civil Service Record, published at Boston, and the Civil Service Reformer, published at Baltimore, have been consolidated, and now appear as Good Government, published at Washington. We shall miss the Record, with its even temper and absolute fairness; and we shall miss the Reformer, with its scholarly ability and its stinging blow. The editor of Good Government is Mr. Francis E. Leupp, well known as the Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post. There is also a committee of publication consisting of George William Curtis, Charles J. Bonaparte, Edward Cary, Richard H. Dana, William Potts and Herbert Welsh. The subscription is one dollar a year, and it is to be hoped that every friend of civil service reform will subscribe. The address is the Corcoran Building, Washington, D. C.

MANY years ago "Jim" Tyner was an Indiana republican politician. He passed into obscurity to be resurrected by President Harrison along with Warmouth, Paul Vandervoort, and many others of unpleasant memory. He is now assistant attorney-general for the post-office department. He is Wanamaker's kind of a man, and he has been giving his chief an "opinion" upon the civil service law and the Baltimore post-office investigation. He quotes from the statute the prohibitions against soliciting or receiving money "for any political purpose whatever," and then says that they do not apply to primaries where Postmaster Johnson and Marshal Airey heading the Baltimore federal office-holders, and forming the Johnson-Airey faction are, on behalf of the President, desperately fighting the non-office-holding republicans. Then he takes the ground that the rule which directs that any employe who shall willfully violate any of the above prohibitions "shall be dismissed from the service," should only be applied after "conviction upon indictment." It will be remembered that Judge Bradley charged the jury which acquitted Mahone's blackmailers that the failure of the executive to dismiss the accused was prima facie evidence of their innocence. Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte in Good Government, for August, thus closes a discussion of this knavish trickery:

While the assistant attorney-general says they can not be removed until they have been convicted, the judge says they can not be convicted until they have been removed. The result of the two views combined is that the law and the rules may be violated with equal impunity and become, practically, a dead letter.

It is sufficiently easy to detect an underlying motive for all this paltry quibbling. A postmaster-general may not wish his subordinates to rob the mails; so, if there is reasonable ground to suspect that any of them have done this, he will consider these persons unfit to remain in the service and will purge it of them. The same officer may wish them to violate the civil service law whenever he believes—very foolishly, perhaps, in some instances—that his own party or faction may profit by their wrongful acts. Then, as he is virtually an accomplice in their guilt, he will seize any pretext, shrewd or silly, to secure them impunity; and it may be the business of some brother officer, whose resonant title would justify a popular notion that he spoke with authority on the legal phases of the case, to furnish such pretexts when required. The conduct of the unjust steward in the parable would be perplexing enough were we bound to assume his honesty and devotion to his master's interests. Mr. Wanamaker is reputed to be a careful Bible student; and doubtless, if he speaks his candid judgment, he dismisses the steward with the simple verdict that he was a rascal. What opinion must he entertain of a public officer who either refuses to carry out in letter and spirit a law which he has sworn to execute, or supplies shallow sophistry, in quantities to suit, to excuse another functionary called to account for such perjury and breach of trust?

THE civil service commission has again shown that it knows its duty and is not afraid to do it. We do the President no injustice in saying that he does not favor encouraging in government employes a spirit of independence of the blackmailers who would wring money out of them for political purposes. His indifference, to put it with extreme charity, in the Mahone cases, and his refusal to punish in the Baltimore cases, conclusively show his real convictions, humiliating as the showing is. If he could prevent it without disaster he would not let the commission put forth such a warning as is printed below. What the country knows the commission knows, and it is therefore doubly refreshing in these times of vassal and chief, master and man, henchman and boss, to have some officers fearless in the performance of duty, though it requires bearding their chief. The document is as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 27, 1892.

At the outset of the political campaign which is now pending, this commission feels it to be its duty to call public attention to the provisions of the civil service law in relation to political assessments or contributions, to inform government employes of their rights in the premises, and to warn those not in the government service, of whatever political party, not to infringe upon these rights.

Political assessments, under any guise, are prohibited by law. The provisions of the law on the subject are, in substance, as follows:

That no government officer or employe shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, in any manner whatever, a contribution for political purposes from any other government officer or employe.

Second, that no government officer or employe shall make a contribution for political purposes to any other government officer or employe.

Third, that no person shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive contributions for political purposes in any room or building occupied by government employes in the discharge of official duties; and Fourth, that no superior officer shall discriminate against or in favor of any government officer or employe on account of his action in reference to contributions for political purposes. Government employes must be left absolutely free to contribute or not as they see fit, and to contribute to either party according to their preferences; and an employe refusing to contribute must not be discriminated against because of such refusal.

It is the duty of the commission to see that the provisions of this law are enforced, and it will employ every available means to secure the prosecution and punishment of whoever may violate them. The commission requests any person having knowledge of any violation of this law to lay the facts before it, and it will at once take action upon them.

CHARLES LYMAN,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
GEORGE D. JOHNSTON,
Commissioners.

IN the preceding house of representatives six republicans introduced bills proposing the direct repeal of the civil service act, and every one of these republicans has disappeared from public life. In the present house no such bill has been introduced. Of the present committee Mr. Roosevelt says: "The friends of civil service reform, without distinction of party, are to be congratulated upon having such a committee in the house, and especially upon having such a chairman as Mr. Andrew."

THE cities of Boston and Cambridge have passed and now have in force the following ordinance:

"No head of a department, member of a board, clerk, employe or other officer of the city, except such as may be elected by popular vote, shall be an officer of a caucus or member of any political committee or convention."

Fifty-six office-holders in Boston and five in Cambridge are affected. Thus two important cities stamp out the nefarious practice of having their politics managed by those who are paid from the public treasury. They know very well that party management will be put upon a higher plane by this action. The man who makes place-holding the condition of his political efforts is conscienceless and lost to patriotism; he is the meanest mercenary among men.

IN the Cincinnati post-office there was recently a competitive examination among the fourteen stampers to determine who should have a higher place with $300 additional salary. The successful competitor reached over ninety-nine, while all of the others were under ninety-one. The test was relative rapidity at work. Under favoritism that one of the fourteen who had the strongest "pull" would have been promoted, but open competition elevates the best man without regard to "pulls."

When Collector Erhardt was forced out of office, the New York Tribune said of him:

"The republican party honored him with an office of great trust and responsibility. It supposed him to be a republican, a believer in its policies, anxious for its success in administration."

Ever since then events have happened logically and the New York Evening Post of July 12 adds the following interesting batch.

Collector Hendricks has realized the expectations of the republican "boys" by taking the contract for cartage at the custom-house away from a wicked though efficient democrat, and giving it to a good republican who will let Barney Biglin and sundry other good republicans have slices of the $100,000 a year involved. One of the chief complaints against Col. Erhardt was his action, or rather non-action, about this matter. He found the work in the hands of a democrat who was doing it satisfactorily, and when he advertised for new bids this democrat's figures were the lowest. Accordingly Col. Erhardt allowed him to continue in charge of the cartage. As the Tribune says: "While the civil service law did not control the awarding of this contract yet the collector decided that Briggs should continue with the work, to sustain what was thought to be the spirit of the law." In other words, Col. Erhardt actually tried to live up to the civil service plank of the republican national platform of 1888, which had pledged the party to observe "the spirit and purpose of the reform" everywhere. It was, of course, a fatal blunder, and he paid the penalty when he was compelled to tender his resignation. Collector Hendricks has a clearer understanding of the reason he was appointed, and the cartage business will now be controlled by George B. Deane, "the leader of the ninth assembly district," who will sub-let portions of the work to George W. Wanamaker, "the leader of the fifteenth assembly district;" George Hilliard, "leader of the twelfth district;" Barney Biglin of the eighteenth district and Leroy Jacobs of Green county.

WHAT TO EXPECT.

Commenting upon the platform Harper's Weekly of July 9, said, "It is too much to suppose that with the present feeling of the democratic party, Mr. Cleveland's administration, however friendly to reform, would be, in the sense of the League, a civil service reform administration."

Of this the Indianapolis Sentinel of July 13 says:

"Mr. Cleveland's administration will be a democratic administration. The civil service laws and all other laws will be honestly enforced. But we have no doubt that Mr. Cleveland will rid the public service as quickly and fully as practicable, consistent with the laws and public interests, of the republican partisans who have been given place by President Harrison, and that, in selecting their successors, good democrats will, other things being equal, be given the preference. Mr. Cleveland realizes the evils of the spoils system, but his experience has taught him that these evils can never be extirpated until the great party which for twenty-five years was debarred from all participation in the public service has been restored to an absolute equality in that respect with the opposition party. Civil service reform means that the public service shall not be a mere asylum for party workers, but it does not mean that one party shall monopolize government employment both when "in power" and when "out of power."

There is no more intelligent or zealous advocate of civil service reform than Harper's Weekly, and its support of Mr. Cleveland, while admitting frankly that it does not expect him to give the country a civil service reform administration in the extreme sense of the League, is creditable to its good sense and fairness."

Whether Mr. Cleveland will give the country a civil service reform administration "in the extreme sense of the League" is not the question. Whether he will live up to his oath of office and to the fair intent of the platform upon which he is a candidate is the question. To say as this platform does that the "civil service ought not to be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot-box, be a brief reward of party zeal," and then proceed to make a clean sweep by turning out republicans and putting in democrats would not be living up to the platform but would be a treacherous repudiation of it. Experience has never taught Mr. Cleveland that he can remedy the evils of the spoils system by turning over the service to democrats as spoil. It has taught him that he can in this way bring defeat to his party on every hand.

A declaration that there ought not to be a change of the service at every election is a promise to take such measures as will put an end to such changes. The democrats, if successful, will have before them the plain duty, the opportunity, and the ways and means of forever ending the disgraceful prostitution of the federal service to personal and partisan ends. Large additions to the classified service, the application of the system of the railway mail service to all higher grade post-offices and including the postmasters, the establishment of the regulations proposed in Mr. Andrew's bill for the appointment of fourth-class postmasters, and the incorporation of the Boston labor service system into the federal labor service are the great fundamental measures which will practically complete the reform in the national service, and will be but meeting the fair and reasonable expectation to which Mr. Cleveland's platform gives rise.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

It assumes, however, that official patronage can be made a strong factor in securing the renomination and re-election of a President, which is very doubtful. It must be remembered, also, that a President who would prostitute the office in this way would be just the kind of man that the people would turn out at the end of four years. In the present state of public opinion on this question, it would be sure defeat for any President to have it known that he had used the power and patronage of his office to secure his renomination or that he was using it to secure his re-election. The people are not easily hoodwinked about such matters, and they can not be trifled with at all.—Indianapolis Journal, June 14, 1892.

THE LORD PARAMOUNT.

A few minutes before noon Russell Harrison walked into the Fifth Avenue Hotel. He waived off the reporters and retired to the cafe with a Montana friend. Young Mr. Harrison's appearance here at this time was not unexpected. He generally turns up at any place where there is to be a meeting affecting his father's interests. None of the small politicians about the hotel approached the son of the President.—New York Evening Post, July 15.

* * *

Mr. Clarkson had invited the whole executive committee to spend Sunday with him, but Mr. Fessenden went to Connecticut, Mr. Kerens went off with Russell Harrison.—New York Times, July 17.

* * *

Russell Harrison arrived at the Fifth Avenue Hotel early this morning. He went direct to Chairman Carter's room.—New York Evening Post, July 22.

* * *

Chairman Carter and the members of the Republican National Executive Committee have again failed to hold the informal conference which has been on the programme for two weeks. Last night Mr. Carter went to Washington to get further orders from the President. To the politicians it appears that the chairman of the Republican National Committee is as much a subordinate of the President as he was when he held the United States land commissionership. He does nothing without consultation with Mr. Harrison, and when he is in New York Russell Harrison is nearly always at his side.—New York Evening Post, July 27.

* * *

President Harrison and Mr. Carter dined together at the White House, and then took a ride this evening, and came to an understanding concerning the preliminaries of the campaign.

Jacob M. Patterson, chairman of the campaign committee of the republican county committee of New York has divided his time to-day between the White House, the treasury department, and Senator Hiscock's rooms. He seemed to feel unusually "chipper" tonight, and the impression is growing that the custom-house commissionership he has been chasing so long is much nearer his hand than it was a month ago. The outlook in New York county has been carefully canvassed to-day by the President, Secretary Chas. Foster, Mr. Patterson, and Surveyor of the Port Lyon.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 21.

* * *

"It would be a great convenience if a telephone could be put in between the White House and the national republican committee headquarters, or if the President would imitate the vice-presidential candidate and settle himself near the rooms where he is to conduct his campaign," said a gentleman yesterday who has been watching the struggles of the committee in its attempts to begin business. The remark was called out by the announcement that Chairman Carter was going to Washington again to submit some further details of the campaign to the President.—New York Times, July 27.

The conference which Mr. Carter held yesterday in Washington with President Harrison, it is thought by the republicans, can not fail to be productive of good results. Whether, however, the President has signified his willingness to accede to certain demands which Mr. Platt is known to have made, is a subject that is full of interest.—New York Evening Post, July 29.

* * *

J. S. Clarkson and J. N. Huston, of the National Republican Committee, joined Chairman Carter in Washington to-day. With Senator Felton, of California, they called at the White House and spent some time with President Harrison, discussing the political situation and probabilities of the campaign. One thing that they talked of with much interest was the work of the literary bureau of the campaign, which is to be under Mr. Clarkson's special management. Messrs. Carter and Clarkson lunched with the President, and in the afternoon and evening held conferences with numerous politicians who called to see them.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 29.

* * *

The conferences between the President and Chairman Carter, ex-Chairman Clarkson, Collector Hendricks, J. N. Huston of Indiana and others have led to all sorts of reports concerning the prospects for adjusting the troubles between the President and the New York republican leaders. The New York leaders refused to support the President without a definite understanding regarding patronage. This was the situation when Chairman Carter, General Clarkson, Collector Hendricks and others visited Washington on Wednesday last.—New York Dispatch to Boston Herald, August 1.

* * *

The President has had to-day his first visitor of note in the person of Collector Hendricks, of the port of New York. There is a delicate business under consultation. Mr. Hendricks slipped away from work and from the Fifth Avenue hotel on a moment's notice. He did not even take the time to telegraph the President that he was coming. He told the World correspondent that his trip to Loon Lake was unexpected and would in all probability last "a day or two." That his business with Mr. Harrison was important he made no secret, but he declined to discuss it or give any one an idea of its nature. "Oh, no," he declared, jocularly, "we are not a bit uneasy over the outlook. I have said time and again, and I still hold to the opinion, that the prospects for a republican victory are good, very good.—Loon Lake Dispatch to New York World, August 13.

* * *

The vicinity of Loon Lake assumed a slightly political air to-day. Francis Hendricks, collector of the port of New York, arrived and called upon the President. He was with the chief executive some length of time.—Loon Lake Dispatch to New York Press, Aug. 17.

* * *

It has been rather a busy day for the President. Arising at about the usual hour he ate a hearty breakfast, and after the meal took a short walk of about a mile altogether. Then he saw Collector Hendricks. Mr. Hendricks came here upon a very important mission, as he informed The Press correspondent, but the nature of it he would not divulge. Mr. Hendricks left soon afterwards for New York.—Loon Lake Dispatch to New York Press, August 19.

* * *

No one knew that Elijah W. Halford, the President's private secretary, was coming here yesterday, and when at noon, direct from Washington, he stepped into the Denison and registered everybody wanted to know the meaning of his visit at this time. Mr. Halford was greeted by friends about the lobby and told them that he did not expect to come until later in the year, but that did not lessen the pleasure he had in being with Indianapolis friends once more. It was dull at Washington, and he had, he said, a breathing spell of two or three days, which, on the spur of the moment, he decided to use in coming here, staying a day or two and going back. He assured inquirers that he was not on a political mission to prod Chairman Gowdy of the state central committee into something like activity. In the afternoon he was at the Central-ave. methodist Sunday-school, in which he has always had the liveliest interest.—Indianapolis Sentinel, August 15.

PLACATING REBELLIOUS BARONS.

PLATT.

Mr. Reid's task of making terms at the court of Thomas C. Platt, it was said yesterday, was likely to call into play all his powers as a diplomat. It was generally put down as being as delicate a thing to handle as any which came in Reid's way while he was the minister to France. On the one side was placed the obstinancy of President Harrison, who hated to yield a point to an enemy with all the Hoosier hatred for which he has become celebrated, and on the other the cool and dignified manner in which Mr. Platt sat back and refused to turn over his machine to anybody.—New York Times, July 15.

* * *

The failure of the executive committee of the republican state committee to meet yesterday was a matter of general comment. That the real reason for the failure is that Thomas C. Platt, being still in a sullen mood, wants to point out to the President that he is not ready to go on with the campaign in this state, and that will not be until the President is ready to dicker with Platt, is very certain from all the evidence.—New York Times, July 17.

* * *

Jacob M. Patterson, of New York, registered at the Arlington about 9 o'clock to-night. As soon as he had made arrangements for a room with a breeze, he started for the apartments of Senator Hiscock and remained with the Senator until 10 o'clock. Soon after his arrival Mr. George W. Lyon, surveyor of the port of New York, also placed his name on the Arlington register. Lyon and Patterson had a private confab after the latter left Mr. Hiscock.

To all inquiries concerning their presence in Washington at this time they returned purely diplomatic replies. It is not long since Mr. Patterson was in Washington seeking an appointment as one of the commissioners of the new custom-house in New York. He was not in very good odor with the administration then, and his appeal met with no response. Now that he is chairman of the campaign committee of the republican county committee, he feels that his chances have materially improved. To-morrow he will call upon the President and Secretary Charles Foster, who returned to the city to-day.

Postmaster George T. Collins, of Brooklyn, is in Washington to-day trying to arrange for an enlargement of the force under his immediate control. He has a friend with a good-sized political "pull" whom he would like to have made janitor of the new government building in Brooklyn.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 20.

* * *

Field Marshal Louis F. Payn, of Columbia county, looking a trifle subdued since his unhappy Minneapolis experience, and John E. Milholland of New York, came to town to-day. The field marshal is here in the role of Thomas C. Platt's envoy extraordinary to the court of Benjamin I. Platt and the President are "getting together" slowly. Payn is Platt's trusted friend. The President is willing and anxious to obliterate the differences which have arisen between the administration and the New York republican machine, as manipulated by Platt.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 23.

* * *

Mr. Carter came back from Washington two days ago. Yesterday he had an extended conference with Mr. Platt. Charles W. Hackett, chairman of the state executive committee, by grace of Mr. Platt, also called on that gentleman yesterday. These two calls were the chief events in the republican circle of politicians during the day.—New York Times, July 24.

* * *

Collector Francis Hendricks whose coming in the interests of harmony between the administration and Thomas C. Platt has been heralded for several days, placed his neat autograph on the Arlington register this morning. Mr. Hendricks went to the treasury department and had a long talk with Secretary Charles Foster, and afterward he called upon the President and was closeted with him so long that the excuse advanced by Mr. Hendricks that he came to discuss departmental affairs is forced deep into the "chestnut" receptacle.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 29.

* * *

Chairman Thomas H. Carter, of the republican national committee and James S. Clarkson, his predecessor, departed this evening for Old Point Comfort. Collector Hendricks left for New York on an afternoon train. Before the gentlemen left they consulted with the President again regarding the political outlook. The impression prevailing here is that when they reach New York they will be in position to tell Mr. Platt that he can begin running his machine on his own terms, and that the administration will not shove any bars between the spokes while the machine is in motion. "I am as certain there will be entire harmony between the President and Mr. Platt as I am that we are both standing here," said Senator Hiscock to-night to a correspondent of the Times.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 30.

* * *

Chairman Carter brought messages from the President to politicians in this state, and it was said the two members of the state committee received a portion of them at the conference at headquarters. In substance, the messages from the President were that the New York committee would be allowed, and, in fact, was desired, to conduct the campaign in this state without much interference from the White House or the national committee, and, in case of victory, those who did the work would be entitled to such standing and influence at the White House as come to faithful laborers. Further than this, it was said, the President was not willing to specify. It was by no means certain in the minds of the leaders that this would be satisfactory to Mr. Platt. Some doubted if he would consider this an olive branch of sufficient size to make it worth his while to accept it.—New York Times, August 2.

* * *

The chief topic of conversation to-day among the few politicians in the hotel corridors is the failure of Chairman Carter to secure suitable terms from the president to conciliate Platt and Miller. It is now thought that the New York bosses will stand aloof during the campaign. Their demand, as announced in the Evening Post before Carter went to Washington, is that they be allowed to take entire charge of the campaign in this state and there should be no supervision from Washington or the national committee. The president has not been able to bring himself to place implicit trust in the men who abused him before and after the Minneapolis convention. And so the breach widens. Platt spends his time at his office and at Manhattan Beach, Miller looks after his private business, and the Platt-Miller State Committee is taking a long vacation, while the national executive committee is trying hard to make a show of doing something. That is the republican situation at present.—New York Evening Post, August 2.

* * *

Mr. Platt had not been at the headquarters of the national republican committee since they were established, nearly three weeks ago. He has had interviews with few of the prominent republican leaders, and such as he has had have not been of his own seeking. He has kept away from the haunts of the politicians. Since Chairman Carter's return from the White House, nearly a week ago, he and Mr. Platt have been strangers, and there have been no signs of the love feast and general getting into line and taking off of coats which were promised a short time ago.—New York Times, August 5.

* * *

Despite all reports the contrary, Mr. Thomas C. Platt and Whitelaw Reid came together yesterday. A little after 1 o'clock the republican candidate for vice-president dropped into the office of the United States Express Company on Broadway, and a few minutes thereafter the two leaders were sitting vis a vis over a luncheon upon Mr. Reid's invitation. Whether the long expected placatory dish was served on this occasion, or whether it has been deferred for some other occasion, only three men know—President Harrison, Mr. Platt and Mr. Reid.

Those who are close to Mr. Platt make no hesitation in declaring that if Mr. Harrison wishes to deal with the ex-senator a compact must be drawn and duly signed and sealed in the presence of witnesses. These friends of Mr. Platt's claim that twice within eight years he has been deceived by Presidents—by Garfield in 1881 and by Harrison in 1889—and that if Harrison now aspires for his support he must give pledges that can neither be renounced nor broken.

As a matter of fact, it is claimed by Platt's friends that in the fall of 1888 Gen. Harrison promised, in the event of his election, that he would nominate Platt as secretary of the treasury, and, but for the interference of Warner Miller, that pledge would have been redeemed. Mr. Platt's vindictive disposition was not so well known by Gen. Harrison then as it is now. At all events Platt habitually spoke of Garfield's treachery to Mr. Conkling as the purest kindness compared with Harrison's treachery to him.—New York Times, August 6.

* * *

The latest news is that if Thomas C. Platt desires to establish himself on a peace footing with President Harrison he must get down on his marrow bones and ask to be forgiven for past sins and give signs that he will be submissive in the future. President Harrison, it is said, will make no attempt to "placate" him, and has indicated that for various reasons, which he has given to his confidential friends, it is a matter of indifference to him what attitude Mr. Platt may please to take during the next two months. Mr. Harrison has further indicated, so the report has it, that he is disgusted with the attempts which Mr. Whitelaw Reid and others have been making to secure favoring glances from the Tioga statesman, and will tolerate no more nonsense of that sort. These statements came from a source that is close, not only to the President, but also to the men who have charge of the republican campaign at both national and state headquarters. They were given as a condensed summary of a number of interviews with the President and his managers.—New York Times, August 12.

* * *

The fact that Mr. Platt has joined forces with Mr. Harrison was announced formally and officially early in the evening. "Chairman Hackett of the state executive committee had an interview with Thomas C. Platt to-day, at which Mr. Platt expressed loyalty to the party, and said that he desired to take an active part in the canvass and do all in his power, as he always has done, to bring success to the republican ticket." These were the words in which the news was broken. This was coupled with the statement that Mr. Platt's utterances were satisfactory to Mr. Hackett and led him to believe that Mr. Platt was proposing to do all in his power for the canvass in this state.—New York Times, August 18.

* * *

Mr. Platt was good-natured yesterday and discussed somewhat the "official declaration" of his position. He said that it had not been his intention to make a formal declaration, although he had told Mr. Hackett that he might announce the fact that he was loyal to the ticket. Mr. Platt was said by some to have visited national republican headquarters again yesterday, although no official corroboration of the statement could be secured. One of the officials in charge at headquarters, when asked whether the Tioga statesman had been there, winked one eye and said: "Well, there was a man here who looked very much like Mr. Platt. It may have been his double, if he has one."—New York Times, August 19.

QUAY.

Senator Quay dropped into the city very quietly this evening, and expects to meet a few of the city leaders to-morrow. His coming was without herald beyond a brief telegram to ex-Collector Dave Martin, who met him in parlor 49 at the Continental Hotel shortly after 7 o'clock. The only other caller was Secretary Frank Willing Leach, whose specialty in this year's campaign is the management of the legislative districts. Mr. Richard R. Quay accompanied his father. The senator will return to Washington late to-morrow afternoon. First on the list of his engagements for to-morrow is his usual conference with Collector Cooper. Mr. Quay would not say that politics had anything to do with his visit.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, July 19.

* * *

Thomas V. Cooper, collector of the port of Philadelphia, had just gone up to see the national committeemen and candidate Whitelaw Reid, who made "his usual Tuesday call," as one of the republicans described it, and was consulting with Chairman Carter. Mr. Cooper had been sent for. He is counted one of the most expert politicians in the Keystone state, having served at times on the state committee, of which he was once chairman. Just at present holding a fat position through the kindness of Mr. Harrison, he is one of the leaders of the administration crowd in his state, for politicians say that the classification is no longer made there on the Quay-Magee basis. There is no "Quay faction" and no "Magee faction," but it is either administration or anti-administration. As Mr. Cooper would like to retain his present comfortable job for four years more, it is easy to define his standing. Mr. Magee was in the city on Monday, and, after some extended conferences, it was thought best to ask Mr. Cooper to come up. It is believed that in his position, with the patronage of the custom-house, and assisted by Mr. Magee and others, he may be a valuable man in raising a good-sized contribution to carry on the campaign. He was for some time concealed in the private room up stairs where the campaign orders of President Harrison are carried out.—New York Times, August 8.

* * *

Several Pennsylvanians who are counted as among those best calculated to raise money were at headquarters yesterday. Christopher L. Magee, whom the committee has come to regard as the successor of Quay as the recognized leader in the state, was there. He is supposed to have influence with the professional politicians. Collector Cooper, of Philadelphia, was also there. He is counted an able worker among federal office holders.—New York Times, August 19.

* * *

Mr. Quay sent a message to Mr. Carter, and Mr. Carter thought it of sufficient importance to warrant a quick trip to Philadelphia, where, it was said, Mr. Quay was. The message came at about the same hour that Mr. Platt sent for Mr. Hackett. There was for the first time in this campaign talk of "Quay's mailed hand" which he was supposed to be stretching out in the direction of the machine again. Chairman Carter returned to this city yesterday morning after a two day's visit to Washington.—New York Times, August 18.

* * *

Chairman Carter got back from Philadelphia and was at republican national headquarters early yesterday. Among the callers at headquarters yesterday were Solicitor of the Treasury Hepburn, and Minister to Denmark Clark E. Carr, who sailed yesterday. Chairman Hackett saw Mr. Carter late in the day, after one of the usual delays. Christopher L. Magee and Collector Cooper, of Philadelphia, also called.—New York Press, August 18.

* * *

Outside of Collector Cooper and ex-Collector Dave Martin, no one knew of Senator Quay's intention to visit the city to-day, and a telegram apprised them of his coming. The senator slipped into the Continental hotel just before noon, accompanied by his son Dick. During the morning Mr. Quay called at the People's Bank, the offices of the Traction Company and at the custom-house, where he met Collector Cooper. With this business over, he met Gen. Reeder at republican state headquarters and was in conference with him over an hour. Senator Quay's principal caller was ex-Collector Martin, and the two were not only together all the afternoon, but left the hotel together shortly before 6 o'clock.—Philadelphia Dispatch to New York Times, August 23.

* * *

Now that Senator Quay and ex-Senator Platt have got into the republican band wagon the procession is ready to move. It promises to be a great procession and a long time passing a given point.—Indianapolis Journal, August 20.

THE ARMY OF FEUDATORIES AT WORK.

John R. Leonard, who formerly trained with the "Slick Six," but is now doing a watchman's duty in the treasury department at Washington, is in the city to see if the local republican organization is doing its duty. Leonard on Monday night dropped into the old soldiers' meeting and took a seat near the door. "Why, halloo! Leonard, I did not know you were here," said one of the veterans. "I didn't see anything about it in the newspapers." "No, I don't want the newspapers to get on to it that I am here," replied Leonard.—Indianapolis News, July 13.

* * *

Third Auditor Hart has gone to his home at Frankfort for a few weeks' rest.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, July 25.

* * *

After a stormy session at the meeting at Cambridge City some months ago Capt. Frank Ellis, Muncie's post-office manager of Harrison affairs in Delaware county, was selected chairman of the district. At yesterday's meeting his resignation was accepted. Now the question that has set the Delaware republican tribe of anti-Harrison men to guessing is, what does it all mean, this manner of lightning changes on the quiet.—Muncie Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, July 30.

* * *

At the meeting of the Allen county republican central committee to-day Chairman Vesey did not resign, but Clark Fairbanks, committeeman from the First and Edward Sheltabarger from the Seventh ward, did. Eli Higgins, postmaster, was elected to succeed Fairbanks.—Fort Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, July 24.

* * *

Postmaster Higgins and President Harper, of the Morton club, were in secret conference all day. The Blaineites were in high glee and the Harrison men were in the depths of despair. A portion of the committee were in telegraphic correspondence with R. T. McDonald, who is in New York, and the other portion with Gowdy.—Indianapolis Sentinel, July 28, Fort Wayne Dispatch.

* * *

Col. Higgins, the dapper little postmaster, is wielding the headman's ax dexterously or otherwise now. Some days ago he decapitated William Rockhill, postmaster at Arcola, and selected in his place a renegade democrat, Dr. McGoogle, or some such name. Col. Higgins' latest engagement on the block was to cut off the official head of R. Latham, postmaster at Hunteartown, and put in his place A. G. Dunton. His work was confirmed at Washington yesterday.—Indianapolis Sentinel, August 4, Fort Wayne Dispatch.

* * *

J. B. Throop, collector of internal revenue for the Terre Haute district, has not been attending to his official duties personally since June 28. The collector's office is located in Terre Haute, but Mr. Throop, who resides in Orange county, it is said, has devoted nearly all of his time since June in repairing Harrison's fences in the second congressional district.—Indianapolis Sentinel, August 24.

* * *

William Petty and Bradley Connett, the two war politicians recently appointed in the government inspection service at Kingan's, were the loudest kickers against Harrison the Blaine club took to Minneapolis. They were the leaders of the contingent that charged upon the Harrison drum corps in the West hotel and tore down the Harrison banners of the Columbia club. But now they are fixed with fourteen-dollar per week jobs, these two patriots are shouting for Harrison and "protection."—Indianapolis Sentinel, August 24.

* * *

Hon. Blanche K. Bruce, ex-United States Senator, and at present recorder of deeds for the district of Columbia, is in the city, visiting his father-in-law, Dr. Joseph Wilson, on College avenue. Mr. Bruce is one of the most effective colored speakers, if not the most, in the United States, and has in his life been honored with many offices, elective and appointive.

He was seen at the Denison Hotel last night and talked concerning the political situation happily and without reserve. "President Harrison," he said, "will undoubtedly have a much larger majority at the next election than he had at the last."

"Where will your work be done in the coming campaign?"

"I have been assigned by the national committee to the middle and western states."—Indianapolis Journal, August 1.

* * *

A number of young republicans have organized a young men's republican club, which it is intended to make a permanent organization on the order of the Marion club. Wednesday night they met in the United States marshal's office and admitted a number of new members. The club will meet regularly on Wednesday nights, at the same place, until they can secure quarters of their own.—Indianapolis Journal, August 20.

The republicans of this county opened the campaign to-day * * Smiley Chambers [United States district attorney] followed Shockney in a speech for two hours. * * —Noblesville Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, August 29.

With this in view Eaves has resigned as stamp clerk at Statesville for the avowed purpose of running the campaign. He established headquarters here yesterday. He has already assessed every federal office-holder in the state, and Collector Rollins has appointed another son of Eaves a clerk in his office, making two of Eaves's sons in his office, in order to furnish Eaves money in place of his salary as revenue stamp clerk.—Raleigh (N. C.) Dispatch to New York Times, July 31.

* * *

The most disgraceful scene ever witnessed among the g. o. p. politicians in this city was that of last evening at the police court room, when attempt was made to organize a Harrison and Reid club. The paid hireling of the government—Collector Pew, and his retinue of office-holders, save one, Postmaster Mansfield, were present.—Gloucester Dispatch to Boston Post.

* * *

I think a few of the many illustrations in this state would be of interest to your readers. During the recent county conventions I do not recall a single federal officer who did not take part in the wire-pulling. In Yakima county, for instance, among the delegates were the Indian agent and his employes, the register and receiver of the United States land office, the postmaster in the leading post-office, etc. When it is remembered that the local land officers occupy positions of a judicial nature, further comment is unnecessary.—New York Evening Post Seattle Letter, Aug 15.

* * *

A regular meeting of the republican national executive committee will be held this afternoon, and to-morrow a hearing will be given to A. H. Leonard of Louisiana, the republican candidate who polled 30,000 votes in the gubernatorial election last April. Mr. Leonard will ask the committee to use its power to "call off" Warmouth, the collector of the port of New Orleans who through control of federal patronage has built up a faction which destroys the harmony of the party in Louisiana. Mr. Leonard will promise that if his recommendation is followed harmony will prevail and two republican congressmen will be elected, and two farmers' alliance men, out of the delegation of six.—New York Evening Post, Aug. 15.

Although Chairman Carter of the national republican committee was in Washington yesterday, a large amount of work was turned off at headquarters.

Among the callers yesterday were Congressman J. C. Burrows, Senator Proctor and M. S. Colburn, of Vermont, ex-Congressman Horr and Collector Cooper, of Philadelphia.—New York Press, August 17.

* * *

Col. J. C. Hill, chief of the Indian division of the office of the secretary of the interior, has resigned to enter the campaign. He will be under the direction of the national republican committee.—Indianapolis Sentinel, Aug. 25.

* * *

Col. "Dan" Macauley, who holds a position in the treasury department at Washington, was at national republican headquarters yesterday. He will remain during the campaigned as one of Chairman Carter's assistants. It was announced that he would resign his position in the treasury department.—New York Times, Aug. 21.

One occurrence has become public in these days which throws a significant light on the proceedings of the Minneapolis convention, and authorizes the gravest apprehension as to what the administration is capable of. The story is this: William D. Crum, a colored man, had for three years been seeking the appointment as postmaster in Charleston, South Carolina. President Harrison had steadfastly refused to appoint him. Crum then managed to be elected a delegate to the National Republican Convention. Arrived at Minneapolis, he gave out that he was going to vote for Blaine. Suddenly he changed his attitude, and announced himself as a supporter of Harrison. He voted accordingly. It was then said that Crum had been assured of his reward. From Minneapolis he went straightway to Washington and saw the President. A few days later his nomination for the postmastership at Charleston was sent to the Senate. No sooner was this known in Charleston than indignant protests against the appointment poured into Washington. Crum was summoned before the post-office committee of the Senate, and the opposition to the appointment in that body became so strong that the President saw himself forced to withdraw the nomination.—Harper's Weekly, July 30.

* * *

Just before the convention began, members of the South Carolina delegation announced that Crum would vote for the President, and that in return for his vote he would receive the Charleston postmastership. It was even said that he had a written guarantee to that effect, made on behalf of the President, when Crum refused to accept a verbal promise.

Crum came to Washington from Minneapolis and saw the President. Soon afterward he was nominated for postmaster at Charleston. That his nomination was the result of a political deal was apparent.

At the hearing last week before the committee on post-offices it became apparent that Crum would not be confirmed. Senator Wolcott asked him a number of leading questions concerning his action at Minneapolis, and finally threw him into confusion by asking him whether he did not pledge himself to vote for some person other than Harrison.

"I don't remember," was all that Crum could say in reply.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, July 16.

THE SINEWS OF WAR.

From a republican source comes the information that the calls which the republican state central committee are making for money for the campaign are already becoming onerous and are at this early day arousing some serious antagonism. Before the Minneapolis convention the requests for money began to issue from the committee, according to the authority here quoted. A circular was sent to every republican in the state who had been mentioned for nomination to state office, assuring him that the only hope of republican success in the coming campaign lay in the re-nomination of Harrison, and calling on him to pay $50 to help defray the expenses of the state committee and of other influential friends of the President at the national convention. An effort was also made to assess every delegate to the national convention $250 in addition to his personal expenses of attendance, the amount thus realized to be used to defray the expenses of the committee and Harrison workers at the convention. This last request was refused by the delegates at a rather stormy meeting, it is said, partly through the influence of Charles F. Griffin, who made a computation to prove that the total sum realized would be $7,500, and that that would be a great deal more than the committee would need. It is alleged, too, that the pension office did not escape, but on the contrary, that it was assessed for $500, and paid it preliminary to the Minneapolis convention. Since the convention the demands for money have been heavy, it is said. The candidates have been assessed mercilessly, and each district committeeman has been informed that he is expected to see that the money prorated to his district is duly collected. The pension office, it is said, is not yet considered to have done its part and has been called upon for $1,000 more. In response to this second call, Pension Agent Ensley is alleged to have openly rebelled, and there the matter stands. In brief, Chairman Gowdy is credited with greater boldness in soliciting cash than any of his predecessors for years.—Indianapolis News, July 28.

* * *

About the first move Mr. Carter made when he became chairman was in the direction of a campaign fund. Lists of government employes were desired, and he laid plans to secure them. At the meeting last night of the New York Republican Association Mr. Carter's methods were plainly shown. He started out a fortnight ago to secure a list of all the New Yorkers employed in the government departments, and this association readily lent itself to his scheme. At last night's meeting the announcement was made that the treasury, war department, and government printing office lists were complete, but that the post-office department declined to make up such a roster, because the clerks who would have to do it, were it ordered, had other and more important business to attend to. Mr. Wanamaker has in mind his recent experience with the civil service commission, in which his hide was gracefully removed, and, knowing the meaning of the demand for a roster of his subordinates, he does not propose to render himself liable to further punishment by furnishing it.

The "nerve" of Carter is shown in a request made by the New York association for a list of civil service commission employes who belong to New York.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 19.

Treasurer Bliss of the national republican committee entertained a distinguished coterie of republicans, all possessed of standing in the party and considerable wealth, at the Union League Club house last night. It was an invitation "affair," which was kept as secret as possible. "The Campaign, and How to Carry It On" was the subject of the discussion, which was said to have been very informal.

Among those who received invitations were Messrs. Clarkson, Kerens, and McComas of the national committee, and they were all there last night. Others present were Gen. Felix Agnus, editor of the Baltimore American; Alexander Shaw, of Baltimore, and W. W. Johnson, postmaster of that city; Christopher L. Magee, of Pittsburgh, Collector Thomas V. Cooper, of Philadelphia.

Considerable significance was attached to the facts surrounding this gathering. Yesterday morning Chairman William Brookfield, of the state republican committee, returned from Loon Lake, where he had extended conferences with President Harrison. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Brookfield went to republican headquarters and had a confidential talk with some members of the committee who chanced to be present. Among others he talked with Mr. Carter. Some inclined to the belief last night that Mr. Brookfield indicated to Chairman Carter some of the information given him by the President. On this point, however, those who were present gave no information for publication.

It was said by some who commented on the meeting that Postmaster Johnson was not inclined to pay much attention to the circular issued by the civil service commissioners, because after the severely-plain English which Commissioner Roosevelt had used in regard to his observance of the civil service law he was disposed to treat any document signed by Mr. Roosevelt with utter disrespect.

Collector Cooper, it was also said, was not disposed to let the circular interfere with his functions as a solicitor if he were called on to act in that capacity.—New York Times, August 19.

* * *

Pennsylvania, which is looked on as the harvest field for campaign funds, according to the best information is to be held largely responsible for the fight in that state. Thomas V. Cooper, of Philadelphia, collector of the port, has been placed in direct charge of the southern portion of the state. He is also to have charge of Delaware. He is not only an expert in raising campaign funds in his own state, but has had experience in the intricacies of the politics of both states. He had a prominent hand in the management of the campaign in Delaware when the republican legislature was chosen which elected Anthony Higgins to the United States Senate four years ago.—New York Times, August 28.

* * *

In discussing the late republican convention this afternoon, Mr. Clarkson said that one man who, as much as any other, was responsible for the nomination of President Harrison was Senator Philetus Sawyer, of Wisconsin. "Had he not been on the ground the vote of Wisconsin would have gone away from Harrison," said Gen. Clarkson. "He did some of the heavy work of the week."

"How did he do it?" was asked.

"In the first place," said Gen. Clarkson, "his very presence counted for a good deal. He is eighty years old and stands high among men in all parts of the country. Further than this, he is chairman of the senate committee on post-offices, and it has been my experience that post-offices are a not unimportant factor in politics."—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, June 26.

* * *

A serious charge is made in the third congressional district by one wing of the republican party against the other wing, which includes several postmasters. Governor Burleigh is one of the four candidates for the congressional nomination. Joe Manley, Mr. Blaine's friend, is another, and he is the postmaster of Augusta. The postmaster of Waterville is a Milliken man.

In the town of Vassalborough, twelve miles from Augusta and five miles from Waterville, there were mailed on the 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th of April last eighty sacks of a weekly newspaper, a publication entered as second-class matter. On these $40 postage was paid. In the eighty sacks were 33,000 papers, wrapped and addressed, one to each voter, in the district.

These papers contained an article in the interest of Governor Burleigh. The sacks going south from Vassalborough went into the Augusta office all right. This much is known. There was a paper directed to each voter in Blaine's home. Not one in ten of them has been delivered. Five business men doing business in one block declare they never saw the paper. Not over 200 delivered papers can be found in Augusta, where 2,000 were sent from a point only twelve miles away. Papers going north from Vassalborough went five miles and into the Waterville office, and here all trace of thousands have been lost.

Burleigh men and detectives have been hunting the district, and are satisfied that over forty of these sacks of mail have been destroyed in the interest of Manley and Milliken. A formal complaint and charge will be made against several officials, and another lot will be printed. The government will be asked to see to it that the mails are not looted. As the facts become known the indignation grows.—Bangor (Me.) Dispatch to New York Times, May 27.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ROCKVILLE, IND., Aug. 2, 1892.

Editor Civil Service Chronicle:

DEAR SIR—I am pleased that your paper is outspoken on the only true line of reform. As a civil service reformer, I could not support Grover Cleveland in 1884, but was perfectly satisfied with his course as President. It was a "stagger" at reform from a very unexpected quarter. I therefore voted for him in 1888, when many who had voted for him four years before supported Harrison. It is quite plain that in spite of its past the democratic party is more progressive to-day than the republican.

Respectfully,

ISAAC R. STROUSE.

BALTIMORE, MD., Aug. 3, 1892.

To the Editor of the Civil Service Chronicle:

SIR—I wish to thank you for the thoroughness with which you have collected and published the facts as to the participation of federal officials in the work of the Minneapolis convention. Ninety-five per cent. of the active politicians in each party are bitterly opposed to the merit system. One national convention has renominated the President who is responsible for Wanamaker, Clarkson and Dave Martin, and who, in his, to a great extent at least, personally conducted campaign for renomination, used the offices in his gift for all they were worth. The other has asked the suffrages of the people for the author of the Fellows letter, the man who gave Vilas, Stevenson and Higgins a free hand. And yet each convention in making these nominations voiced the desires of the great mass of the best elements of their respective parties. Under such circumstances neither party is entitled to pose as a reform organization nor to ask the votes of reformers as such, and the reform vote will not all be cast one way. Those reformers who believe that the decalogue forbids a protective tariff, or that the federal control of congressional elections will be dangerous to local liberties and will produce violence and corruption in the cotton states, will doubtless vote for Mr. Cleveland. Those who believe in protection, together with those who are on the subject of the tariff economic agnostics, unwilling to turn things upside down, with little idea of whether such an overturning would produce good or ill results, or who believe that the constitutional gift of power to the federal government to regulate congressional elections imposes the corresponding duty to exercise that power when for any considerable period and over any large area the states have altogether failed to make such elections reasonably free and fair, will support Harrison.

While those who are inclined to view all the party cries as to a large extent insincere, and as shouted the loudest by men who are, after all, chiefly concerned in getting or keeping the offices, may find it as difficult to agree as to what outcome of the election will do most good or perhaps least harm to the cause of civil service reform. THE CHRONICLE believes that the duty immediately at hand is to punish Harrison. The writer believes that it will be wiser not make the country believe that reformers are willing to vote for the man who allowed the civil service law to fall in many places into what he himself might call a state of innocuous desuetude rather than for the man under whose administration, in spite of the grave and even scandalous failures to observe its spirit outside of the classified service; within that service the law has been reasonably well enforced almost everywhere. The CHRONICLE takes one side, the writer takes the other. But let us agree that whatever side we take we shall do it with our eyes as wide open as past party affiliations and prejudices will let us get them. Whether Harrison or Cleveland shall be elected whatever else is doubtful, it is certain that the reform will not long hold its own, much less go forward, unless reformers mercilessly expose the failures of the men in power to obey the letter of the reform law and observe its spirit. Therefore, although a republican who expects to vote for Harrison, I rejoice in the persistency with which you hold up to public view the spoils mongering, no matter what party or man is responsible for it.

J. C. R.

Many voters will not agree with our correspondent upon the relative weight of things. The manipulation of the civil service by President Harrison is not simply a brazen violation of his pledges. It is the most universal, unscrupulous and dangerous use of that service for personal ends that this country has ever witnessed. It is but a step from this to the tricks which Balmaceda undertook to play with the government of Chili. In the presence of this tendency, of which President Harrison's manipulation of his office-holders leading up to and at the Minneapolis convention, was a startling example, every other question is dwarfed. The President does not enact tariff laws or force bills. This President has very greatly increased the dangers to free institutions, which, as his platform said, "lurk in the power of official patronage." The evidence is conclusive against him.

I beg to inclose a postal note in payment for your admirable paper. HALL HARRISON.

MASSACHUSETTS TO THE WILD AND WOOLLY WEST.

We have received copy of paper bearing the name "THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE," published at Indianapolis, Ind. Its chief object and aim seems to be to laud Cleveland and the democratic party, and to berate Harrison and the republican party. There is a vast deal of claptrap about civil service, and anybody taking stock in the fad is not wise.—Chelsea, Mass. Gazette, August 13.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

WE gladly give all possible space this month to the speech of George W. Julian delivered in this city, September 15, and which appeared in full in the Indianapolis Sentinel the next morning. We do this the more gladly because Mr. Julian is the first of his party, whether person or paper, to lay hold of the only issue in this campaign which is vital to the people and connected with the election of the next President—the abuse of his power over the civil service by President Harrison. It will be seen that Mr. Julian's stroke was never more steady and certain. Nothing more entertaining from an intellectual and literary stand-point will be said in this campaign, and we commend the speech as an enunciation of the soundest principles in its denunciation of the unsoundest principles by one who has no object in view but to serve his country.

THE speech delivered by Mr. Foulke before the Reform Club of Boston, September 10th, was received at the last moment, and it is with regret that the CHRONICLE can not find room for all of it. It was published in full in the New York Evening Post, of September 15th, and in the New York Times of 16th. It is the speech of a man who justly feels that it is his peculiar duty to stand forth and declare the worst that can be said of a President—the bad faith of President Harrison. The declaration comes with a power which might be expected from the indisputable facts and Mr. Foulke's well known ability to arrange them, aided by the irresistible incentive that he is engaged in behalf of a great and outraged cause.

THE democratic platform touching the civil service is in marked contrast with that of the republicans. The democrats must be held to believe in their declaration, and in addition they clearly made it to induce the independent vote to unite with them. The platform is a promise to render it impossible for the service to be subject to change at every election, or to be a prize to be fought for at the polls, or to be a brief reward of party zeal. Those independents who design voting for Mr. Cleveland have a right to rely on this promise. Nothing but the convention itself can modify it, and all attempted modifications by local papers or personages may be disregarded. We do not mean to say that living up to this platform would be welcomed by all democrats. There are yet in Indiana, for instance, a class of rock-ribbed, hide-bound, and moss-backed democratic politicians who never had and never will have a single political idea except looting the offices. They care nothing upon what issue a campaign is argued, so that nothing is said or done that will make it more difficult to seize the spoil of victory. Any side of the tariff question is, they think, a haven of safety; they are not particular what side, and as likely as not after success at the election they will be found lobbying against the very tariff legislation which they said their success in the election would bring about. Independents understand this class. They are not so numerous nor so strong as they were, but they are still here. Unfortunately for them, their party in national convention has put them in close quarters.

UPON this issue the republicans are as dumb and helpless as they were upon the issue involved in the Mulligan letters in 1884. Every night they go to bed rejoicing that they have had no general attack at the only point at which they can make absolutely no resistance. For instance, no one here, in the President's own city, will answer Mr. Julian's attack for the simple reason that it is unanswerable. Yet the acts charged are of such a nature that if they can not be denied they must, with a large body of voters, unfit for re-election the man who has committed them. To say otherwise is to say that the American people are hopelessly venal. To convince them is only a question of a forcible, reiterated and persistent presentation of the facts.

ZEALOUS tariff reformers are apt to urge that until that question is settled, the civil service can not be reformed. This is nonsense. The tariff situation does not materially differ from the tariff situation of 1844. The democrats then won a great victory upon that issue. Yet the spoils system was in greater vigor than ever. In 1848 the democrats were totally defeated. Nothing was settled except a redistribution of spoil. Suppose the country were carried now ostensibly for tariff reform. In the course of time a considerably moderated tariff might be the result; it would depend upon the effect the party machine thought a given bill would have upon its hold upon the offices. That and nothing else would fix the course followed. The fact becomes more prominent every day that no public question will or can receive more than hand-to-mouth treatment while an enormous federal patronage remains a prize to be fought for at the polls. When voting for President two things should be remembered: he is an executive officer; he does not make tariff laws and all his other duties put together are nothing compared with his duty of superintending the civil service. A voter should also remember that he can, when voting for his congressman, completely perform his duty toward any question requiring legislation.

It is a matter of universal remark that the campaign seems "dead." It seems settled that neither candidate from his personality nor either side of the tariff question can "rouse" the people. The reason of the lack of interest is the lack of prominence of any moral issue. The only moral issue in this election is President Harrison's course with the civil service, with particular reference to the dangers to free institutions arising from his personal use of it, which finally led up to the formation and manipulation of the Minneapolis convention. It would be an insult to the people of Indiana, for instance, to say that all are not interested in this vital question; but there are in this state fifteen to twenty thousand voters who have a keen and abiding interest in it. They are usually quiet people scattered through all the hamlets, country-sides and cities of the state. The party-worker rarely knows of them. He says there are no such voters, and in polling his district he, in dense ignorance, puts them down as democrats or republicans. They pass nominally as such, and unless stirred by facts and arguments they are apt to vote with their nominal party. The democrats within the line of their platform have facts and arguments which can be made to stir these voters as they were never stirred before, but they will have to be used.

THERE are, however, some obstacles in the way of securing for the democrats the widest presentation of the case against President Harrison. We hear, for instance, of democratic leaders in Indiana who have already fixed upon the offices that they will take if Mr. Cleveland is elected, and this report involves even the subsidizing of Democratic newspapers. Of course so far as these have anything to do with the campaign they will have nothing to say of the evils inherent in the distribution of spoil by President Harrison. They are, in fact, already muzzled. This quite authentic report makes some things plain which were before obscure.

WE give President Harrison the full benefit of what he said of the civil service, in his letter of acceptance:

The civil service system has been extended and the laws enforced with vigor and impartiality. There has been no partisan juggling with the law in any of the departments or bureaus as had before happened, but appointments to the classified service have been made impartially from the eligible lists. The system now in force in all departments has for the first time placed promotions strictly upon the basis of merit as ascertained by the daily record, and the efficiency of the force thereby greatly increased.

Mr. Roosevelt produced conclusive evidence that certain officials in Baltimore had violated the civil law. This was months ago. Those officials are in office to-day. The President knows that the evidence is conclusive.

THE President also says in the same letter:

I have endeavored, without wavering or weariness, so far as the direction of public affairs was committed to me to carry out the pledges made to the people in 1838.

The displacement of more than 100,000 officers to make room for partisans and relatives would have wearied an ordinary man. Probably he rested while adding 832 places to the classified service.

HERBERT WELSH has an entertaining and valuable article in the September Forum on publicity as a cure for corruption, with particular reference to the work of campaign committees. The very fact that secrecy is sought is proof that the committees know that the public would not approve of their use of money. It does not take a large amount of money in any community to meet all of the expenses of an honorable campaign. The committee and the beneficiary mutually shrink from having the public know that the latter's house rent has been paid, for the public would correctly denominate the act as the purchase of a "floater." The good influence of an honest publication of accounts is clear. Mr. Welsh says of the main question:

"It is becoming more and more apparent to thoughtful men that no question before the country to-day is of greater national importance than that of civil service reform, the question whether the public funds represented by the salaries of the one hundred and twenty-five thousand officers of the civil service, aggregating sixty million dollars annual expenditure, shall be used in the interest of the people or whether they shall continue to furnish an immense bribery fund by which a small but highly organized class of professional politicians shall acquire and maintain their power."

MR. LOUIS H. GIBSON, the well-known architect of this city, recently read before the Century Club a paper on "The Relation of the Civil Service to Comfortable Living in Cities." Mr. Gibson has carefully studied the street and road question and city government generally in Europe, and the foundation of all he has to suggest—and he has much to suggest—is that the service of cities must be skilled, and to be skilled it must be permanent. He incontestibly maintains that street-cleaning is skilled labor. Here is an extract:

"In order to carry out all of these vast undertakings the work must be done by those having special knowledge; it must be done by men especially educated for the kind of work in hand. In order to secure such educated service there must be assurance that individuals will be as regularly employed as in any private enterprise, entirely independent of political belief. There is no more reason why any matter of politics should have to do with municipal service than with ordinary business enterprises. In general business, active political interest is regarded as a demerit rather than otherwise. The only thing needful for proper municipal administration is educated service. What is wanted is knowledge. In order to secure this knowledge there must be a reasonable assurance of employment."

It seems to be undisputed that a local politician here named Bradley Connett, was much opposed to President Harrison's renomination; that he afterward assumed such a threatening attitude toward his party that he was given a place in the government meat-inspection department which is located at Kingan & Co.'s in this city. If true, is this, or is it not, a purchase of the influence of Connett, giving him therefor a public office? If so, is that, or is it not, a corrupt use of public office? Again, Merrill Moores, the chairman of the republican county committee, has been endeavoring to bully Postmaster Thompson, of this city, into making places in his office for certain republican henchmen, who also made threats. There is no claim of incompetency on the part of the employees sought to be displaced. We repeat that the man who will not work for his party unless he is paid with an office is the meanest mercenary among men.

In the August examination for carriers in the Indianapolis post-office three colored men were successful and one of them stood at the head of the whole list. The merit system is the truest democracy connected with our government, and there is no race for whom it has such benefits in store as it has for the colored people.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

It is hard to find words to express what deserves to be said of George William Curtis. From the beginning, his was an unceasing effort to make his country and his fellow Americans better. His career stretches over two great epochs, the one characterized by the Philadelphia mob, the other by the Jay Hubbell campaign textbook. In the full maturity of his powers the war against slavery enlisted all his strength and to the victorious end he was a foremost leader. When that was over, his unerring judgment selected the uprooting of venal practices in public relations, the eradication of the element of spoil in the transaction of American public business as the greatest service which could be rendered to the country. To this end the merit system and the various reforms which have the general name of civil service reform are indispensable helps. How easy it would have been for him to fatten upon the country. For allegiance to his party, right or wrong, there was nothing it would not have given him. How easy to have held sinecure offices until he became rich. How easy to have enjoyed the best at foreign courts. Either could have been had if he would but make the sacrifice of leaving undone the work which he knew was the greatest which could be done for his country. He refused the English mission and became one of the first civil service commissioners. In entering upon the war against the spoils system, he undertook one of the greatest reforms that has ever been attempted in a commonwealth, and yet it was an humble task. Venality in public affairs, a feeling that in public business it was to be expected that there would be something over, for which the recipient had not given value but which accrued to him by reason of politics, had thoroughly debauched the public conscience. The multitude did not join in the new reform. Party leaders passed by on the other side with coarse abuse. It however gathered strength and then the sting and smart of defeat wrung great tears of repentance from party machines. Step by step the reform made its way until it became rooted so firmly that it can not be overturned. How small and mean the political Hubbells now seem. Of all the leaders in this crusade George William Curtis was without question the first; and no leader ever had greater love and no leader's memory greater respect and reverence from his associates. He has trained them well. It is with nonsense of weakness that they mourn his death. They look with confidence into the future. Their hands are not stayed but strengthened by the responsibility laid upon them. The greatest monument they can build to George William Curtis will be to complete his work, and it shall be done.

MR. JULIAN'S ADDRESS.

I propose this evening to devote a brief hour to the discussion of a single issue of the pending campaign, namely, the reform of the civil service; and I have chosen this topic for reasons which will abundantly appear as I proceed. This issue was involved in the canvass of 1888, but the attitude of the opposing candidates was then strikingly different. Mr. Cleveland had already tried his hand at civil service reform, and although his actions had disappointed the hopes and expectations of a portion of his friends, and were severely criticised, yet he did more for the cause than any President had done since the inauguration of the spoils system. It should be remembered, moreover, that what he accomplished was pre-eminently his own work, for the leaders of his party generally disagreed with him, while the time-honored policy and traditions of the party itself stood in his way. General Harrison, on the contrary, had his party behind him, or at least a powerful sentiment in the party, and its declaration of principles was not only sweeping and unconditional, but it embodied specific and detailed pledges which could not possibly be misunderstood. Indeed, both the party and the candidate seemed to gather strength and courage from the alleged shortcomings of Cleveland and to be hungry for the conflict and eager to demonstrate their faith by their works. Here is their platform:

We will not fail to keep our pledges because their candidate has broken his. We therefore renew our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the system should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided."

In his letter of acceptance General Harrison adopted these declarations as his own, and said:

In appointments to every grade and department fitness and not party service should be the essential and discriminating test, and fidelity and efficiency the only sure tenure of office. Only the interest of the public service should suggest removal from office.

In speaking of the civil service law he declared:

The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation and be faithfully and vigorously enforced. All appointments under it should be absolutely free from partisan considerations and influence.

In his inaugural address he declared:

Heads of departments, bureaus and all other public officers having any duty in connection therewith will be expected to enforce the civil service law fully and without evasion.

In this address he took occasion to say:

We may reverently invoke and confidently expect the favor and help of Almighty God; that he will give to me wisdom, strength and fidelity, and to our people a spirit of fraternity and a love of righteousness and peace.

This zeal for civil service reform was not new-born. It seems to have been the travail of his soul while he was a member of the senate, and in a speech on the subject on the 26th of March, 1886, he delivered himself as follows:

I do lift up a hearty prayer that we may never have a President who will not either pursue, and compel his cabinet advisers to pursue, the civil service policy pure and simple, and upon a just basis, allowing men accused to be heard, and deciding against them only upon competent proof and fairly—either have that kind of civil service, or, for God's sake, let us have that other frank and bold, if brutal method, of turning men and women out simply for political opinion. Let us have one or the other. They will not mingle. It was the conflict of these currents—the President on one side endeavoring to be responsive to his self-imposed pledges, and the pressure of his party on the other, that has driven those who were at the heads of the departments in the attempt to preserve and maintain the President's professions and at the same time to give to the hungry who were demanding to be fed—it was an attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable that has brought this wretched condition of things in which men and women are condemned without a hearing.

No words in the English language could more absolutely have bound the judgment and conscience of Gen. Harrison to the support of civil service reform than did the extracts I have quoted. They imported profound earnestness and absolutely sincerity. They not only committed him to the reform without qualification, but they brought him to the front as its chief prophet. His devotion to it seemed to be a fascination, and his reference to the recreancy of his predecessor gave evidence that his heart palpitated and his soul panted for the great cause. His fervent words could fairly be accepted as the evangel of political righteousness, while his earnestness was attested by the sanctities of religion. He was known to be a devout member of the Presbyterian church. He was an elder in the church, which is a priestly office and a spiritual dignity. He was so straight-laced in his puritanism that he would not travel on Sunday. He was a man of prayer, and this has not been kept from the public; for the newspapers emphasized the fact that on his journey to Washington in the spring of 1889 he attended to his morning devotions in the palace car in which he journeyed. Would such a candidate for the presidency violate his plighted faith to the nation? Would a religious man and a Presbyterian elder look heaven in the face with a lie on his lips? He was as sacredly bound to maintain the spirit and purpose of civil service reform in all executive appointments, and to make fitness and not party service the essential and discriminating test in appointments and removals, as Abraham Lincoln was bound to maintain the prohibition of slavery in our territories in 1860; with this difference, that Lincoln could do nothing without the help of congress, while Gen. Harrison could perform nearly all his promises without legislative aid. He was far more explicitly committed to the reform of the civil service by reiterated pledges and asseverations than he was committed to the force bill or the principles of protection. The people so understood him and trusted him. It was their faith in his promises which made him president. The contest was a close one, and there were independent voters enough in New York and New England alone who deserted Cleveland and threw their votes for Harrison to turn the scales in his favor. One possible way was only left open by which he could defend himself against the charge of obtaining the presidency by false pretenses if elected, and that was the proof of his sincerity by performing his resounding promises.

But I come now to the painful part of my duty. In his inaugural address, from which I have already quoted, General Harrison said: "Retrospect will be a safer basis of judgment than promises." This is most true. Men are to be judged by what they perform, and not by what they promise. In the forum of morals and religion it is not the men who content themselves with crying "Lord, Lord," but the doers of the word who are to be recognized, and the moral world would be turned upside down if any other principle should prevail. General Harrison invites us to try him by his acts, and his own words must be my text. It will not be necessary to go extensively into details, and I shall therefore only refer to a few conspicuous cases which will serve as crucial tests of his honesty and consistency in dispensing the federal patronage.

Soon after his inauguration he was called upon to deal with the post-office of New York City. Pearson was the postmaster, and had been appointed by Garfield in 1881 as the successor of Postmaster James, who had conducted the office so admirably that he was afterward made postmaster-general. Pearson so improved and perfected the management of the office and so completely lifted it out of the mire of party politics and made it a great business concern that Cleveland, when his term expired, reappointed him, which he did against the powerful opposition of his own party leaders. * * *

Let me refer to the case of Mr. Saltonstall, collector of the custom-house at Boston, who was removed from office early in the following year before the expiration of his term, and solely for political reasons. He was acceptable to men of all parties and was universally regarded as one of the best collectors that had ever occupied the office. * * *

In March, 1891, General Corse was displaced from the post-office at Boston. He was generally regarded as the best postmaster Boston had ever had, and all parties desired his retention. Even Senators Hoar and Dawes, notwithstanding their proverbial partisan zeal, together with four Massachusetts representatives, joined the people in the demand for his continuance in office. He was the head of the Loyal Legion and one of the best generals in the war for the Union. As a man, an officer and a citizen he was popular, and there was not even the shadow of a reason for his displacement. The gentleman who succeeded him declared that he knew nothing about the business of the office, and he had signed a petition for the retention of the incumbent. He had further declared that "if the interest of the public service is to decide, General Corse will be renominated." * * *

Another remarkable case is that of Mr. Burt, naval officer of New York, who was removed in the summer of 1889. He had not filled out his term of office under his appointment by Cleveland, but was summarily dismissed at the bidding of ex-Senator Platt for political reasons only. He had been twenty years in the public service and was well known as a determined friend of the civil service policy. He was a trained officer, thoroughly familiar with the duties of his position, and as thoroughly conscientious in discharging them. Like Pearson, he was succeeded by a man who was unfamiliar with the work of the office and opposed to the civil service law; and the inference is irresistible that the change was made for no other purpose than to make the office a party machine under the control of Platt, to whom the federal patronage of the state was farmed out by the President.

A more shocking illustration of the President's faithlessness was given soon after his inauguration in his action touching the bureau of printing and engraving. This is one of the chief bureaus in the treasury department, and it controls more places not included in the classified service than all the other treasury bureaus combined. Under different administrations preceding that of Mr. Cleveland it had become notorious as the refuge of parasites and spoilsmen, and an investigating committee of experts in the treasury had reported that a force which in some divisions was twice and in others three times as large as was necessary had been employed, and that more than half the force in the bureau might be dispensed with. President Cleveland, soon after his inauguration, selected the chairman of this committee, E. O. Graves, as the chief of the bureau. Graves was an independent republican, but was appointed by Cleveland and warmly supported by Secretary Manning on the score of his rare qualifications for the work and his proved fidelity. He did not wait for civil service rules and regulations but courageously applied the principles of reform so as to make the bureau a strictly business establishment. No employes were discharged for political reasons or to make places for others. * * *

Let me mention one further illustration. Under the administration of President Arthur a lady named Isabella de la Hunt was appointed postmistress at Cannelton, in this state, on the recommendation of Senator Harrison. She was the widow of a soldier who died of wounds received in the service. I think it was on some complaint of offensive partisanship that she was removed under Cleveland's administration and a democratic politician and editor appointed in her place. Senator Harrison was exceedingly indignant, and was at once overtaken by one of his spasms of virtue and patriotism. He said:

If there was in all this country one person who, by reason of her sex, who by reason of her widowhood, who by reason of the sacrifice she made in giving the arm on which she leaned to her country's service, was entitled to be kept in office, was entitled to have her reputation guarded jealously by all men who represented the government, it was Mrs. Isabella de la Hunt.

This is very fine; but let us follow the case a little further. Senator Harrison afterwards became President, and Mrs. Isabella de la Hunt, whom he had taken under his wing with such fatherly tenderness, asked him to restore her to the place from which she had been driven. What did Elder Harrison do? Did he visit the widow in her affliction? Yes, but his visit was a visitation. He gave the office to a male applicant, and this poor woman, "who by reason of her sex, who by reason of her widowhood, who by reason of the sacrifice she made in giving the arm on which she leaned to her country's service," was turned over to the consolations of religion and the hope of a better world, and to meditations on the blessedness and beauty of civil service reform as illustrated by a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church. It seems as if the President was determined to leave no manner of doubt in the mind of any man or woman respecting his brazen infidelity to his pledges. It is true that his friends have tried to excuse him in this case on the plea that it was Clarkson, his wicked partner, who did this outrageous thing, but as Clarkson was the President's subordinate, and under explicit instructions to enforce the civil service policy "without evasion," and inasmuch as the President never put him under discipline for this "bold if brutal" act, it would seem to be pretty clear to a layman that this defense simply aggravates his recreancy. He was bound to watch his subordinate. It was his duty to keep alive the fires of his chivalric devotion to the fortunes of this widow, whose case only a little while before had so roused his indignation. * * *

Let me proceed with my subject in the way of further illustrations. I understand the fundamental principle of civil service reform to be that in all executive appointments fidelity and efficiency, not party service, should be the tenure of office. This is the President's creed, and keeping it in mind I wish to inquire why John Wanamaker was made postmaster-general. It is true that, like the President himself, he is a religious man and zealously devoted to the interests of the church and the Sunday-school. But these qualifications were not sufficient in a cabinet minister. He was wholly unknown to the public as a statesman or even a politician. He was a successful Philadelphia shop-keeper and a man of wealth. According to the high authority of Mr. Herbert Welsh, he also had a "reputation for skill in diving into the depths of political waters and fetching brilliant results to the surface." What strange influence all at once brought such a man before the eyes of the nation as the incumbent of a great office? Who believes he would ever have been thus honored for his piety merely, if he had not possessed more solid charms? The explanation is an open secret. Near the close of the campaign of 1888, when the contest grew doubtful and money was sorely needed, especially in such pivotal states as Indiana, where Dudley was organizing his "blocks-of-five" and furnishing them with funds for the conversion of the heathen, Senator Quay asked Wanamaker to take the lead in raising $400,000 for the blessed work. The request was responded to favorably, and Wanamaker himself has since admitted in a public interview that more than $200,000 were raised, and that he paid $10,000. In that interview he said: "I had a large experience in raising money from my connection with the Christian association and other enterprises." Harrison was elected and Quay now asked the President, in consideration of Wanamaker's services, to make him postmaster-general, and it was done. The President personally knew all about the meaning of this monstrous transaction. He knew that Wanamaker's financial aid in a great emergency was urged as the ground on which he should be thus honored, and he knows that he honored him accordingly. These are the simple facts, and they furnish a very instructive commentary upon the President's civil service policy. They constitute a "damned spot" in his record which no waters can ever wash out, and the revolting affair can best be accounted for by referring it to an unholy alliance between office greed and godliness. Wanamaker was a man of prayer whose orthodoxy was unquestioned, whatever might be thought of the morality of this performance. To his piety he had added wealth and cunning, and these advantages made him very attractive to a man of the President's practical turn of mind when facing a great temptation. Both seem to belong to a class of religionists who

Ply every art of legal thieving,
No matter, stick to sound believing.

In conducting this important negotiation I have no doubt that both preserved their customary self-complacency, and that each could have entered heartily into the spirit of "Holy Willie's Prayer:"

Yet I am here a chosen sample
To show thy grace is great and ample;
I'm here a pillar in thy temple,
Strong as a rock,
A guide, a buckler, an example,
To a' thy flock.

Again, let me inquire why Stephen B. Elkins was made secretary of war in the last half of the administration. His career is historic. More than a quarter of a century ago he settled in New Mexico and became a member of the territorial legislature. He studied the Spanish language and the character and habits of the Mexican population. President Johnson afterward appointed him district attorney for the territory, which office he held three years. He was then elected a delegate to congress and served two terms. This experience amply prepared him for the brilliant ventures in real estate through which he became rich. His dealings were mainly in Spanish grants, which he bought for a very small price from their Mexican claimants or their grantees. The boundaries of these grants were vague and uncertain and their definite settlement had to be determined by the surveyor-general of the territory, subject to the final action of congress. Elkins became a member of the land ring of the territory, and largely through his influence the survey of these grants was made to contain hundreds of thousands of acres that did not belong to them. He thus became a great land-holder, through the manipulation of committees in congress grants thus illegally surveyed were confirmed with their fictitious boundaries. He made himself particularly conspicuous as the hero of the famous Maxwell grant, which, as Secretary Cox decided in 1869, contained only twenty-two square leagues, or about ninety-six thousand acres, but which, under the manipulation of Elkins, was surveyed and patented for 1,714,764 acres, or nearly two thousand, six hundred and eighty square miles. Congress, through the action of its committees, was beguiled into the confirmation of the grant, with the exterior boundaries vaguely indicated in it so stretched as to cover the whole of this immense area, and which confirmation by congress compelled the supreme court to recognize this astounding robbery as valid. By such methods as these more than ten million acres of the public domain in New Mexico have become the spoil of land grabbers, and the ring leaders in this game of spoilation was Stephen B. Elkins, the confederate of Stephen W. Dorsey, and the master spirit in the movement. He was thoroughly qualified for his work. He was irrepressible and full of resources. He was Quay, Platt, Mahone and Clarkson rolled into one. He was a genius in business, and in the pursuit of his ends was singularly unshackled by a conscience. He used the surveyor-general of the territory, the land department in Washington and the committees of congress as his instruments in fleecing poor settlers and robbing the government of its lands. To cheat a man out of his home is justly regarded as a crime second only to murder; and to rob the nation of its public domain and thus abridge the opportunity of landless men to acquire homes is not only a crime against society, but a cruel mockery of the poor.

If any such considerations ever disturbed the dreams of Mr. Elkins, they were summarily silenced by his overmastering zeal in the work of "practical politics." According to Dorsey, Elkins knew more than any other person about the star route cases, which became famous a dozen years ago, and he will also be remembered as engaged in the prosecution of a claim for $50,000,000 against Brazil, while Blaine was secretary of state under Garfield, which claim was afterward indignantly rejected by Secretary Bayard. In the light of his other performances it is not surprising that the President should desire to place such a man as Elkins under special obligations on the eve of a desperate struggle for renomination. Elkins had been Blaine's chief political manager for years. Up to the time of his appointment he was known everywhere as an enthusiastic friend and admirer of Blaine; and I think it is morally certain that he would so have continued but for this remarkable display of the President's zeal for civil service reform. Harrison knew his man and he knew all about his career in the southwest as I have depicted it; for while he was in the senate he was a member of the committee on territories and gave particular attention to the affairs of New Mexico. In referring to these matters I do not speak at random, but from official documents and ascertained facts with which I became familiar during my public service of four years in that territory under the last administration. * * *

The discussion of the President's civil service policy invites attention to his nepotism. Early in his administration he made his brother, Carter Harrison, marshal of Tennessee. His brother-in-law, John N. Scott, was appointed superintendent of construction in the office of the supervising architect at Port Townsend. The list of places given to other relatives includes the deputy collectorship of customs at Port Townsend, a five-thousand-dollar position in Utah, the post of naval attache to the Samoan commission in Berlin, the collectorship of internal revenue in the First Ohio District, the position of naval officer at New Orleans, and that of law clerk in the post-office department. These appointments are utterly irreconcilable with the President's various pledges, and they have a sinister meaning. His brother, for example, may be a fit man for the position of marshal, but the public will be slow to believe that his fitness was "the sole and discriminating test" in his appointment, or that he would even have been thought of for the place if he had not been the relative of the President. This is equally true of all the positions named. The policy of giving office to relatives was denounced by all our early Presidents, who turned away from it as a political indecency. No administration can be regarded as "clean" which adopts it, and it is particularly unbecomely in a President who has paraded himself as the champion of the merit system of appointments.

A far more flagrant prostitution of federal patronage was the attempt of the President to control the freedom of the press in furtherance of him ambition. He has appointed scores and hundreds of editors of influential journals to important places at home and abroad, and thus placed before them a temptation which may prove stronger than the love of truth. A journalist who is dependent upon the government for his bread is an untrusty representative of public opinion. The newspapers favored by the President are located in various sections of the Union, and each is a center of power which may be used by him both offensively and defensively in a political campaign. He evidently regards them as fortified places, which he hopes to command through the poteney of patronage, and the effect can not be otherwise than pernicious. The foremost of all his subsidized organs is the New York Tribune, "founded by Horace Greeley," and edited by Whitelaw Reid. It is a great power in politics, and to win it over to his side was naturally a darling purpose of the President. Reid was always well known as an ardent friend of Blaine prior to his appointment as minister to France, and but for the important favor thus bestowed there is every reason to believe he would have been his zealous supporter in the late struggle for the presidential nomination. At heart he undoubtedly preferred Blaine; but the acceptance of an honorable and lucrative position could scarcely fail to have a certain influence. It created an obligation. It may have been the make-weight which secured the President's renomination, and probably prompted the statement already quoted that the President "has given the country a clean administration." The appointment of Clarkson, the editor of the Iowa State Register, as first assistant postmaster general, suggests kindred observations, which would apply with varying degrees of force to all of the many journalists singled out by the President for his official smiles. His obvious purpose was to bring the patronage of the government into conflict with the freedom of the press, and thus to purchase the presidency with the public money. It was a bold and comprehensive scheme, and there was method in it; but it was as flagitious in principle as it was unprecedented in the history of the government. The grandfather of the President, more than half a century ago, said: "There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect for unhallowed purposes than the control of the public press." And Daniel Webster declared that "an open attempt to secure the aid and friendship of the public press, of bestowing the endowments of office on its active conductors, seems to me of everything we have witnessed to be the most reprehensible. It degrades both the government and the press. As far as its natural effect extends, it turns the palladium of liberty into the engine of party. It brings the agency, activity, energy and patronage of the government all to bear, with united force, on the means of general intelligence, and on the adoption or rejection of political opinions." All this was perfectly understood by the President, for in a speech in the senate in the spring of 1886 he arraigned Mr. Cleveland for doing on a very small scale what he himself has been doing on a large one. He knew that his purpose was to muzzle the press of his party, and thus serve himself. "Give me the liberty," said Milton, "to think, to know, to believe, and to utter, freely and according to the conscience, above all other liberties." It was against this liberty that the President deliberately conspired in attempting to bribe the journalists of his party by federal offices to give him their support.

This review of the President's civil service policy would not be complete without some reference to the Minncapolis convention of the 7th of June. No better illustration of the power of the spoils was possible than the performances of this body. As nearly as I can determine 140 office-holders attended as delegates and cast their votes, while probably 3,000 other place-holders reinforced them by their presence and influence. * * *

I have spoken plainly because I desire to be perfectly understood. My subject demands that I speak after the fashion of Nathan to David. I have not alluded to General Harrison's relations to the church in any spirit of levity or irreverence. The subject of religion has burdened the hearts and minds of men in every age and clime. It is an affair between the soul and its Creator, and as such it is inviolate. No man should trifle with the religious faith of any man or woman. It is not a matter which can decently be put on dress parade or placed upon the market as an investment in business or politics; and he who makes it a cloak for selfish ends merits universal condemnation and contempt. The newspapers have told us that Judge Gresham regards the President as a Pharisee. In my opinion Judge Gresham is right, and I believe the Pharisees of to-day are no better than those of nearly nineteen centuries ago. They have abounded in every age of the church, and like the poor they are always with us. In their ceremonial rightcousness they are immaculate, but in the weightier matters of law they are infidel. I think they are nowhere so well characterized as in the twenty-third chapter of the book of Matthew:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayer; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith; these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

The President is of opinion that it is a great abuse to bring the patronage of the federal government into conflict with the freedom of elections; and that this abuse ought to be corrected wherever it may have been permitted to exist, and to be prevented for the future: He, therefore, directs that information be given to all officers and agents in your department of the public service that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of state officers or officers of this government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, or the payment of any contribution or assessment on salaries or official compensation for party or election purposes, will be regarded by him as cause for removal.—From a Circular issued by Daniel Webster, Secretary of State under President William Henry Harrison, to the Heads of the Departments under the Government of the United States.

The republicans of Hancock county met in mass convention at the court-house this noon. After calling the convention to order he introduced Hon. S. N. Chambers [United States attorney], of Indianapolis, who addressed the people for over an hour in a highly interesting manner.—Greenfield Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 4.

There was a rousing meeting of republicans in this city to-night. The Hon. J. B. Cockrum [deputy United States attorney], of Indianapolis, addressed the Harrison and Baker guards, two republican organizations of this city. One hundred and fifty members escorted the speaker to the court-house. The speech aroused much enthusiasm.—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 13.

There are a large number of delegates here to attend the republican convention. The whole day has been devoted to the discussion of the propriety of nominating a state ticket. Those in favor of a ticket were led by two white men who are federal office-holders and several negroes. The better argument was made by the opponents of a ticket, but there is no doubt that the convention will decide to-morrow to nominate one.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, Sept. 7.

"I desire to obtain from you the names of from eight to twelve of the most active, earnest, discreet, and trustworthy young republicans who will get their mail at your post-office. I particularly wish, also, that you keep this request a secret, even from those whose names you furnish me. I want twelve names, but if there are but ten or eleven, send the ten or eleven; if only eight or nine, send them. They should be men between twenty-two and forty, of good character and standing in their neighborhood. But I desire young men between twenty-two and thirty-two if you have the number between those ages. Each man's age, occupation, whether married or single, and his nationality, should follow his name. All the arrangements for the new contract were completed yesterday at the custom-house. The leaders tried hard to get it when the time came to relet it while Collector Erhardt was in office, but a dispute arose between the collector and the treasury department, which resulted in postponing an award. Collector Erhardt held that it should be made to the lowest bidder, while the officers in Washington took the ground that the law did not make such a course obligatory, and that there was no need of public advertisements for bids. No agreement on the point was reached, and matters dragged along, Mr. Briggs holding over and the republican leaders getting hungrier and hungrier for a slice of the good things. This feeling had developed into something very close to famine by the time Collector Erhardt went out of office.—New York Times, July 12.

The appointment of William H. Leaycraft to a position in the appraiser's department has simply added fuel to the flame of republican dissension in Kings county. It was a direct slap at Internal Revenue Collector Nathan, the local representative of Thomas C. Platt, and is regarded by all his associates as a notification by the President that he does not want any help from the Nathan faction. Yet it is Nathan who has absolute control of the local machinery, and he is in a position to apply the knife to Mr. Harrison in a most scientific manner.—Times, July 10.

For years Leaycraft has lived solely by politics. He was kept in office by Platt, whom he now repudiates, but his winters were all spent in Albany. The third house knew him well, and men here of the legitimate branches of the legislature have had many business dealings with him. These transactions have been profitable to both parties, and Leaycraft has been able to make a good showing in public. Locally he has been nothing more than a ward boss, and other leaders anxious for the votes of delegates from the thirteenth ward have always known how to get them. They have dealt directly with Leaycraft, and he has always been able to deliver the goods. He has made no secret of the fact that he is in politics for what he can get out of it, and everybody knows what that means.—New York Times, July 10.

It was announced at republican headquarters last week that "harmony" prevailed in the ranks of the party in Kings county, and this flattering statement was interpreted to mean that Secretary of the Navy Tracy and Naval Officer Willis would cease from fighting Ernst Nathan [internal revenue collector], who is to be left in control of the local machine.—New York Times, Aug. 29.

* * *

The Kings county republican organization is in a pitiable plight, being torn by dissensions and petty jealousies. Worst of all, the rigors of a Presidential campaign stare them in the face. Ernst Nathan [internal revenue collector], the half-acknowledged leader, looked woe-begone and disconsolate yesterday when he admitted that things were decidedly blue. He said he had experienced a feeling akin to that felt by the aged female in the nursery rhyme, who, though disposed to feed her dog, found she had an empty cupboard. Brightening up a little, he said: "Well, the democrats have the money and they have the county, but we will get money enough to keep the majority down."—New York Times, Sept. 11.

The republican campaign in Brooklyn will be practically opened this evening, when the County Committee of Four Hundred will meet for the first time after the summer vacation, during which the factional hostilities which rent the body in twain last spring were of necessity intermitted. At the last meeting in June there was a perfunctory indorsement of the national ticket nominated at Minneapolis coupled with a denunciation of Brooklyn's representative in the administration. Since that time there has been a persistent effort on the part of the opponents of Secretary Tracy to secure control of all the party machinery. They are led by Ernst Nathan, collector of internal revenue, and by securing control of the executive committee of thirty-five by the use of underhand means, he dictated the appointment of a campaign committee of fifteen, who in turn added to their own number up to 100 from among the active republicans of the city, being careful to assure a majority of Nathan men. The adherents of Secretary Tracy with Naval Officer Willis at their head have sulked in their tents while all this was done, as they felt powerless and helpless, although they were able to elect the majority of the delegates to Minneapolis in the interest of President Harrison. But when the democratic scheme to alter ward boundaries in manipulating assembly districts was put through, Nathan had influence enough to secure the alteration of the boundaries of the twenty-third and twenty-fifth wards in his interest, so as to control the senate and assembly districts of which they form a part, and which are almost the only surely republican districts in the city. This was a purely partisan movement, and the Tracy-Willis faction determined to do all in their power to upset it. To this end the proceedings were begun to set aside the reapportionment and to declare the alteration of ward boundaries illegal. When the proceedings were defeated in the supreme court, the Nathan interest gave out the statement that the matter would end there and no appeal would be taken. But the Tracy-Willis people have appealed and the matter comes up for argument in the general term to-morrow. In order to profit by the change in ward boundaries as much as possible, the Nathan faction has devised a scheme to have the representation of the wards in the governing body of the party remain the same as before they were divided until the end of this year, but to permit the representatives in nominating conventions to be counted as representing the wards as now constituted. This device is simply to give Collector Nathan's ward a preponderance of votes when nominations are made and enable him to name an assemblyman. The scheme has to come before the general committee for ratification to night, and much as they deprecate factional contests in the face of a presidential campaign, the Tracy-Willis side is determined to give battle to the Nathan men to-night. A lively meeting is expected and there will be sharp debate and a close drawing of factional lines. Naval Officer Willis, District Attorney Johnson, Col. Charles B. Morton and Joseph Benjamin will be heard on one side; while Senator Aspinwall, David A. Baldwin, Jacob Brenner, M. J. Daly, and others, will speak for Collector Nathan, who will pull wires in the background.—New York Evening Post, Sept. 13.

The Kings county republican general committee met last night in the Criterion Theater, Brooklyn. It was near ten o'clock when Chairman W. W. Goodrich called the committee to order. On a test vote as to the representation of the twenty-fifth ward in the committee, it was decided that the ward had all the delegates it was entitled to by a vote of 176 to 142. This means another victory for the Nathan faction and leaves him in control of the ward.—New York Times, Sept. 14.

The removal of Henry F. Merritt, consul at Chemnitz, by the appointment of one Barnes of Illinois to that place, has drawn from Mr. Merritt's friends some bitter remarks about the President's regard for "interest of the public service." It appears that Merritt was promoted from Aix-la-Chapelle to Chemnitz because he had ferreted out violations of the customs laws, and that he continued his labors at Chemnitz with notable industry and success. The explanation is given that "the Chicago politicians have constantly been clamoring for his place," and that the President came to the conclusion that he could further his own interests in the campaign by conveniently ignoring his assertion that "only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office."—New York Times, Aug. 31.

PLACATING REBELLIOUS BARONS.

The national committee has given out the following as its part of the arrangements:

"No arrangements have been made for anything like a formal reception of the President during his stay with Mr. Reid. It is not known who will be invited by Mr. Reid to meet him. All of the members of the republican national committee who are in the city at this time and who can conveniently go to Ophir farm will undoubtedly present themselves at some time during the day. It is expected that ex-Senator Platt and Mr. Brookfield and Mr. Hackett of the state committee will also call upon the President.

"The President's main purpose in coming to Ophir farm at this time is to see and consult with Mr. Reid, and a large part of his time will be occupied in conference with his host."—New York Times, Aug. 31.

Ex-Senator Platt arrived at 11:30 A. M., accompanied by John E. Millholland. The visitors drove over to Ophir farm, and when they arrived they were received on the piazza by Mr. Reid and D. O. Mills. Mr. Platt was at once conducted into the reception room, and a conference took place between the President and Mr. Platt.—New York Evening Post, Aug. 31.

"Doubts were raised in my mind after the Minneapolis convention how far my services were desired by those who seemed then to be in charge of Mr. Harrison's campaign. I heard that some persons were representing to him that all the misfortunes the republican party had ever undergone in the state of New York were to be attributed directly to me, and that it would be good politics for him to let it be understood that he wished to have nothing to do with 'bosses.'

"Certainly, I had no desire to obtrude myself upon the President, nor to force myself into the conduct of his campaign if I was not wanted. As the facts have proved, I was probably over-sensitive. But if a man must have faults, that one is among those most easily forgiven."

"So you waited," said the reporter.

"Yes, I waited. I waited to hear from President Harrison. Some people said that I waited to hear from him a request to take office; that I waited to make a sordid bargain; that I stood like a road agent 'holding up' a coach.

"These were lies, and they were among the meanest and most irritating, most painful and most hurtful lies I have ever had to endure."—Interview with Tom Platt, New York Times, Sept. 5.

MR. FOULKE'S SPEECH.

BROKEN REPUBLICAN PLEDGES.

"The reform of the civil service [says the platform of 1888], auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all grades of service to which it is applicable."

The only extensions of the classified service made by Mr. Harrison, in pretended pursuance of the promises of the platform, were the extensions to about 700 teachers and superintendents in the Indian bureau, less than 200 in the fish commission, and a few employes in the patent office. The entire number of such extensions is not far from 1,000.

When the civil service law first took effect there were about 16,000 subject to its provisions. At the close of President Cleveland's term there were, after including the railway mail service, which he had incorporated, more than 30,000 men in the classified service. But there are more than 100,000 in the entire federal civil service which still remain unclassified. Of this immense number President Harrison has extended the civil service rules to about 1,000 employes.

Secretary Tracy has, indeed, provided for a registration of laborers in the navy department, under a system quite similar to the classified service, although it is not embraced within the rules or placed under control of the civil service commissioners, and it would be discretionary for any subsequent secretary of the navy to abolish his regulations. With these trifling exceptions there has been absolutely nothing done by the present administration in performance of its promises that the reform system should be extended to all the branches of the classified service to which it is applicable.

The civil service law itself provided that it should apply to all post-offices and custom-house offices having fifty or more employes, and that it should be extended to other post-offices and custom-houses having less than fifty employes whenever so ordered by the President. The law itself designated these custom-houses and post-offices as places to which it was applicable.

After the accession of President Harrison to office, his own civil service commissioners reported recommending its extension to post-offices having twenty-five employes or more, and afterward, in 1891, recommended its extension to post-offices, custom-houses and internal revenue districts in which there are twenty-five or more employed, as well as to clerks in the navy yard, to the employes of the District of Columbia, to the mints and sub treasuries, and to all free delivery post-offices.

Yet, during his entire term, President Harrison has utterly failed to extend it to a single post-office or custom-house, or to any of the offices to which this extension was recommended. A clearer violation of the written promise of the party could not be imagined.

CENSUS.

If there was any branch of the service where appointments should have depended upon the fitness of the appointee, as proved by examination and probation, and not upon patronage and political favor, it was the census bureau. It was the plain duty of those in charge of this bureau to give to the people the exact facts as to all matters inquired of, unwarping by political bias. If the promise of the republican platform had any significance at all, it meant that the President would extend this competitive system to the clerks of the census bureau when that bureau should be established. Mr. Harrison, in concurring with and adopting the platform, distinctly made this promise his own. His civil service commissioners advised this extension also. The President refused to make it. The census bureau has been used as a partisan machine, and the result of the work has been greatly discredited.

HOW HAS THE LAW BEEN ENFORCED?

In his inaugural President Harrison declared: "Heads of departments, bureaus and other public offices having any duty connected therewith, will be expected to enforce the civil service law fully and without evasion. Beyond this obvious duty, I hope to do something more to advance the reform of the civil service." How far, then, has President Harrison enforced the law?

The civil service commission, whose duty it is to enforce it, is composed of three members, two of whom must belong to opposite political parties. When the present administration came into power, Charles Lyman, a Republican, was the sole acting commissioner. Mr. Harrison then appointed Theodore Roosevelt, a republican, and Governor Hugh S. Thompson, a Democrat, a man who had been selected for the place by Mr. Cleveland before he went out of office. These were excellent men, who determined to enforce the law impartially, so far as they had the power. They could see that examinations were fairly conducted, and they did. But they could not remove any officer who violated the law, they could not personally conduct prosecutions, they could merely investigate, report and recommend. The rest lay with the President, the cabinet officers and their subordinates, and these have utterly failed in many important instances to sustain the commission in their efforts.

THE BALTIMORE POST-OFFICE.

Take, for example, the Baltimore post-office. Commissioner Roosevelt heard that this office was being used to influence a primary election on March 30, 1891, and he went to Baltimore personally to investigate the matter. His report contains the following:

"On the day when the primaries were held, I went around in person to several of the wards to observe what was done, preferring to see for myself what the facts really were rather than to seek to sift them out afterward from the conflicting testimony of scores of interested and possibly untrustworthy witnesses. I herewith submit all the testimony taken. In my opinion it establishes the following facts:

"The primaries held on March 30 were marked by a very bitter contest between two factions of the republican party. One of these factions was generally known in the newspapers, as well as among its own supporters and opponents, who took part in the primary election, as the 'Johnson crowd,' or 'Johnson-Airey faction,' Mr. Johnson being the postmaster and Mr. Airey the marshal in Baltimore. The other faction was known similarly as the 'Henderson faction,' or 'Henderson-Stone faction,' Messrs. Henderson and Stone having been, respectively, candidates for appointment to the positions of postmaster and marshal.

"As a whole, the contest was marked by great fraud and no little violence. Many of the witnesses of each faction testified that the leaders of the opposite faction in their ward had voted repeaters, democrats and men living outside of the ward, in great numbers. I am inclined to believe that, in this respect, there is much reason to regard the testimony of each side as correct in its outline of the conduct of the other. Accusations of ballot-box stuffing were freely made, with much appearance of justification. A number of fights took place. In many wards there were several arrests. In one or two cases so many men were arrested that the police patrol wagons could not accommodate them. In several cases the judges of the election were themselves among those arrested. The judges, three in number in each ward, sat within a house at a window opening on the street, and the voters at the primary were marshaled in a line outside, surrounded by a great crowd of onlookers.

"One of the incidents of the day was an effort on the part of Marshal Airey to drag a judge, whom he accused of misconduct, out of the window, a fierce struggle being the result."

As to the post-office and marshal's office, Mr. Roosevelt reports:

"The evidence seems to be perfectly clear that both these offices were used for the purpose of interfering with or controlling the result of the primary election and that there was a systematic, though sometimes indirect, effort made to assess the government employes in both, for political purposes.

"The only two deputy marshals examined, Messrs. Biddleman and Sultz, both confessed that they had collected money for political purposes from other office-holders, in defiance of the law, and that they took a very active part at the polls. It seems clear from the testimony of these two deputy marshals, and of Mr. McAllister, as well as incidentally from the testimony of some of the other witnesses, that the marshal's office was used, apparently by or with the consent of the marshal himself, to influence the election. General Rule 1 of the civil service rules reads as follows:

"Any officer in the executive civil service who shall use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or controlling the result thereof * * * shall be dismissed from office."

* * * * *

"In my opinion, therefore, all the following government employes should be dismissed from office for violating Sections 11 to 14 of the civil service law. [naming them.]

"It is evident," says Mr. Roosevelt, "from the testimony, that the non-classified service in the Baltimore post-office, as is the case with the non-classified service in almost every patronage office, was treated as a bribery chest from which to reward influential ward workers who were useful, or likely to be useful, to the faction in power.

* * * * *

"Mr. Johnson has filled the entire unclassified and half the classified service with republican ward workers, and has permitted the post-office to be turned into a machine to influence primary election. Doubtless, unless checked, it will be similarly used as a machine to influence the course of the state and national elections."

These were the statements contained in the report of an upright republican official. Copies of this report were sent on August 4, 1891, by direction of the entire civil service commission to the President, to Postmaster General Wanamaker, to Mr. Foster, secretary of the treasury, and to Mr. Miller, attorney-general. Although the report was delivered in person by L. C. Westerfield, one of the clerks of the commission, at the department of justice and the treasury (report of civil service committee to house of representatives, fifty-second congress, report No. 1,669, page 59), the attorney-general stated that he never knew anything of it until nine months after, when the matter was investigated by congress. The solicitor-general had never looked upon the testimony as calling for action! (Id. pp. 40, 41.) Secretary Foster says: "Upon inquiry at the department I find that probably about the time that this report was printed, a copy was sent to the department. It so happened that I never saw it, and we can not find it at the department." (Id., p. 18.)

WANAMAKER COMPLAISANT.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker, however, saw the copy which was sent to him. One would suppose that such a report would call for energetic action, not only by the department of justice, whose duty it was to prosecute the offenders and dismiss the marshal and his guilty subordinates, but also by the postmaster-general, to whose department most of the culprits belonged. But not a single one of these violators of the laws was removed or punished for his misconduct.

On April 19, 1892, the house of representatives instructed its select committee on civil service reform to inquire whether these men were still in office or whether any of them had been prosecuted.

Mr. Wanamaker admitted to the committee (Id. page 2), that they were all still in the government service, and that none had been indicted. He had another investigation made by some post-office inspectors of his own, who reported in the following December (four months afterward) that:

"After hearing the evidence from all the witnesses and the accused, and giving the whole subject thoughtful study, and consideration, we are of the opinion that the facts do not justify the dismissal of the twenty-one men, or of any, for violation of the civil service law, as charged. On that report," says he, "no order has been issued for the dismissal of any person. * * * The inspectors making the declaration that in their judgment these men have not violated the civil service law, I have not issued any order for their dismissal, and if it is true, as it must be in most of the cases, if not in all of them, that these men were innocent, it seemed to me that they were sufficiently punished in having charges made against them which were not found on investigation to be sustained by the facts."

Again, "Did I understand you to say that the statements made by these government employes in September to the inspectors who investigated the matter under your instruction differ from the statements made to the civil service commission?"

Answer—"They are totally different in almost all cases."

To this Mr. Roosevelt answers (page 27):

"It is difficult to discuss seriously the proposition that a man when questioned as to something which has just happened will lie to his own hurt and six months afterward tell the truth to his own benefit."

At last the postmaster-general sent to the civil service committee the report of the inspectors appointed by him. The testimony submitted with it (extracts from which are given at great length in the report of the civil service committee, page 66 to 74) show that in spite of their efforts to screen themselves the bulk of the men found guilty by Roosevelt had again confessed the same illegal acts.

The conclusion of this committee was as follows:

"We therefore find that the report of the civil service commission recommending the removal of certain employes in the post-office at Baltimore was well founded; that the postmaster at Baltimore has not removed any of these parties, substantially by direction of the postmaster-general; that the report of the inspectors upon which they were retained is unsupported by the evidence taken by themselves, and indicates either complete ignorance of the provisions of the civil service law or a determination that in this particular case their violation should not be punished."

The key to this disgraceful business is found in the fact that at the Minneapolis convention Postmaster Johnson led a club from Baltimore, and that he and his law-breaking subordinates were among the most active and influential of the supporters of Harrison for re-nomination.

In many other cases contributions were shamelessly demanded from office-holders in plain violation of law, and no man has been punished for it.

The blackmailing of government employes went on two years ago, and is going on to-day as flagrantly as in the time of Congressman Hubbell.

IN THE PENSION BUREAU.

Another illustration of the manner in which the civil service reform law has been enforced by the present administration is furnished by the pension bureau. In the fifty-first congress the Hon. George W. Cooper, a member from Indiana, introduced a resolution to investigate the pension office and conducted the investigation himself. He was renominated for congress, his competitor being J. G. Dunbar, a republican. Raum wanted to beat Cooper and gave Dunbar, his opponent, the privileges of the pension office. For the purpose of making friends of the old soldiers he allowed Dunbar to call up their claims. At that time it was the practice of the office, when claims were thus called up for status, if they were found complete, to carry them forward for adjudication. This was all done just before election to get votes for Dunbar against Cooper. After election neither Raum nor any one else in the office cared anything for the claims of these soldiers, and nothing further was done.

General Rule No. 1, adopted and approved by the President to carry out the civil service laws, provides—

"That any officer in the executive civil service who shall use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or controlling the result thereof shall be dismissed from office."

Yet, in spite of this prostitution of his official place, confessed by the commissioner himself, he still retains control of the pension bureau.

Thus has the President enforced the law and his own regulations made in pursuance of its provisions.

Another part of the promise in the republican platform was this: "All laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed."

The republican party has been in power for four years; for two years it has had control of the senate, the house of representatives, and the executive branch of the government, yet no bill has been passed to repeal any law at variance with the reform legislation referred to in the platform. There has been not the slightest pretense of even attempting to fulfill this explicit promise of the platform.

Another declaration of the republican platform is: "The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments."

This spirit and purpose was to make appointments depend upon proved merit and not upon political considerations.

THE HEADSMEN AT WORK.

The man who has the most extensive appointing power in the civil service is the first assistant postmaster-general. Into his hands are committed all changes in fourth-class postmasterships, not far from 50,000 in number. Whom does the President select to do this work? A man who will conform to civil service reform principles, who will make removals only when the interest of the public service suggests it? He appoints J. S. Clarkson, a politician of the same class as Quay, Platt, and Dudley. Mr. Clarkson has declared in the most public manner, in his speeches (as at Boston), as well as in published articles, his contempt for this service reform. Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles, nor could the President hope for the redemption of his promises by such an agent. Under Clarkson's administration political executions have gone on at a more rapid rate than ever before, and the entire service, including all desirable fourth-class postmasterships, has been substantially changed for political reasons.

Shortly after Mr. Harrison's inauguration he appointed Joel B. Erhardt, a republican politician, collector of the port of New York. Erhardt turned out to be an efficient man, and enforced the civil service regulations so faithfully that the politicians were dissatisfied. But after a while he resigned, and he thus tells the reason of his resignation:

"I have resigned because the collector has been reduced to a position where he is no longer an independent officer with authority commensurate with his responsibility. I have given bonds for $200,000. I have received for the government during the twenty months last past $322,697,135.40, and I am all the time personally responsible for enormous values in money and merchandise. My duties are necessarily performed through about 1,500 employes. I am not willing to be responsible for their conduct unless I can have proper authority over them. The recent policy of the treasury department has been to control the details of the customs administration at the port of New York from Washington, at the dictation of a private individual having no official responsibility. The collector is practically deprived of power and control, while he is left subject to all responsibility. The office is no longer independent and I am. Therefore we have separated."

The private individual referred to was Mr. Thomas C. Platt, the republican boss of the state of New York. In place of Erhardt Mr. Harrison appointed Mr. Fassett, Platt's man, collector. Fassett said when he was appointed that he had no knowledge of the duties of the place.

When Mr. Fassett was sworn in he was presented with a San Domingo cutlass, in barbaric origin and purpose truly emblematic of the spoils system, and with the following legend:

"This cutlass is an instrument of torture to be used in beheading democrats. Use it quickly and success is assured for the republican party.

"Republican directions: Use daily, morning, noon and night until every democratic head is severed. Sure cure for democratic headache."

Fasset had scarcely taken the oath of office when he left the city to take charge of the Platt division in a quarrel in Chemung county. He soon resigned the place to be candidate for governor, for which office he was defeated by a large majority.

But not only has President Harrison thus removed the most efficient men in the service; he has conspicuously appointed those who were most unfit.

* * *

Smiley N. Chambers was appointed by the President, United States district attorney for Indiana, to prosecute offenders against the law. His fitness for this office is shown by his declaration in regard to the famous Dudley letter, "Divide the floaters into blocks of five, and put a trusted man, with necessary funds, in charge of these five, and make him responsible that none get away and all vote our ticket." Of this the public prosecutor, appointed by Mr. Harrison, said in an interview in the Indianapolis Journal of December 13th: "The letters, construed in the light of the knowledge that we all possess of how elections in Indiana are conducted, by both parties, have nothing in them of a criminal character; but, on the other hand, when so construed, are honorable, and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections."

Elliott Sandford was appointed by Cleveland chief justice of the supreme court of Utah. On May 10, 1889, his resignation was demanded. He asked whether he had been accused of misconduct; if charges were preferred against him, it would be improper for him to resign until they were proved or disproved, and the attorney-general answers: "There are on file in this department some papers complaining of the manner in which your judicial duties are discharged. Independently of these particular complaints, however, the President has become satisfied that your administration of the office is not in harmony with the policy he deemed proper to be pursued with reference to Utah affairs, and for this reason he desired to make a change, and out of courtesy gave you an opportunity to resign." Here were charges against a judicial officer which he could neither see nor refute. He was to be removed, however, for not carrying out the policy of the administration. But a judge has no right to carry out any policy. He must interpret and administer the law as he finds it. If a judge of a supreme court could be removed because his policy in interpreting the constitution differed from that of the President, then the two functions of the judiciary and executive departments become merged in one. The independence of the judiciary is one of the most important supports of free government. A President who removes a judge for not doing his political work for him is essentially a tyrant and an autocrat. Judge Sandford's rejoinder was conclusive. It was as follows:

"In reply I have to say that my earnest purpose while on the bench as chief justice of this territory has been to administer justice and the laws honestly and impartially to all men under the obligations of my oath of office. If the President of the United States has any policy which he desires a judge of the supreme court to carry out in reference to Utah affairs other than the one which I have pursued, you may say to him that he has done very well to remove me."

Ernst Nathan, a local republican boss, was appointed internal revenue collector in Brooklyn. William C. Wallace was the republican candidate for congress and William J. Coombs the democratic candidate. Nathan was determined to see that Wallace was elected, and printed the following circular letter:

"BROOKLYN, Oct. 25, 1890.

"DEAR SIR: The Hon. William C. Wallace having been renominated for member of congress for the third district, comprising the seventh, thirteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first and twenty-third wards, and being very much interested in his reelection, I would deem it a personal favor if you would interest yourself among your friends by advocating his election. Respectfully yours,

"ERNST NATHAN."

And in order to enforce the recommendations of this letter among the liquor dealers and cigar manufacturers he had his official stamp placed upon it, as follows: "Ernst Nathan, Collector of Internal Revenue, Oct. 27, 1890. First District, Brooklyn, N. Y." Then he sent these to the liquor dealers and cigar-makers, whom he could continually harass and embarrass by his official action.

Another of President Harrison's appointees was Flanigan, of Texas, a man who passed into happy immortality by his declaration at a national republican convention, "What are we here for if not for the offices?"

SAMPLE APPOINTMENTS.

But, unfortunately, there is still a darker page of this history of official prostitution. David Martin was appointed collector of internal revenue in Pennsylvania. Who was David Martin? He was a man who had become a director of repeaters in the nineteenth ward of Philadelphia. At general elections he directed operations, driving citizens from the polls, sometimes personally assaulting voters without provocation. He had charge of thugs and repeaters in a district where gigantic frauds were perpetrated. On one occasion he took the ballot box to the station, where the returns were changed and the election officers' names were forged. As he could not read or write, he did not personally forge the names, but he aided and abetted the criminal act. At the election for the adoption of the new constitution for Pennsylvania, Martin again had charge of the repeaters of his district. He was one of the managers who made up the returns whereby the nineteenth ward gave 6,000 majority against the new constitution.

One of Martin's tricks was to arm his "heelers" with short, sharp awls with which to prod adverse electors until they abandoned the attempt to vote. Martin, however, was one of Quay's subordinates and henchmen. When his appointment was suggested, Mr. McManis protested against it in person to President Harrison. He denounced Martin as a ruffian and a manipulator of ballot boxes. Quay was present at the interview. His answer to the charges was that two senators from Pennsylvania desired his appointment. A memorial to the President was drawn and signed by Joel J. Bailey of the citizens' municipal league protesting against the appointment, and evidence in support of the charges was adduced, but as the messenger bearing this protest was on his way to the post-office he read on the bulletin the statement that Martin was appointed.

Otis H. Russell, appointed as postmaster at Richmond, Va., had been collector of customs under Arthur, and special agents of the treasury had reported a shortage of over $800 in his accounts.

R. H. Paul was appointed marshal of Arizona. Five years before he had been defeated for election as sheriff, but secured a recount which gave him a majority. The polls had been tampered with and Paul and his accomplices were indicted. Two of them confessed, but as Paul surrendered the sheriff's office, the proceedings were nollied. A certified copy of the court proceedings was sent to the department of justice.

The President sent to the senate the name of George P. Fisher as first auditor of the treasury. This was the man of whom the New York Tribune says: "While he was district attorney in Washington his office was the chief bulwark of the district ring. There were hatched conspiracies to convict innocent citizens of felony, plots to get rid of witnesses, and schemes to take burglars out of jail. Public opinion would not tolerate Fisher's appearance in the safe conspiracy trial, and after some miserable revelations of the misconduct of his office, the President was obliged to call for his resignation." General Grant afterward nominated him as United States district attorney for Delaware, but was compelled to withdraw the nomination. Yet, under Harrison, this man is nominated by the senate and confirmed to this important office.

William R. Leeds was appointed in March, 1891, marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania. He was one of Quay's tools in Philadelphia, the leader of the worst republican ring that the city had ever known. He was repudiated by his party in 1887, when he ran as candidate for sheriff, running more than 25,000 votes behind his ticket. Even the Philadelphia Press declares: "It is an appointment which should never have been made, and it will deeply disappoint the President's best friends in Pennsylvania."

Governor Warmoth's unsavory reputation is national. The New York Tribune said of him December 28, 1874: "That his administration as governor was corrupt and bad is unfortunately true." The best part of the republican press in the north has long repudiated Warmoth. He was one of the black spots in the reconstruction period. He killed a man in New Orleans under the gravest suspicion of murder. He was charged by the lieutenant-governor of the state with trying to bribe him with an offer of $50,000 and unlimited appointments in the fight with Kellogg in 1872. He went into the governorship poor, and came out a rich man after a scandalously extravagant administration. All these facts, and many more, have been brought to the attention of President Harrison and to the senate.

Warmoth has been appointed to the collectorship of the port of New Orleans. The position has a salary of $7,000 a year. The office is under civil service rules, and it is the sixth custom-house in size in the United States.

The cabinet itself has not been secure from corrupt appointments, as Mr. Wanamaker got his place in consideration of the corruption fund which he raised, and it is not a violent presumption to infer that Stephen B. Elkins was appointed for like services to be rendered in the future. Elkins is immensely rich and has been a most successful money-getter. His political reputation is most unsavory. He was mixed up with land-grant scandals of past republican administrations. He was an honored guest of the "soap" banquet in 1880, and his appointment was regarded by Brady as a vindication of those who were connected with the star-route scandals, which have become infamous in our political history. Clarkson said that in the campaign of four years ago "he carried with him the promises made by Mr. Harrison." * * *

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

This devotion of party, not to the ends for which it exists, but to the spoils that accompany success at the polls, has become so absolute that it has produced an evil greater than any which party proposes to remedy.—George William Curtis, at Baltimore, April, 1892.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

Public officials are the agents of the people. It is, therefore, their duty to secure for those whom they represent the best and most efficient performance of public work. This plainly can be best accomplished by regarding ascertained fitness in the selection of government employes. These considerations alone are sufficient justification for an honest adherence to the letter and spirit of civil-service reform. There are, however, other features of this plan which abundantly commend it. Through its operation worthy merit in every station and condition of American life is recognized in the distribution of public employment, while its application tends to raise the standard of political activity from spoils-hunting and unthinking party affiliation to the advocacy of party principles by reason and argument.—Cleveland's Letter of Acceptance.

ELSEWHERE will be found the report made to the chairman of the committee of the National League, showing the results of an investigation of the interference of federal office-holders in primaries, conventions and elections in Indiana during this administration. It shows in still stronger light, what was already well known, that the Harrison delegates to the Minneapolis convention from Indiana were not the choice of the republican party. If his office-holders had given no more attention to his re-nomination than they gave for instance to the nomination of candidates for the county offices in their respective counties, he would not have had half of the delegates from this state. As it was he only got all of them by the most desperate efforts of his office-holders, who literally seized primaries and conventions.

THE campaign in this state still remains "dead." The people are not listening to the tariff discussion. They view with apparent unconcern the most dismal forebodings of tariff or non-tariff calamities that campaign orators can picture. There is one vital fact. The democrats have found a large number of voters who voted for Harrison four years ago and who will vote against him now; they have also found a large number of voters who decline to say how they will vote. These do not go to political meetings. Under the new ballot act, which is the most beneficent law ever made in Indiana, they will cast unhampered votes.

THE only thing which could have put life into the campaign would have been a discussion at every cross-roads of President Harrison's revolutionary civil service record. The democrats have kept out this discussion to the unbounded relief of the republicans, who in this matter are absolutely helpless. The situation is a reminder of the situation about 1850, described by Mr. Julian in his life of Giddings, where both party machines sought to divide the people upon economic questions in the expectation that the slavery question would be forgotten. The great question in American politics to-day is the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the prostitution of the civil service to partisan and particularly to personal ends. This question will not be suppressed.

THOSE who are insisting that all other questions shall wait until the tariff question is "settled" are asking a great deal. In the North American Review for October, Senator Vest says of that question:

The same issue that disrupted the cabinet of Washington in 1793 and caused Jefferson to surrender his portfolio as secretary of state, aligns the two great parties in the pending canvass. * * * * * Through all the mutations of American politics, though often obscured and interrupted by sectional and financial questions, this great controversy has marked the dividing line between the democratic party and its adversaries.

This has been going on something like a hundred years. Will another hundred be long enough to settle it?

EVIDENTLY Mr. Adlai Stevenson has not grown wiser. In introducing him at a meeting near Hamilton, Ohio, recently, ex-Governor Campbell in defining "a vigorous and true democrat" said, that as a favor to him Stevenson had decapitated sixty-five republican postmasters in two minutes. Stevenson then said that he considered that the highest compliment he had ever received. Some men are gratified by things in every way little. These two worthies would do well to read the platform upon which they are now standing.

AN attempt has been made to interest college students in the campaign. They ought to be interested in it. They could not do a more profitable work than to investigate the composition, acts, and surroundings of the Minneapolis convention. From this point they should go back to the various state and district conventions which chose the Minneapolis delegates. Then they should study the manipulation of the primaries and conventions which chose the state and district delegates. From all of these the manipulating strings lead straight to federal officers and on to President Harrison at Washington. Then these students should ask themselves whether there are any dangers to free institutions lurking in the power of official patronage. If so, what are those dangers?

HOWEVER much the administration in general shirks its duty, the civil service commission does not. In September Mr. Roosevelt found a regular system of blackmail in practice by republican campaign committees upon the Indian service, including teachers, mostly women and helpers, mostly Indians. He at once publicly notified the employes that they need not give unless they chose, and even then could give to whatever party they preferred. President Harrison and Secretary Noble give no support to this, but look on in silence. Again, the Michigan republican state committee called upon postmasters for the names of "from eight to twelve discreet and trustworthy young republicans," and asked the postmasters to keep the matter secret. The commission notified Wanamaker, and he responded, not by a special warning to Michigan postmasters that dismissal would follow any service to the committee such as he would give unless he wanted them to help out the republicans, but by writing to the commission that he can not help such attempts, but that there is an order against giving information gained "in the discharge of official duties," and asks the commission for evidence of a violation of this order. A postmaster-general who wanted to find violations of this order would set his inspectors at work.

Since the above was written Wanamaker has discovered that the order above referred to has been violated. He does not dismiss the culprits; but after a public outcry, and after the mischief is done, he issues a warning to postmasters that they must not do it.

IN answer to our Greensburgh correspondent, whose letter is elsewhere, we say that the CHRONICLE editorials have not expressed "all-abiding faith" in the democratic party, as our correspondent declares. That party, four years hence, may have to be beaten for the very reason for which President Harrison ought to be beaten now. In the face of the present and the worst prostitution of the federal service that has ever been known, it is useless to point to what the democrats have heretofore done. Mr. Foulke did not speak for Mr. Cleveland and against Blaine in 1884. Mr. Cleveland was justly defeated in 1883, for the reason that he had not withstood his party spoilsmen; but it does not follow that he should be defeated a second time for the same reason, while Harrison, who did not "yield" to the spoils element of his party, but invited it to come on and share in the loot, is re-elected. It is true that Harrison has had unstinted criticism, but our correspondent could not have lived in Indiana from 1885 to 1889 if he means to intimate that Cleveland did not have the same. It is easy to say that criticism is unfair, but if the remark is expected to have any weight, cases must be specified. It would be well to point out the unfairness of criticising the appointment of Wanamaker for raising a large campaign fund; the appointment of Elkins to detach him from Blaine; the refusal to retain Pearson, Graves, Corse, and Saltonstall; the distribution of a valuable block of offices among relatives; the subsidizing of the press condemned by Webster and by William Henry Harrison; the work of Headsman Clarkson; the loot of the Indian service; the turning of the Virginia offices over to Mahone, the Pennsylvania to Quay, the New York to Platt; the refusal to let the civil service commission apply competition to the census bureau; the same refusal as to offices having twenty-five employees; the promotion of indicted office-holders; indifference to the prosecution of violators of the civil service law; the refusal to dismiss confessed criminals in the Baltimore post-office; the general failure to keep the promises of the platform; the personal use of the civil service by President Harrison to secure renomination; and his connection with the Minneapolis convention. His party did not "honor" him with a re-nomination. He is not the nominee of his party. His nomination was brought about by the seizure of primaries and conventions by his office-holders. Tammany is a bad institution. It is one with Platt's republican machine in New York, and they now seem to be in a deal together.

To support Harrison, a civil service reformer would have to change his principles; the only way he can be consistent is to oppose Harrison. Stevenson and Clarkson are as near alike as two peas, but the former will not be first-assistant post-master-general.

Judging from the unbroken past, may a merciful providence protect the country against a president who feels "the restraining influence of an ambition for a re-election." President Harrison has not kept his pledge to extend the reform system established by law to all offices to which it is applicable, nor has he observed the spirit and purpose of the reform in his executive appointments. He has used the service for his personal ambition. The question of Mr. Julian's speech is the facts. If they are true, Harrison ought to be defeated. Our correspondent does not deny a single fact. It is no answer to charge personal pique.

HENRY CABOT LODGE, in a recent speech at Brookline, addressed himself to the subject of civil service reform, a notable matter considering the present otherwise silent helplessness of his party. Even Mr. Lodge does not undertake the least defense of President Harrison, but attempts a diversion by way of comparison with Mr. Cleveland. The question, however, is whether Harrison's course can be in any way defended. If it can not, and Mr. Lodge seems so to admit, he deserves defeat. Mr. Lodge's comparison does not need further attention except to notice some of the facts by which he tries to sustain it. Mr. Lodge is right that the civil service commission is the best we have ever had and that it has done its duty admirably. But he omits to say that this commission has been a thorn in Harrison's side. He knows the astounding words with which Harrison met the request to prosecute the Mahone blackmailers. He omits to state that Harrison refused to allow the commission to apply competition to the census bureau, or to extend the classified service, except to 700 places in the Indian service and 132 places in the fish commission. He is compelled to "regret" that no one was punished at Baltimore, but his severe feeling because the civil service papers did not warm up at the bad condition found by Mr. Roosevelt to have existed at Baltimore under Mr. Cleveland is like trying to raise sympathy for a thief because some other thief stole years ago. Mr. Lodge knows very well that all that can be said for Harrison's attitude toward the commission is that he has not removed its members for doing their duty.

In speaking of the classification of the railway mail service Mr. Lodge omits to state that President Harrison tricked the law and in violation of its spirit displaced more than 2,000 members of that service in six weeks for partisan reasons. The action of Secretary Tracy with the navy-yards is improved administration, but it is not permanent reform. The next secretary may disregard it entirely. Where has the President recommended that it be made permanent by law? Mr. Lodge sums up by stating that "Cleveland took out of politics and placed under the reformed civil service system in round numbers 5,000 places and President Harrison in round numbers 10,250." To this we make the plain and specific answer that President Harrison has taken out of politics and placed under the reform system just 832 places and no more.

As to places not embraced within the civil service law, Mr. Lodge denies the right, for instance, to criticise the loot of 50,000 fourth-class post-offices after the Clarkson method. He has apparently never read that part of the republican platform which said that the spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments. He mentions and favors an admirable bill designed to take these offices out of politics. Has he noted Harrison's silence as to this bill and has he read Wanamaker's report upon it?

INTERFERENCE OF INDIANA FEDERAL OFFICE-HOLDERS IN PRIMARIES, CONVENTIONS AND ELECTIONS.

To Moorfield Storey, Esq., Chairman of the committee appointed by the President of the National League of Civil Service Reform Associations to investigate and report upon the interference of federal office-holders in primaries, conventions and elections, under the present National Administration:

Sir: The following is my report of the matters within the object of this committee, and pertaining to the state of Indiana:

A clear understanding of the bearing of the labors of the Indiana office-holders in the management of the republican party machine during this administration can not be had without a brief preliminary statement of the original distribution of spoil by President Harrison. Under their platform it was to be expected that the republicans would have abstained from looting the offices; having, however, disregarded their promises any course was to be expected, and that, in turning the federal patronage to the personal behoof of the President, they took the worst and most dangerous, is not a matter for surprise.

There have been and are a large number of Indiana republicans not favorable to General Harrison. These in a general way have favored Judge Gresham. The feeling has always been intense, but the reasons for this preference of leadership are not within the province of this report.

President Harrison has given his personal attention either directly or through trusted agents to the distribution of the Indiana patronage. One of the cardinal principles seems to have been to leave out every unrepentant Gresham man, or, if this rule was overstepped, to make the gift so insignificant as to be valueless to the recipient. A case of this kind was the appointment of William H. Calkins to a judgeship in Washington Territory just previous to its admission as a state. The only exceptions to this ungracious giving have been where it was possible to bring the recipient over to the Harrison interest. For instance, Marcus L. Sulzer, of Madison, was in opposition, but after a few months enjoyment of a special Indian agency given him by Harrison, he declared the latter the only man whom the republicans could afford to nominate.

Another rule of distribution which he who runs may read was the rewarding of delegates who supported General Harrison in the convention of 1888. Examples of this kind of important dignity or great emolument are the following:

John C. New, consul-general at London, (whose perquisites are admitted to amount to over $40,000 a year.)

W. L. Dunlap, United States marshal of Indiana.

Smiley N. Chambers, United States district attorney for Indiana.

John B. Cockrum, deputy United States district attorney for Indiana.

Albert G. Porter, minister to Italy.

E. W. Halford, private secretary.

James N. Huston, treasurer of the United States.

Marine D. Tackett, special Indian land agent.

A. K. Sills, special swamp land agent.

— Knisley, Columbia City, special internal revenue collector in Tennessee.

A. C. Bearss, Peru, chief clerk railway mail service.

Newspapers have been systematically subsidized. The following are instances of the gift of post-offices taken from all parts of the state:

S. M. Noyes, Echo, Akron.

J. P. Prickett, New Era, Albion.

J. P. Clugate, Union, Sullivan.

L. H. Beyerle, Times, Goshen.

Ed. Charles, Record, Carthage.

Isaac Jenkinson, Palladium, Richmond.

Thad. Butler, Herald, Huntington.

W. F. Voght, Spence's People's Paper, Covington.

W. E. Knight, Monitor, Grand View.

C. E. Newton, Herald, Kewanna.

John H. Rarick, Standard, LaGrange.

M. L. Enyart, Monitor, Maey.

G. W. Fountain, Gazette, New Carlisle.

J. P. Carr, Tribune, Oxford.

C. B. Cady, Republican, Pendleton.

J. W. Siders, Republican, Plymouth.

A. L. Lawshe, Journal, Zenia.

E. J. Marsh, Commercial, Portland.

J. J. Wheeler, Lake County Star, Crown Point.

In the distribution of the fourth-class postmasterships and other spoils small in size but great in number, the personal supervision of the President clashed with the assumed prerogative of Indiana republican congressmen. Of the personal supervision the complaints were steady and bitter. In the case of Congressman Cheadle there was an open rupture, and the administration forces successfully opposed Cheadle's renomination in 1890. In this distribution for a while the general agency of Mr. Huston, chairman of the republican state committee, was used. He soon became United States treasurer and was succeeded by L. T. Michener, then the attorney-general of Indiana, and now the partner of Dudley, the author of the "blocks-of-five letter." Mr. Michener has always been an untiring and in the closest degree a trusted agent of General Harrison. Of this particular work he said:

"When I became chairman of the state central committee, the assignment of such fourth-class post-offices as remained in democratic hands in democratic congressional districts was put into my hands."

How promptly Mr. Michener went to the point is illustrated by the case at Freedom, Owen county, Indiana. The post-office there was held by a one-legged soldier named Sufall, who had performed his duties satisfactorily. A strenuous attempt to have him retained was euded by the following from Mr. Michener:

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL, }
INDIANAPOLIS, IND. }

W. W. Hart, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR HART—We have decided that Frank Watts should be appointed postmaster at Freedom, Owen county.

Please have it attended to at once. You may put this on file as a recommendation.

Yours truly,

L. T. MICHENER,

In the early part of this administration there was little for the office-holders to do. The administration was busy with the distribution and the favored ones were engaged in the enjoyment of their shares, or possibly in helping others less fortunate. For instance, in July, 1889, the Franklin Star says that United States Marshal Dunlap asked Brown, the democratic postmaster of that city, to resign; and in the same month the Evansville Journal said of United States District Attorney Chambers, "There was no occasion for Chambers to go on sundry pilgrimages to Indianapolis and Washington in order to prejudice the authorities against Adams." After the election of 1888, there was no general election in Indiana until 1890. Ordinarily in the off year federal office-holders are mostly occupied in helping congressmen to renomination, but in 1890, in Indiana, there was little occasion for such service, except in the case of Cheadle, and he was deprived of it. There was, however, a constant fear of the Gresham men, and the attention of the office-holders was directed to every incident which would have a bearing on the desired renomination of President Harrison. It was important that the state committee should be friendly to him and that the state convention should endorse him. The new state committee was chosen in January, 1890, by district conventions. An entirely reliable informant who had personal knowledge of the facts, wrote me at the time:

At the various district conventions the federal office-holders, particularly the postmasters, were very prominent. In one district, the third, in which the administration, through Michener, was very anxious to win, Postmaster Ridland, of Scottsburg, a recent appointee, was compelled to change the vote of his county from the man of his choice to Michener's candidate. Postmaster Godfrey, of New Albany, was a delegate to that convention and worked actively for Carter, the Michener candidate, for committee-man. But for the official pressure brought to bear in that convention, Carter would not have received one-third the vote.

The efforts of the office-holders failed, for the state committee then selected was unmistakably anti-Harrison and continued so for a year.

With regard to the congressional nomination in Cheadle's district, the same informant says:

In the ninth congressional district contest for the nomination, Mr. La Follette, superintendent of public instruction, was backed by Chairman Michener and all the patronage. B. Wilson Smith, postmaster at La Fayette, was particularly active in Mr. La Follette's behalf. Postal clerk Hack helped out, but in spite of all, La Follette was beaten.

The industry of the office-holders throughout the state up to the time of the state convention in Sept., 1890, ran about like the following instances taken from Indianapolis:

David Wallace, head of the money order department in the post-office, was a delegate to all conventions. Deputy United States Marshal Conway and Deputy Collector Schmidt were delegates to all conventions and members of the republican county committee. Deputy Collector Saulcy, proudly spoken of as "a hustler from way back," was a member of the county committee.

At the state convention in September, there was a determined and persistent attempt, led entirely by federal office-holders, to secure from the convention an approval of President Harrison. The following are the names of some of these leaders out of a list of forty: Postmaster Higgins, of Fort Wayne; Postmaster Smith, of Lafayette; Postmaster Greiner, of Terre Haute; Postmaster Bennett, of Evansville; Postmaster Crockett, of South Bend; Postmaster Thompson, of Logansport, and Postmaster DeMotte, of Valparaiso.

The attempt was generally regarded as a failure. While in words the convention did approve of the President's administration, this declaration was nullified by other parts of the platform. It was known that the convention was hostile to the President and it left in bad shape matters bearing upon his renomination. It did not seem possible that he could secure a united delegation from Indiana.

In the campaign which followed, leading up to the November election, the club of Indiana office-holders at Washington made its usual demonstration. Every Indiana republican in the government service at Washington received a demand for money to defray the campaign expenses, signed by W. W. Curry as agent for the Indiana state committee. This demand contains the following:

"There are two classes who are always ready to cry out against such contributions—those whose meanness seeks an excuse for refusing to aid in securing the success of the party of which they are the beneficiaries, and those whose consciousness of their own corruptness makes them able to charge corrupt motives on others." Also the following: "You can not be solicited at your places of official duty, but outside those you can confer and contribute as you please. The civil service laws are designed to protect you in the full exercise of your rights—not to convert you into political eunuchs."

The office-holders themselves appeared in all parts of the state. For instance the Indianapolis News of October 17, 1890, says:

This is about the time when all the Indianians employed in the government departments at Washington come home for a vacation. The Indianapolis contingent has begun to arrive. Gus Shaw, who is influential with railroad men, has been here several weeks getting the "boys" into line. The first of next week all the Indianapolis republicans who have positions at the capitol are expected here.

The Indianapolis Journal reports twenty-five Indiana office-holders as having gone home as early as October 16. Among others who came were Harry McFarland, of the government printing office, notorious for his influence among the lowest voting element in Indianapolis, and D. N. Ransdell, marshal of the District of Columbia, who is the President's right hand political manager. These and scores of others appearing from all parts of the country did not come merely to vote, but they came days and weeks before the election and put in the time "hustling" for the party. The efforts of these and of the office-holders located in Indiana supplemented each other. For instance, Postmaster Higgins, of Ft. Wayne, and his chief deputy headed the petition for federal supervisors.

After the overwhelming defeat at the November election in 1890, the internal struggle in the party again broke out. In order to secure re-nomination, President Harrison had to have every delegate from Indiana. It seemed impossible of accomplishment. The state committee and certain districts in the state were thoroughly against him. The federal office-holders addressed themselves to this task. The meeting of the state committee in January, 1891, first required attention. A new chairman was to be chosen in place of Michener, who had moved to Washington. It was highly important that the new chairman should be in the President's interest. The committee met at the Denison hotel, at Indianapolis. William T. Steele, governor of Oklahoma territory, and Warren G. Sayre, an Indian land commissioner, both from Indiana, and Russell B. Harrison, the President's son, appeared at the meeting with other office-holders and in some manner turned a hostile majority into a minority.

About this time the Indianapolis correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette (rep.) thus stated the situation with regard to the opposition to Harrison in this state:

In the postmasters, postal agents, revenue men and other federal employes throughout the state, the administration has what you might term an army of agents and detectives, and any suspicious move on the part of a prominent anti-administration man is promptly reported to headquarters and his movements are watched, and the antidote is promptly applied for any mischief that may be set brewing. In general terms you may set it down that the President is nearly as well informed as to what is going on in the camp of his enemies as his enemies themselves, and when the time comes he will show his hand.

In June of that year O. E. Mohler, editor of the Ft. Wayne Gazette, declared that there were no Harrison republicans in Allen county outside of the office-holding ring. The Gazette and the Evansville Journal, both important papers, were strong leaders of the opposition to Harrison. It must be said, however, that the subsidized press was very faithful and active in his interest, and it is believed that in no case, from the time the subsidy was received until the present, can there be found in any column of these papers anything but laudation and praise of their benefactor. If the President's administration has had any faults, these papers have in consideration overlooked them.

A new state committee was to be chosen in January, 1892, and this enlisted the attention of the President's office-holders. The selection was by congressional districts and the work was done there. We find Marshal Ransdell in December, 1891, at Lebanon and Frankfort, fixing the ninth district. The fourth district was close, but Collector John O. Cravens and his deputies, together with the postmasters, turned the scale in favor of Harrison. Whenever the Harrison men could bring it about, they had the delegates for the district conventions, and for every other convention, for that matter, chosen by primaries rather than by mass conventions in order that the fourth-class postmasters and the other small office-holders might work more efficiently and secretly. In the Indianapolis district Deputy Collector Harvey presided at the fourth ward primary and Postmaster Thompson, post-office clerks Dave Wallace, Shel Woodward, Billy Leonard, Bill Davis, Clint Lowe and Marshall C. Woods, Deputy Collector Saulcy, Warehouseman Nolan, Deputy Marshals Moore and Conway and Superintendent of Mails, Billy Patterson, and Superintendent of Carriers Craft, are examples of a large number of federal office-holders who bent their best and highly skilled energies to the manipulation of these primaries.

The delegates to the various district conventions met to elect the members of the state committee. In the tenth district the meeting was at Logansport, January 20. Two national bank examiners, thirty-seven postmasters, three post-office inspectors, a pension agent and a number of mail carriers were in attendance. Among others, were Postmaster De Motte of Valparaiso and his son-in-law, a post-office inspector. At the convention of the eleventh district, held at Wabash, January 20, the resolutions warmly indorsing President Harrison were reported by a committee of which Indian Land Commissioner Sayre was chairman.

The result of these combined efforts was the choice of a state committee favorable to Harrison. The new committee met at Indianapolis, January 28. Among other office-holders who crowded into the same room to oversee the proceedings, were the following: Postmaster Thompson of Indianapolis, Postmaster Higgins of Fort Wayne, Postmaster Greiner of Terre Haute, Postmaster Godfrey of New Albany, Postmaster Ellis of Muncie, Postmaster Crockett of South Bend, Postmaster Bennett of Warsaw, Postmaster Byerly of Goshen, Postmaster Smith of Lafayette, Postmaster Fearis of Union, Postmaster Hendricks of Greensburgh, Postmaster Tichner of Princeton, District Attorney Chambers, Assistant Cockrum, Marshal Dunlap, Collector Cravens, Deputy Collector Harvey and Pension Agent Ensley.

The selection of delegates to the Minneapolis convention was the next step to be taken. There were four delegates at large and two from each congressional district. Under the circumstances only the most consummate skill and the most diligent application of every force could secure the entire delegation for Harrison.

The seventh or Indianapolis district was a vital point and the struggle was long and bitter. Postmaster Thompson exercised to the utmost all of his well known skill as a primary and convention manipulator. The evidence seems clear that in some of the primaries at Indianapolis, the Administration was in a minority, but its friends got up contesting delegations and these were admitted to seats in the convention. At the district convention following, it was openly charged by delegates on the floor that such frauds had been perpetrated, and in addition that federal office-holders had used money to secure the choice of delegates for Harrison, who were then sitting in the convention. In one primary the Harrison men had nine men while the opposition had 118 by actual count. Nevertheless half of the Harrison delegates were admitted to seats. One of those who seemed to have particular charge of the matter in the Indianapolis district was Mr. Stanton J. Peelle. He gave it careful attention at all points, and on the day of the primary in his own ward, which was also the President's ward, he personally solicited voters to attend, saying, "They will down Ben if his friends don't turn out." Soon after the selection of Indiana delegates unanimous for Harrison, Mr. Peelle, himself a delegate, was appointed judge of the court of claims. The juxtaposition of the extremely valuable services rendered by Mr. Peelle, and the extremely valuable gift made to him is unpleasant. His place as delegate was taken by his alternate.

Robert Metzger, of Indianapolis, makes the following statement:

I have been republican committeeman of what is now the tenth ward in Indianapolis for four years in the last six and a member of the county committee two years. The tenth is in the central part of the city and is one of the most important wards. Before the district convention, which met in January, 1892, at Indianapolis, to select a member of the state committee, J. W. Hess, who was a Harrison candidate, asked me to support him, and said that if he were chosen and Harrison was re-elected he would have control of patronage and would remember his friends.

A colored man named "Doc" Wilson had always worked with me and had been one of my most reliable friends. At the tenth ward primary, which was held to choose delegates to the district convention which was to choose Minneapolis delegates, Wilson was detached from me, and he has since told me how it happened. He said he had a family to support and it was a matter of money with him. That before the primary was held Hess came to him and told him that Metzger, meaning me, would have a majority at the primaries and it was useless to buck against him, but to be there with his crowd, and no matter what the majority did, to hold another primary and choose delegates and they would be recognized, and that he, Wilson, would be taken care of. I was opposed to the renomination of Harrison, and was working for anti-Harrison delegates. Wilson came to the primary and mustered just eight men, while I had 118. My ticket went through first by acclamation, but the Wilson crowd called out that there were democrats in the room, and a ballot was therefore taken, which resulted in 118 for my ticket to two against it.

The same primary also elected me a member of the republican county committee and the credentials of the delegates were signed by the secretary of the primary and by me as chairman. After this meeting had adjourned, Wilson and his crowd stayed behind to hold another. Not more than thirty people remained in the room and a large part of these were spectators. They persuaded our secretary to act as secretary of their meeting and elected Griffin chairman, and then choose delegates to the district convention. They also named Griffin for the county committee.

Afterwards the county committee met to decide on the contesting committeemen. The county committee was for Harrison. Before the meeting "Doc" Wilson came to me and said if I would let the district delegation go, they would give me the county committeemanship. I refused. When the committee met I was there with twelve or fourteen witnesses, while the Wilson crowd had three. The county committee said that their time was taken up and they could only hear three witnesses on a side. Deputy United States Marshal Conway was there a member of the committee, and I said to him: "You know that I was squarely elected down there." He answered: "Well, Bob, you know how it is in these things. Those who are not with us are against us." He then made a motion to appoint a committee to hear the testimony. He was made chairman of the committee and after hearing three witnesses on a side, the committee reported that Griffin was chosen and the county committee adopted the report.

When the district convention was held, the tenth ward contest was referred to a committee of which Ross Hawkins was chairman. Hawkins is one of the Slick Six and is a desperate Harrison man.

He went through the form of hearing testimony, and then reported in favor of dividing the delegation three and three, which was done. Wilson was afterwards appointed to a place in the railway mail service as weigher of mails.

Afterwards Stanton J. Peelle, now judge of the court of claims, asked me about supporting Layman as delegate to the Minneapolis convention. He brought up the subject of the tenth ward trouble and asked me why I was against Harrison. After some talk, he said, "Metzger, what do you want?" with a look and tone which I understood to signify what reward I wanted to cease opposing Harrison. I said I wanted justice.

In the twelfth or Fort Wayne district the federal office-holders won their most signal victory. The convention was held at Auburn, March 3. The Courier of that place speaks of it as "the district meeting of republican postmasters." Robert T. McDonald, in his appeal to the national republican committee, says: "The whole proceedings were dominated by a tyrannical office holders' machine." The following are part of the postmasters who were present from a single county, DeKalb: Pronner, of Spencerville; Gordon, of Auburn; Bicknell, of Garrett; Ables of St. Joe Station; Crane, of Sedan; Bachman, of Carrunna, and Jones, of Butler. It is within the facts to say that by no possibility could Harrison delegates been chosen in this district without the most strenuous efforts of these hundreds of office-holders. The same is undoubtedly true of at least several other districts.

The state convention which selected the delegates at large met at Indianapolis, March 1. It was presided over by Land Commissioner Sayre. When a delegate undertook to speak against a resolution indorsing Harrison, Assistant District Attorney Cockrum interfered and insisted that "this is a republican convention and not a place where a man can come loaded with personal and bile and spit it out." But Deputy Marshal Conway, with just confidence in the Harrison machine, said: "A republican who is against Harrison is a novelty, and I move we hear him through."

Practically all of the leading and a large number of the minor office-holders of Indiana attended the Minneapolis convention, and rarely have office-holders enjoyed greater notoriety. Consul-General New came from London, denying that he came to manage the canvass of President Harrison. He then went to Washington and spent most of a day conferring with the President, Elkins, Rathbone and others. Then he went to Minneapolis and for many days and nights managed the President's canvass. Marshal Ransdell, River Commissioner Taylor, Collector Hildebrand, Marshal Dunlap, Pension Agent Ensley, District Attorney Chambers, Assistant District Attorney Cockrum, Postmaster Thompson, of Indianapolis, and three of his assistants, Wallace, Woodward and Patterson; Postmasters Smith, of Lafayette; Higgins, of Fort Wayne, and Greiner, of Terre Haute, were among those at Minneapolis to whose efforts the President owes his renomination. One kind of official effort which made for this renomination is illustrated by the following undoubtedly correct dispatches, the "Rhody" referred to being Roger R. Shiel, a prominent republican "Boy" of Indianapolis:

For the first time the Columbia Club went wild for Benjamin. Rhody was lifted upon the shoulders of U. S. Marshal Dunlap and Postmaster Thompson and carried through the lobby at the head of the procession, which the Columbians instantly formed. Rhody waved a huge picture of Harrison at the end of a fifteen-foot pole. For fifteen minutes the Columbians circled about Rhody and Ben's picture like Indian ghost dancers singing:

Every mother's son from Maine to Oregon
Is a son of a gun if he don't vote for Harrison.

Suddenly Rhody jumped off the shoulders of Dunlap and Thompson and made a dash for a colored delegate who happened to be so unfortunate as to catch Shiel's eagle eye. Placing his arm around the negro's neck, Rhody disappeared toward the bar and the ghost dance broke up. Then a quartet, consisting of Bruce Carr, O. H. Tripp, of North Vernon, Postmaster De Motte of Valparaiso, and Postmaster Greiner of Terre Haute, went from one street corner to another repeating the refrain of the song, "Every mother's son," etc.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, June 9.

United States Marshal Ransdell will go to Minneapolis to help out Harrison.—Washington Dispatch to Courier-Journal, May 27.

Dan Ransdell [marshal District of Columbia] said: "We are in excellent shape, and I firmly believe the President will be nominated on the first ballot. The opposition has the noise here to-night, but we have the votes."—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 7.

E. W. Halford, Washington, D. C.:

The Harrison delegates have just had a meeting in Market Hall, presided over by Chauncey M. Depew. A roll-call by states showed 521 votes for the President, not counting contested seats. He will be nominated at the first opportunity to ballot.

D. M. RANSELL.

[Marshal District of Columbia.]

—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 9.

B. W. Smith, postmaster of La Fayette, Ind., talked warmly for Harrison, and it is astonishing how many Harrison votes the letter of resignation made in La Fayette yesterday.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 6.

Higgins is postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., and Greiner is postmaster at Terre Haute. Higgins is for Harrison; Greiner is supposed to be for Blaine, and wears a Blaine badge. Higgins meets Greiner, falls into an argument with him about the merits of the candidates, and Greiner is convinced, takes off his Blaine badge, and becomes a Harrison convert. This happens several times a day in localities discreetly selected.—New York Times, June 6.

After the Minneapolis convention still another state convention drew upon federal official energies. This met at Fort Wayne, July 27, 1892, for the nomination of state officers. The administration opposed the renomination of Governor Chase, the chief argument used being that the railroad men would not vote for him. To put this argument in shape A. D. Shaw, deputy third auditor of the treasury, gave a great deal of time during a month's absence from Washington. He had been the chief organizer of railroad men for General Harrison in 1888. At Fort Wayne he was assisted by Deputy Marshals Moore and Conway, and Deputy Collectors Mount and Saulcy. Another movement in the opposition to Chase was the candidacy of District Attorney Chambers, backed by another group of office-holders, chief of whom were his assistant Cockrum and Marshal Dunlap. Chase was nominated.

The following particular instances of the industry of President Harrison's office-holders in his behalf are given in further illustration and proof of what has been said:

Pensioner Examiner Drayer, and Postmaster Cable, of Hartford City, worked for Harrison delegates, and attended the convention at Bluffton, to select them.

A reliable report from the Lawrenceburgh district says: "The entire revenue force of this district were actively engaged in securing delegates to elect George M. Roberts, brother-in-law of Revenue Collector Cravens, as district delegate to the Minneapolis convention." Collector John O. Cravens and a number of his force attended the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Lneas, of Lawrenceburgh, and United States Storekeeper Sortwell, have been workers in primaries and conventions.

Postmaster Hudson, of Corydon, has attended state, congressional and county conventions.

Postmaster Shaw, and his deputy Long, of Vevay, are active political workers.

Postmaster Simpson, of Lamb, and Postmaster Langsdale, of Florence, have been active in selecting delegates and in conventions.

Amos Hartman, postmaster at Columbus, went to the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Stevens, at Pern, Postmaster Fite, at Denver, Postmaster Lawshe, at Xenia, take part in all local federal politics.

Post-office Inspector Bearss, Peru, and Auditing Attorney Stutesman, Peru, attended the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Quinn, Decatur, attended the district and state conventions, and took an active part in the selection of Minneapolis delegates.

Postal Clerk Baldwin, of Austin, attended the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Dryden, Martinsville, has been an active political worker.

Postmaster James H. Fearis, Connersville, is the most active republican worker in that place. He has been prominent in all primaries and conventions. He is president of a republican club organized for this campaign. He took an important part in the selection of county delegates to the district convention and attended the convention at Cambridge City, where Minneapolis delegates were chosen. He attended the Minneapolis convention in the interest of Harrison.

Postmaster McPheeters, Bloomington, helped select the delegates to and attended the Minneapolis convention.

Deputy United States Marshal Mathers, Bloomington, and Postmasters Sharp, Ellettsville; Woodard, Harrodsburgh, are active in local federal politics.

Postmaster Geo. W. Bennett, Warsaw, has taken an active part in every political convention and rallies the voters on election day. He was at the state convention to help select delegates to Minneapolis and attend the Minneapolis convention. He was recently an active participator at a convention at Elkhart.

Postmaster Joseph A. Gant, Marion, attended the Minneapolis convention after working for Harrison delegates at home. He also attended the Indianapolis convention which chose the delegates at large. He is chairman of his party county committee. Every federal officer connected with the post-office in Marion is a republican worker in this campaign.

Postmaster Rogers, Huntington, attended the Minneapolis convention.

Pension Examiner Hobbs, Salem, is chairman of the county committee, and works wherever delegates are to be selected. He attended the convention at Jeffersonville which selected delegates to the Minneapolis convention and was a delegate to the Indianapolis convention for the same purpose.

Postmaster Ward, Salem, has always helped to select delegates. He attended the convention at Jeffersonville and the state convention which selected Minneapolis delegates.

Postmaster Tindolph, Vincennes, has been active in politics, in primaries and in state and local conventions. He attended the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Hovey, Mount Vernon, has been very active for Harrison and attended the Minneapolis convention.

Bank Examiner Holman, Rochester, has been active in primaries and in state and local conventions. He helped select the delegates in his district and at large, at Indianapolis, and attended the Minneapolis convention.

Postmaster Marsh, Portland, has been a steady worker for Harrison. He attended the convention at Bluffton to select Minneapolis delegates and attended the Minneapolis convention.

Pension Examiner Lindley, Paoli, attended the Minneapolis convention.

Collector J. P. Throop, of the Terre Haute district, resides in Orange county, where the republicans were anti-Harrison. He spent about two months at home "continuously, trying to whip the boys back into line."

Postmaster Pate, of Boonville, attended the district meeting at Shoals and nominated H. R. Lowder as a candidate for delegate for Minneapolis, and was Lowder's chief worker until he was chosen.

Postmaster Cushman, of Newburgh, has been a worker in primaries, and state and local conventions.

Postmaster Provnes of Spencerville, Postmaster Gordon of Auburn, Postmaster Bicknell of Garrett, Postmaster Ables of St. Joe Station, Postmaster Crane of Sedan, Postmaster Bachman of Corunna, Postmaster Jones of Butler, attended and helped to manipulate for Harrison the district convention at Auburn, to select Minneapolis delegates.

All the postmasters of DeKalb county have been deeply interested in all conventions in behalf of Harrison.

Postmaster Gordon of Auburn and Postmaster Bicknell of Garrett, attended the state convention which selected delegates at large for Minneapolis.

Postmaster Zimmerman of Cannelton, has been active in all primaries and conventions. Himself and Postmasters Schrieber of Tell City and Gardiner of Troy, assisted in selecting Harrison delegates at their district convention.

Postmaster Higgins of Fort Wayne, is reputed to be the President's right hand in the twelfth district, making and unmaking fourth-class postmasters and other minor officers at will. He is a ward committeeman. He has taken an active part in the selection of all delegates in federal matters. In addition to the local conventions, he attended the state convention which selected Minneapolis delegates, and the district convention at Auburn for the same purpose. He had the letter carriers take the poll of the city of Fort Wayne. He, with Utah Commissioner Robertson and River Commissioner Taylor, worked in Minneapolis for Harrison, and the latter two were with Higgins at the state convention above mentioned.

Utah Commissioner Robertson, River Commissioner Taylor, Pension Examiner Bueman and Pension Examiner Stemen of Fort Wayne, are now making Harrison speeches.

United States Marshal Dunlap permits the marshal's office at Indianapolis to be used as a meeting place of a Harrison club. The club was organized there.

Postmaster Godfrey, of New Albany, was a delegate to the district convention at Scottsburgh in 1890, and worked hard for the Harrison candidate for the state committee. He worked in his own district and at the state convention for the selection of Harrison delegates to the Minneapolis convention and went to that convention. Deputy Collector Platt and Letter Carrier Marsh, of New Albany, went to the Minneapolis convention after attending the state convention at Indianapolis to select delegates at large. Pension Examiner Idding of Merrillville has been a delegate in a state convention.

Postmaster Royer, of Noblesville, has attended the state, and the congressional and local conventions of his district. He is an incessantly active manager for his party. He helped to select Harrison delegates to the Minneapolis convention, and attended that convention as "a Harrison boomer."

Postmaster Hammond, of Booneville, has attended most of the county and district conventions and the primaries of his party, but "has been very shy."

Letter Carriers Irvin and Fletcher, of Frankfort, attended a party county convention as delegates and in uniform. Irvin was chairman of his precinct delegation. Fletcher challenged a voter at the polls while in uniform. Irvin also has remained off duty to act as his party challenger, and, in addition, polled the first ward in Frankfort.

There is not room to set out more than a small part of what has been done by federal office-holders in the way of henchman service in Indiana under this administration. I venture, however, one further illustration in the cases of two peculiarly zealous henchmen. District Attorney Chambers and his assistant, Cockrum. These will be found very interesting cases. Both began with being delegates to the convention which nominated Mr. Harrison in 1888. Having received these positions language can hardly express the zeal with which they have labored in the line of their fealty. In December, 1889, Dudley came to Indianapolis and an affidavit was filed and a warrant was made out for his arrest. District Attorney Chambers ordered that the warrant be not issued. In speaking of it afterwards he said:

"I exercised the prerogative in this case that I would exercise in any other of like character, and decided that the warrant be not issued upon this affidavit."

Speaking also of the celebrated Dudley letters, Mr. Chambers said:

The letters, construed in the light of the knowledge that we all possess of how elections in Indiana are conducted by both parties have nothing in them of a criminal character, but, upon the other hand, when so construed, are honorable, and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections."

Dudley had written to divide the floaters in blocks of five and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five. "The knowledge we all possess" was that floaters were paid cash for their votes. In thus declaring himself Mr. Chambers made a sacrifice that few men would care to make.

In illustrating these two cases I prefer to take the accounts of those present on the different occasions:

The republicans of Warriek county met in mass convention in Boonville, Saturday, Sept. 6, and nominated the following county ticket. * J. B. Cockrum, assistant district attorney, came down and took an active part in the convention. He told the boys here how things were worked at Indianapolis, and how this convention must act. They made John chairman of the committee on resolutions, and let him write them to suit himself, and to flatter the bosses at Washington and Indianapolis.—Boonville Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, Sept. 8, 1890.

District Attorney Chambers's speech at the Columbia club to-night will be devoted to democratic iniquities and election methods. He will have for his text that portion of the democratic platform that alleges all political evils against the opponents of that party and claims for it all political purity. Mr. Chambers will detail many instances of democratic bribery, not those of mere assertion, but those that have been established by evidence. He has given great care to this speech, and it will be made up of facts obtained from nearly every county in the state.—Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 5, 1890.

The speech of Hon. Smiley N. Chambers, delivered last night before the Columbia club, will be found elsewhere in this paper. It abounds in indisputable facts concerning democratic rascality, and gives in detail some of the political infamies committed by that party in Indiana. These crimes have been frequent and flagrant, and the party committing them should be deprived of power by an outraged people. The speech is strong in statement, and will prove an effective campaign document.—Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 6, 1890.

Hon. Smiley Chambers [United States district attorney] delivered a splendid address before a large audience at the opera house this evening. He dwelt at length upon the Indianapolis Sentinel and its anarchistic utterances and tendencies, and stated a fact not generally known—that the editor of the Sentinel had circulated in Fort Wayne a petition for the pardon of the Chicago anarchists after they had been convicted.—Marion Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 15, 1890.

Mr. Hinton was followed by Hon. J. B. Cockrum [assistant U. S. district attorney], of Indianapolis, in a masterly presentation of state issues, giving a thorough discussion of the iniquities of the democratic party that have passed directly under his notice as an officer of the United States court.—Rushville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 17, 1890.

District Attorney Chambers has written to the state central committee that he and Mr. Trusler, republican candidate for secretary of state, had two grand meetings at Marion and one at Kokomo. "Our meetings have been well attended, and very enthusiastic," he writes.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 17, 1890.

The Hon. John B. Cockrum delivered a telling speech to a large and enthusiastic audience at the court-house in this city last night. * * He also dealt with the infamous violation of election laws by the democratic party, and the extravagant and dishonest manner in which the affairs of the state institutions of this state have been mismanaged at the hands of the democratic legislature.—Noblesville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 12, 1890.

John B. Cockrum, assistant United States district attorney, addressed, August 4, 1891, a republican club upon the recently nominated republican candidates for the city offices.

At this point Assistant District Attorney J. B. Cockrum got the floor, and insisted that this was a republican convention, and not a place where a man could come loaded with personal bile and spit it out.—Indianapolis News, March 1, 1892, Account of State Convention.

The arraignment of the democracy by Smiley N. Chambers, United States district attorney, in his speech before the Columbian club, Saturday night, was such a powerful phillipic that the Journal this morning prints it almost in full.—Indianapolis Journal, March 21, 1892.

The republicans of Harrison county met in mass convention at Corydon to-day and appointed delegates to the state and district conventions. Hon. Smiley N. Chambers [United States district attorney] was present and addressed the meeting.—Indianapolis Journal, April 10, 1892.

An enthusiastic meeting of the Richmond republican club was held this evening, it being the occasion of the second annual election of officers. After the business of the evening had been transacted the club was addressed by Hon. Smiley N. Chambers, of Indianapolis, on the political issues of the day.—Indianapolis Journal, April 12, 1892.

The republicans of this county held their convention here to-day. Smiley N. Chambers [United States district attorney] was present and addressed the brethren on the tariff and other issues. Greencastle Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, April 30, 1892.

Smiley Chambers [United States district attorney] and Hugh Hanna are in charge of the public Indiana headquarters.—Minneapolis Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 6, 1892.

Hon. Smiley N. Chambers [United States district attorney] was then introduced. He looked as if he had done a hard day's work, and his voice was husky. When the applause that greeted his appearance had subsided, he said:

"One week ago, yesterday, my fellow-citizens, we left this city for the great convention, carrying with us, as we felt then, and now know, the best wishes of all of you, that victory might be ours."—Indianapolis Journal, June 12, 1892.

United States Marshal Dunlap and Assistant District Attorney Cockrum arrived at noon.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, June 25, 1892.

John B. Cockrum [assistant United States district attorney] has Smiley N. Chambers's boom in hand. He is working like a man who sees the district attorneyship in his grasp, in case he wins for his chief.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 27, 1892.

The republicans of this county opened the campaign to-day * * * Smiley Chambers [United States district attorney] followed Shockney in a speech for two hours. * * —Noblesville Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, Aug. 29, 1892.

It is averred that Mr. Chambers never had any idea of being nominated, and that he consented to enter the race for the sole purpose of taking away some of the strength that threatened to go to Chase. Whether this story is true or not, it has been evident that the men who have been here pretending to be for Chambers have been much more industrious in opposing Chase than in furthering the chances of Mr. Chambers. John B. Cockrum [assistant U. S. district attorney], who has been managing the Chambers boom, has been ready and anxious for two days to promise Chambers's strength to any one upon whom the anti-Chase people might unite. Mr. Cockrum was in the "round-up" anti meeting last night and pledged Chambers's support for Elliott. The true friends of Judge Elliott have no hand in the movement to make him a candidate.—Ft. Wayne Dispatch to Indianapolis News, June 28, 1892.

The campaign is on in Rushville, having been opened to-night by Smiley N. Chambers [United States attorney], of Indianapolis.—Rushville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 4, 1892.

The republicans of Hancock county met in mass convention at the court-house this noon. After calling the convention to order he introduced Hon. S. N. Chambers [United States attorney], of Indianapolis, who addressed the people for over an hour in a highly interesting manner.—Greenfield Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 4, 1892.

There was a rousing meeting of republicans in this city to-night. The Hon. J. B. Cockrum [deputy United States attorney], of Indianapolis, addressed the Harrison and Baker guards, two republican organizations of this city. One hundred and fifty members escorted the speaker to the court-house. The speech aroused much enthusiasm.—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 13, 1892.

An enthusiastic republican meeting was held in Ross's Opera House last evening. Hon. Smiley N. Chambers [United States attorney] was present and addressed the crowd.—Union City Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 14, 1892.

Hon. Smiley N. Chambers addressed a splendid meeting of republicans here [Nashville, Ind.] yesterday afternoon.

Hon. Smiley N. Chambers will address the people of North Indianapolis, at Greenleaf Hall. The West Indianapolis McKinley Drum Corps will be in attendance.

Following is a list of additional assignments of speakers throughout the state made by the republican state committee:

HON. S. N. CHAMBERS.

[United States District Attorney.]

Sept. 17—Union City, Randolph county, 7 P. M.

HON. J. B. COCKRUM.

[Assistant District Attorney.]

Sept. 17—Martinsville, Morgan county, 7 P. M.

Sept. 19—Knightstown, Henry county, 7 P. M.

Sept. 23—Elizabethtown, Bartholomew county, 7 P. M.

Oct. 7—Marion, Grant county, 7 P. M.

The eleventh ward republicans were addressed at the corner of West and Maryland streets last night by the Hon. John B. Cockrum. Mr. Cockrum's address was a forcible one, and he was warmly applauded at frequent intervals. He made his appeal to the working men and for the inestimable aid that the protective tariff has been to them. He exposed the fallacy of free trade principles in so clear a manner that more than one of his hearers involuntarily exclaimed, "That's right." He drew a vivid comparison of the opposing candidates of the two great parties: pictured Harrison and Reid at the front during the war, fighting for their homes and their nation, and Cleveland and Stevenson enjoying their ease while their paid substitutes suffered, the latter propagating the interests of the Knights of the Golden Circle; compared their records as statesmen and as men whose promises had been fulfilled or unfulfilled, and finally urged them as thinking, intelligent men to vote the republican ticket.—Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 30.

The fair officials at Newport have introduced political days for the fair this year. D. W. Voorhees will speak Thursday, Col. R. W. Thompson, of Terre Haute, and Smiley N. Chambers, United States district attorney, Friday.—Newport Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 4.

Hon. John B. Cockrum was in the city yesterday, having returned from a campaigning trip to Montgomery and other counties. "The state is in fine condition," he said yesterday, "for the republicans and is getting better every day. I think Montgomery county has as fine an organization as I ever saw. Republicans I find are wide awake and will be out in force on November 8. I have no fears that any republican will stay at home this year. There is too much of individual and national prosperity at stake."—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 7.

Hon. John B. Cockrum, deputy United States attorney, of Indianapolis, spoke last evening in Ladoga.—Crawfordsville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 6.

At the rooms of the Lincoln Club, Friday night, J. B. Cockrum made an interesting and forcible address. The point that attracted greatest attention was a denunciation of the Australian-ballot law as a scheme of the democracy to steal this state.—Marion Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 10.

Hon. John B. Cockrum, a federal office-holder, violated the civil service rules, and spoke to a fair crowd in the court-house in this city last night.—Mt. Vernon Democrat, Oct. 15.

LUCIUS B. SWIFT.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

The President is of opinion that it is a great abuse to bring the patronage of the federal government into conflict with the freedom of elections; and that this abuse ought to be corrected wherever it may have been permitted to exist, and to be prevented for the future. He, therefore, directs that information be given to all officers and agents in your department of the public service that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of state officers or officers of this government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, or the payment of any contribution or assessment on salaries or official compensation for party or election purposes, will be regarded by him as cause for removal.—From a Circular issued by Daniel Webster, Secretary of State under President William Henry Harrison, to the Heads of the Departments under the Government of the United States.

BUSY HENCHMEN.

Col. A. D. Shaw, third auditor of the treasury, is in the city.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 1.

* * *

E. H. Nebeker, treasurer of the United States, is in the city.—Indianapolis News, Oct. 1.

* * *

Capt. John R. Leonard, of the United States marshal's office, goes to Indianapolis at the end of this month.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 3.

* * *

"There will not be many men in Washington on the 8th of next month who can vote in Indiana," said President John C. Cheney, of the Indiana Republican Club, to the Journal correspondent to-day. "The Indiana republicans here feel the keenest interest in the political situation in their state," continued President Cheney, "and they will do their part towards giving General Harrison as large a majority as he had four years ago."

The meeting of the Indiana Republican Club last night was largely attended. There was great enthusiasm shown and a quiet determination evinced in the impending contest. The club will meet again in two weeks, when it is expected that about two hundred Hoosiers will have announced their intention of going home to vote. This is nine tenths of the Indians in Washington.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 3.

* * *

Daniel M. Ransdell, United States marshal for the District of Columbia, will leave for Indianapolis tomorrow evening. He expects to spend a few days socially with friends at his old home.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 27.

* * *

Third Auditor W. H. Hart and Deputy Controller of the Currency Nixon, of the treasury department, will go to their homes at Frankfort and New Castle, respectively, about the middle of next month, to remain till after the election.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 27.

* * *

United States Treasurer E. H. Nebeker intends to leave for his home at Covington in a few days. He has received his annual leave time for October.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 27.

* * *

Daniel M. Ransdell, United States marshal for the District of Columbia, is at the Bates. He came in from Washington last night and will remain here several days.—Indianapolis News, Sept. 29.

* * *

The republican committees, state, and county, are having the assistance of federal office-holders. United States Treasurer Nebeker and United States Marshal Ransdell have been lending an advisory hand to the state committee, and Mr. Shepherd, of Washington, is advising Merrill Moores as to his work. John R. Leonard will be here soon to add his services to the campaign.—Indianapolis News, Oct. 3.

* * *

Ex-Congressman William D. Owen, superintendent of immigration, leaves here on next Monday for Indiana to enter the campaign, and to remain till after election.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 4.

* * *

Paul Leibhardt, superintendent of the dead-letter office, post-office department, will leave here for his home in Wayne county next week, to remain there till after the campaign.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 29.

* * *

Harry McFarland, a foreman in the press-room of the government printing office, will go to his home at Indianapolis on Sunday for a month's leave.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 8.

* * *

Postmaster Thompson will to-morrow begin a tour of the post-offices of this county. There are forty offices, including that of Indianapolis, and the tour will require sixteen or eighteen days. The object is to instruct postmasters in their duties, where necessary, and to encourage them in efforts to better the service.—Indianapolis News, Oct. 7.

E. W. Halford, the President's private secretary, will make some political speeches in Indiana near the close of the present campaign.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 10.

* * *

Hon. Green B. Raum, United States commissioner of pensions, will arrive in this city on Wednesday.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 10.

* * *

Ex-Senator Bruce, recorder of deeds, who has just returned to Washington from New Jersey, where he has been aiding the republican campaign, says that he thinks Mr. Harrison is going to carry New Jersey as well as New York. He says the enthusiasm of the New Jersey republicans is such as never seen before.—Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 10.

* * *

United States Marshal Ransdell ran in from New York yesterday on his way to Indiana, where he will remain until the campaign is over.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 12.

Report comes that C. S. Hudson, postmaster at this place, drove twelve miles the other night to make a rabid republican speech.—Corydon Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, Oct. 11.

Mr Egan is counted on to conduct a republican propaganda among the Catholic Irishmen in the middle west.

A glance over the blue-book shows how the diplomats have been used. Ryan of Mexico and Conger of Brazil were both home on leave at a time when matters needed straightening out in Iowa and Kansas, preparatory to the Minneapolis convention. Reid of Paris resigned his place to come back and get a grip on the tail of the ticket, and Mr. Coolidge, who was appointed to his place, was chosen very largely because his politics bordered so closely on mugwumpism as to make it desirable to send him abroad. Porter of Rome was brought home to do preparatory work. Carr of Denmark was engaged in it also, and was forced back only by the crisis reached in the Ryder scandal. Pitkin of the Argentine Republic is in this country, working like a beaver; Mahany of Ecuador, who is noted as an orator, has taken the stump; Lincoln of Great Britain has been sent for; Beale of Persia resigned at a convenient date to turn in and work. Smith of Russia came back in time for the Minneapolis convention, and another republican of uncomfortably strong reform tendencies, in the person of Andrew D. White, was sent out of the country to succeed him. When we get below the diplomatic rank and strike the consuls and consuls-general the name of absentees for party purposes is legion.—Washington Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Oct. 11.

The republican state convention is at midnight in a wrangle over permanent organization. The administration forces, led by Collector E. A. Webster, are in control of the convention, and so far have had everything their own way. E. M. Brayton leads the opposition.—Columbia, S. C., Dispatch to New York Times, Sept. 30.

BUSY BLACKMAILERS.

The "confidential-circular" business of the republican managers is on the increase daily. The brazen tactics of Carter and Hackett in their confidential circulars were outdone yesterday by one sent out by the American Protective Tariff League to certain post-offices.

The league seeks to use the post-offices as free distributing agents for high-protection literature. It practically seizes the postmaster by the official throat and demands that he give up $5, or that if he can not chip in that amount to pay for protection literature, he must get some one else to do it.

DEAR SIR—Accept our congratulations upon your recent appointment. Situated as you are, you can accomplish the best results for the cause of protection of any one in your locality. It is our plan to have at least one official correspondent of the league at every post-office, and through him secure information, obtain the distribution of documents, and exert every legitimate influence in favor of protection and reciprocity.

It is impossible for us to bear all the expense of this work, for this is a big country. Every intelligent voter should receive complete information showing the benefits of protection. We wish to have you act as our confidential agent and correspondent to assist in this work.

We expect that each correspondent will, either personally or with the aid of friends, furnish at least $5 before the next election for circulation of our literature at his home. If you do not feel like personally contributing the amount suggested, ask friends to help. They will do it. If you accept, we will outline a plan to secure the co-operation of others. Will you act as our correspondent? * * *

It is imperative that every friend like you put his shoulder to the wheel and work in season and out of season until the election of 1892. Yours very truly,

WILBUR F. WAKEMAN, General Secretary.

Since Gowdy has been at the head of the republican state committee he has done nothing but bleed office-holders. There never has been such a beggar. For nearly two years he has written letters to Indians at Washington all on the subject of money, and months ago they sent back word that they had no more money to give until the campaign began. That was before the Minneapolis convention when Gowdy was working for contributions to pay his proposed extravagance in keeping the state central committee in wine, cigars and luxurious quarters at the national convention. He then tried to assess the Indiana delegates and alternates to the convention $200 and $100 respectively. They denounced the state chairman so vigorously that he pleaded for $100 from the delegates and $50 from the alternates, and in the end compromised on $50 each. Now he has broken loose again and has addressed the following to the railway postal clerks and all other employes who owe their employment to a republican administration and republican influence:

"DEAR SIR—The campaign is now on. A fierce battle is to be fought. The importance of republican success in this state can not be overestimated. Upon it depends the election of a full state ticket, the possible election of a United States senator and the contingency of success to the party in the Union.

"A period in the campaign has been reached when your counsel and your substantial aid should be tendered. No good republican or other person desiring to continue present favorable conditions can afford to be indifferent or fail to recognize the necessities to a committee involved in organizing and conducting a campaign. Legitimate expenses must be met. The success of the ticket is involved as well as the pleasant conditions about you. You understand the necessities for funds with which to defray expenses. We confidently expect you to give generous assistance, and this can not be more timely or effective than if given at present. * * *

"Awaiting your early reply, we are yours truly,

"JOHN K. GOWDY, Chairman."

Messrs. Huston and Long, members of the national republican committee from Indiana and Florida, respectively, have been closeted in this city, to day, with leading republican federal office-holders, black and white, from all parts of the state. All efforts to officially ascertain the object of their presence has failed, but it has leaked out from republican sources that their mission here is similar to that in Texas and Louisiana—the assessment and collection of money for campaign purposes. More republican office-holders were present in the city than have been seen here before at any one time, other than a state convention, for years. They decline to be interviewed, further than to state that their presence here was requested, but refuse to disclose the source from whence the invitation came. It is alleged by republicans who ought to know that there will be no republican electoral ticket in this state.—Jackson, Miss., Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 8.

It is openly charged by the Evening States of this city, after a careful investigation of the facts, that Huston and Long, ambassadors from the national republican party, who spent a couple of days in this city, took away with them from the "faithful" here a sum approximating $10,000, to be used in furthering the interests of Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States and candidate for re-election. Messrs. Huston and Long got the money they wanted, but there are several leading office-holders who are now in a state of perplexity, and who are out of pocket as a result of the harmonizing visit of their party conferrees.

Superintendent Smyth, of the mint, Collector Warmoth and Postmaster Eaton have had to stand the brunt of the tax. Shortly after their arrival here the republican ambassadors sent for these officials and others to call upon them, and made their proposition. The success of the party, they said, meant a great deal to the office-holders, and the office-holders ought, therefore, to be willing to contribute their mite toward achieving that success. It is prohibited by the civil service law to assess government employes, but Messrs. Huston and Long assured the officials that if any trouble resulted from the effort to collect money the national committee's influence with the powers that be at Washington was sufficient to prevent any unpleasant consequences. They wanted money badly, and wanted it at once. They could not afford to wait until the hat was passed around indiscriminately among the subordinates. What they desired was that the heads of the departments should furnish their personal checks and then look to the employes for reimbursement.

It is estimated that the committee of two counted on $15,000 from New Orleans, and it is said they got two-thirds of that amount. The mint was put down for $4,000 and at that rate the post-office and custom-house, which employ a great many more men, must have been slated for much larger sum. Whatever the amounts were, it is sufficient to say that Collector Warmoth and Postmaster Eaton each promptly wrote out his check and handed it to the ambassadors, and the employes in the granite building are expected to make up the greater part of what the officials were required to fork over.

Superintendent Smyth "kicked" like a Texas steer at the plan of the committeemen and the amount they demanded, but he became more docile after persuasion, albeit he succeeded in cutting down the appropriation budgeted against his department. Messrs. Huston and Long said they thought the superintendent could easily afford to contribute $4,000 to the cause on behalf of the mint, but Smyth called the bluff and got out of the hole for the time being by agreeing to furnish a check for $2,500, $500 of which was to be considered a personal contribution by the superintendent of the mint. The superintendent was told that he might use his own judgment as to the best means of getting the money back, and that if those engaged in making the collection got into trouble, the matter would be made all right at Washington. The superintendent did use his "best judgment," but his judgment does not seem to have been very good. He delegated several assistants to formulate a plan for the recovery of the money, and they did so. They proceeded to assess the employes without regard to color or sex, and that caused a howl, for the ladies, if they are denied the right of suffrage, are as much protected by the civil service law as are the men. A list, however, was made out, and handed to the cashier for collection. It was found, however, that this plan was a dangerous one and might cause trouble. Thereupon the list was taken to the desk where the employes sign for their money and the tax was levied there. It was said that each employe was assessed two days' pay for three months. Coiner Burkdell created trouble for the superintendent when a list reached his department. He knew the assessment was contrary to law and he did not propose to put his foot in a trap. So it appears that he did not even wait for those under him to broach the subject, but at once told them that they would not have to contribute a cent. He explained the law to them and said he would have nothing to do with any assessment of employes. He is said to have even gone further and said that any employe caught violating the law would be reported to the proper authorities. There is where there is a hitch just now.

The coiner and superintendent conjointly employ the force in the coiner's department, but the superintendent of the mint has authority to remove them when he elects to do so. So the coiner's employes are between the devil and the deep blue sea. They are afraid to refuse to contribute, lest they shall bring down upon their devoted heads the wrath of the superintendent, who is at present out of pocket, and they are equally afraid to assist in a violation of the law when their chief threatens to enforce it against them.—New Orleans Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 6.

I am able to corroborate through personal inquiry the published reports concerning the violation of the civil-service law by the federal officials in this city. The evidence against Andrew W. Smythe, superintendent of the mint, is direct and convincing. Messrs. Huston and Long, members of the republican national committee, during their recent visit here, called upon the leading federal office-holders for campaign funds. Mr. Smythe gave his check for $2,500. In order that he might be partly or wholly reimbursed, a subscription list was circulated among the employes of the mint, who were to be assessed an amount equal to six days' pay. Mr. Burkdoll, coiner of the mint, refused to allow the circulation of the list in his department, and this probably explains how the scheme was made public. Your correspondent is reliably informed that the same methods are being pursued in the custom-house in a manner less direct, and therefore not so liable to detection.—New Orleans Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Oct. 3.

* * *

Early in the campaign the civil service commission issued a statement designed to protect employes of the government from the rapacity of the republican sharks charged with the duty of collecting head money to be used in the corruption of voters. * * * It was apparent, however, that a new scheme for "bleeding" employes would be set in motion when the excitement due to the civil service commission circular had died down. It seems that the time has arrived. The "scheme" which Mr. Harrison has adopted is to appeal to the employes of the government through their state associations in this city. Nearly every state in the Union is represented here by an association. Missouri has been selected to hold the right of the line in this new movement. To-day every government clerk who hails from Missouri received a copy of the following circular:

S. G. BROCK, President. F. C. JONES, Secretary.

OFFICE OF THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE MISSOURI STATE REPUBLICAN ASSOCIATION, 463 G. Street, N. W., WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 5, 1892.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that I have been selected as the financial secretary of the Missouri State Republican Association of this city.

Believing that you have an interest in the contest now going on in the state, I would ask that, if you have any suggestions to make which would be beneficial to the cause of republicanism in the state, you will call at my office at the above number.

I will be at my office on Wednesdays and Fridays during this month and on Saturday the 15th inst., and on Monday the 31st inst., from 4 to 7 P. M., when I will be pleased to see all Missourians and talk over the conduct of the canvass in our State and receive any suggestions which may be offered.

Very respectfully,

JAMES T. HUNTER,
Financial secretary.

One acquainted with political methods does not need to be told that the word "suggestions," which figures so prominently in this circular, means "cash." Financial secretaries of political organizations are not supposed to have anything to do with "suggestions" that do not bear directly upon the subject of finance.

That Financial Secretary Hunter is no exception to the rule is proved by the experience of a Missourian, a clerk in one of the departments, who called at the office of the secretary this morning to ask the meaning of the circular. He says he was told frankly that it was the belief of the managers of the republican party that clerks in the employ of the government ought to give at least 5 per cent. of their salaries to help the republican canvass.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 8.

* * *

Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt recently undid a little extortion game which the republican politicians in St. Joseph, Mo., were playing on the post-office employes. He found that every clerk was expected to join the republican club and promptly pay the "dues." The commissioner promptly decided against the "dues" system of collecting campaign assessments.—Springfield Republican.

* * *

The clerks in the bureau of Indian affairs at Washington have been assessed fifty dollars each for the republican campaign fund. The Indian office is located in the Atlantic building, and the question arose whether, as it was leased by the government, it was a government building within the meaning of the law prohibiting political assessments in government buildings. The solicitor, to be on the safe side, gave back all the money he had collected in the buildings and tore up the receipts. Then he called at the residences of the clerks, collected the money there and gave new receipts.—Indianapolis Sentinel, Oct. 10.

* * *

The U. S. civil service commission to-day made public the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 10.—A blank book, purporting to have been sent by W. R. Bates, secretary at Detroit, Mich., on behalf of the republican state committee to George B. Daniels, the postmaster at Withey, Mich., has been laid before this commission. It requests the postmaster to furnish a canvass of the patrons of this office with information as to their former and present politics, and as to the papers they take, together with recommendations as to what papers should be sent to them, etc. The postmaster is further informed that he is expected to consult with prominent republicans of his locality as to this work, but as far as possible to keep his labors from becoming public. The signature is printed, the address is in writing. The commission has also received information from various sources to the effect that requests of this kind have been made by political committees not only in Michigan, but elsewhere. Services of the kind requested in the book submitted to the committees are clearly political services and to render them is contrary to the postal regulations. With this, however, the commission has nothing to do, but it feels in duty bound to inform this postmaster, and all postmasters and postal and other public employes in Michigan and elsewhere that the civil service law expressly provides (sec. 2, division 2, subdivision 58) that no person in the public service is for that reason under any obligation to render any political service, and that he will not be removed or otherwise prejudiced for refusing to render it; while general rule 1 of the civil service rules provides for the dismissal of any public servant, removing him or causing him to be removed because of such refusal.

(Signed) CHARLES LYMAN,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
GEORGE D. JOHNSTON,
Commissioners.

It was learned yesterday that Col. H. C. Powers, internal revenue collector, had made a contribution to the republican campaign fund of $2,500. He has the appointment of 160 sugar-weighers, and early in the week began to make his selections. He required every man whom he appointed to sign a check, and this was done in the case of every one of the 130 appointments already made, each appointee signing a check for $15, the amount to be deducted from his first month's salary. The task of making these collections was placed in the hands of Chief-Clerk Young.

Mr. Buckdahl, coiner of the mint, in answer to a letter from the civil service commission as to the facts and figures about the assessments, sent to Washington yesterday clippings of the case from local papers.—New Orleans Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Oct. 15.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
ALLEGANY COUNTY POSTMASTERS' ASSOCIATION, }
SILAS BURDICK, Pres., M. H. BAILEY, Treas., CLARENCE RICKER, Sec.

BLACK CREEK, N. Y., 1892.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the executive committee held at Cuba Aug. 12, the following was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the president and secretary are instructed to notify each postmaster of Allegany county that the amount of the contribution to be made to the republican county committee be 5 per cent. of one year's compensation.

You have no doubt received a letter from the Allegany county republican committee requesting that you make some contribution toward defraying the legitimate expenses of the coming campaign. It is earnestly hoped that you will comply with the request. Yours truly, S. C. BURDICK, Chairman.

CLARENCE RICKER, Secretary.

COMMISSIONER ROOSEVELT ON THE TRAIL OF BLACKMAILERS.

At the Pine Ridge agency, in South Dakota, I found that the following letter had been received by the agent, Capt. George Le Roy Brown, the letter coming from the chairman of the South Dakota Republican Campaign Committee:

AUGUST 12, 1892.

Maj. at Pine Ridge;

MY DEAR SIR—Will you kindly send me a list of all parties at the agency, including all teachers, helpers, etc. Give me a tabulated list showing name of each and salary per year.

I am very desirous of a speedy reply to this inquiry so I can make up my asst. list soon and correctly.

Very truly yours,

J. M. GREENE, Chr.

Captain Brown, very properly, made no answer to this communication but forwarded it immediately to the civil service commission. I wish to call attention in the first place to the fact that the chairman of the republican committee, Mr. Greene, makes no pretense that these collections are to be voluntary contributions. He distinctly uses the word "assessment." In the next place it is to be noted that he particularly requires the names of the helpers, most of whom are themselves Indians, and of the teachers, who are mostly women. In other words, he makes the perfectly bald request to Captain Brown to commit a criminal act for the purpose of assisting him to blackmail women teachers and Indian helpers for the benefit of a political party. Had Captain Brown acceded to the request he would of course have been guilty of violating the law, which provides that no government employe shall be, directly or indirectly, concerned in soliciting political contributions from any other government employe; and to assist in making up such an assessment list, would, of course, have amounted to being at least indirectly concerned in making the assessments. Chairman Greene, therefore, was endeavoring to procure the commission of a criminal act by Captain Brown. Whether he was himself guilty of a criminal act I am hardly prepared to say. The law ought to prohibit outsiders from soliciting government employes at all; but all that it does in this respect is to prohibit them in the most sweeping terms from soliciting in any way in a government building. This, of course, includes solicitation by writing. The letter sent by Mr. Greene to Captain Brown was addressed to him at Pine Ridge agency. I do not know whether this would be held as being addressed to him in a government building or not; but it seems to me that it would be well to lay the matter before the attorney-general in any event.

Furthermore, I found that this Pine Ridge case was not exceptional. At every reservation and government school which I visited in South Dakota, letters similar to the above, although varying in details, had been received, showing that the republican state committee was engaged in a resolute effort to assess all the governmental employes under different agencies and in the different schools.

In all the other places, however, the agents and school superintendents whom I questioned informed me that they had lost or mislaid the letters sent them by the committee, although on being cross-examined they all admitted, with more or less reluctance, having received them. The agent at the Cheyenne river reservation told me he had received such a letter requesting a contribution of two per cent. on the salary of himself and his subordinates, but that he had handed it to his son and paid no further attention to it. Here I summoned all the teachers and other employes together and informed them that they need not pay one cent, and that if they were solicited by any one, or threatened with molestation for not contributing, I would be grateful to them for promptly communicating with the commission, and that I thought the commission could guarantee that they would be protected, for the interior department would certainly see that they received no harm. The agent informed me that he had received such a letter, but that the writer had evidently learned beforehand the names and salaries of all his employes, for it contained a regular list of them, with the amount that was expected from each, varying from one hundred dollars, in the case of the agent, to ten dollars, in the case of the lower-grade teachers. He told me that he had paid no attention to this letter, and as at Cheyenne river, I called together the employes and informed them that they need not contribute a cent unless they wished, and that they could contribute to whichever party they chose. The superintendent of the Indian school at Pierre told me he had received the same kind of a letter, addressed to him at this Indian school at Pierre. He said he did not have the letter at hand, but that it requested, as well as he remembered, a subscription of two per cent. from himself and those under him. I told him and the only one of his teachers that I saw that they need pay no heed to the letter; and that they would not be molested for failing to contribute, to which he answered that he hoped that this was true, but that he feared, and he knew many other government employes feared, that if they did not contribute, the local politicians would remember it against them, would trump up charges to their discredit and have them removed on the first occasion, not ostensibly for failure to contribute, of course, but because of some other alleged misdeed. It is due to the superintendent of this school to say he struck me as being a very able and conscientious man, devoted to the welfare of his pupils; and undoubtedly the sentiments he expressed obtain very largely among the employes who receive such blackmailing letters as this of Chairman Greene, and who do feel coerced into contributing because they fear that, even though the contributions are not asked for by their superior officers, yet these superior officers will themselves be influenced more or less by the members standing high in their own party who do make the requests for contributions. In this case of the government school at Pierre, I think the solicitation was clearly illegal, as the letter was without doubt addressed to a government building. I had no facilities for carrying on the investigation there myself, not being able to put witnesses under oath; but I have no doubt that an investigation by the law department of the government would produce facts sufficient to warrant a prosecution at least in this case.

In Nebraska I found much less evidence of solicitation than in South Dakota. At the Santee agency, where many of the Indians are voters, complaints were made to me that under the last administration efforts had been made by government employes to coerce the Indians into voting the democratic ticket, precisely as I found that in North Dakota political assessments had been collected among the agencies by the democrats prior to the last presidential campaign. At the Winnebago and Omaha agencies no attempt had been made to collect assessments during the past two or three years, as far as I could find out. On the Santee reservation the agent had been solicited for a hundred dollars by the republican campaign committee a year or two ago, but no solicitation has been made this year. In all these cases it would be useless to attempt to take action on what happened prior to the present year, owing to the great difficulty of getting any testimony save that of the persons involved.

In Kansas I visited only the government Indian non-reservation boarding school, known as Haskell Institute, under the charge of Superintendent Charles F. Meserve. Here I found that there had been a resolute effort on behalf of the republican committee of the second congressional district to assess the superintendent and those under him, the attempt being made by R. B. Stevenson, the secretary of the republican executive committee for the second congressional district; and it appears to me that Mr. Stevenson has clearly laid himself open to prosecution for violating the law. Exhibits A, B, C and D contain three of the original letters sent out by Stevenson to Mr. Meserve, to Mr. H. B. Peairs, the principal teacher, and to Mr. C. W. Jewett, the assistant clerk, all being addressed to these gentlemen at Haskell Institute, at Lawrence, Kansas, written and signed in the same handwriting, the signature being "R. B. Stevenson, secretary." Exhibit D contains the stenographic report of my examination of the various gentlemen who were assessed. From this it appears, for instance, that Mr. Charles W. Grant, the assistant clerk, received a letter from this Mr. Stevenson, the secretary of the republican committee of the second congressional district, addressed to him at Haskell Institute, soliciting ten dollars for political purposes, about the first of August last; that Dr. Oliver D. Walker, the physician at Haskell Institute, received the same kind of letter, similarly addressed, requesting fifteen dollars; that the letter sent to Mr. Jewett requested seven dollars, the request being couched as follows:

The congressional committee has directed that you be asked to contribute for campaign purposes in this district. Those occupying positions similar to the one you do are giving seven dollars. You may send your contribution to the treasurer of the committee, Mr. W. H. Haskell, 522 Minnesota avenue, Kansas City, Kansas, who will make due entry thereof and receipt to you for same. An early response will be highly appreciated by the committee.

M. Peairs was asked to contribute on the same ground, that persons occupying positions similar to the one he did were giving that amount. Mr. Meserve was asked to contribute forty dollars, similar reasons being given for specifying this sum. Mr. Meserve and the other gentlemen named were naturally not very anxious to testify in the matter, as to do so would very probably seriously embroil them with the local politicians of influence in the dominant party; but they did testify with honorable frankness as soon as I requested them to do so in my official capacity. In response to my question as to what action Mr. Meserve had taken in reference to the request, he informed me that on finding that his employes had received such letters he notified them that the tenure by which they held their offices at Haskell Institute would be neither weakened nor strengthened by replying to the request or by failing to reply. If all of the gentlemen occupying positions similar to Mr. Meserve would take such action as he took when their subordinates are solicited for political contributions, the work of this commission in trying to protect government employes from blackmail would be very materially lightened.

It seems to me that the papers in this case should be transmitted to the attorney-general for such action as he may deem wise, and I so recommend, for it would appear that Mr. Stevenson has certainly laid himself open to prosecution.

As I deemed it of the utmost importance publicly to call the attention of the employes in the government service to their rights, and also to warn the various campaign committees that any attempts on their part to violate or evade the law would be watched with a jealous eye by the commission, I caused to be printed in certain papers of wide circulation in the three states visited the following notice:

SIOUX CITY, Sept. 15, 1892.

Upon investigation just completed I find that for years it has been customary for state and congressional campaign committees systematically to levy political assessments on the Government employes in certain Indian reservations and Indian schools through Kansas, Nebraska and the Dakotas. This practice is most rife during Presidential campaigns. It obtained four years ago under the democratic administration; but this is no excuse for the fact that it is now prevalent.

Within the last month there has been a bold series of efforts to practice this series of blackmail. On most of the reservations and in the Indian schools which I have mentioned attempts of the kind have just been made by local state and congressional campaign committees. At one agency, for instance, the agent received the following communication: "Send me a list of all parties at the agency * * * including all teachers, helpers, etc., showing name of each and salary per year * * * so I can make up my assessment list soon and correctly," signed by the chairman of the republican state committee. Be it remembered that these teachers are mostly women, and the helpers Indians; there is an infamy of meanness in trying to extort money from such defenseless employes.

At another agency the sums assessed were stated outright, ranging from $100 for the agent to $10 for the lower grade teachers; at one school 2 per cent. of the salaries was specified, and so on and so on.

I wish publicly to assure the governmental employes in the Indian service that they need not pay a dollar to any political party at all unless they wish, and that if they do wish they can pay it to whatever party they prefer. Immediately on my return to Washington I shall lay all the information I can collect in each case before the department of justice so that wherever practicable the persons offending against the law prohibiting political assessments may be prosecuted.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

I promptly notified the commission of my action, and I was careful to refrain from giving any names in my notice lest I might thereby hamper the subsequent action of the commission. I thought it important not to delay in publishing this card, for the reason that very many of the employes who would submit to being blackmailed if they felt that they had no promise of protection would undoubtedly be encouraged to resist if they knew that the commission was actively watching their interests and was bent on maintaining them.

BE JUST; BE CONSISTENT.

GREENSBURG, IND., September 25, 1892.

Editor Civil Service Chronicle:

In reading the editorials in the various issues of your publication for some months past the child-like and all-abiding faith which your writers have for the accomplishment of that much-to-be-desired object, the enforcement of the civil service laws and their extension to other branches of public service, at the hands of the democratic party has struck me as a most unique expectation. The editors of the CHRONICLE, I believe, claim to be independent of party bias except in so far as the civil service principle is involved. This being the case, permit me to inquire what the history of the democratic party holds which gives promise of the attainment of your desires? To gentlemen of your mentality it is unnecessary to recall the fact or argue that all the past performances of the democratic party have proven its devotion to the spoils idea; what then is the cause of such belief in its change of heart and policy? Is it faith in the virtue of Mr. Cleveland alone? In 1884 the writer heard Mr. Dudley Foulke, of civil service advocacy, speak against Mr. Blaine and in favor of Cleveland; Blaine was defeated and Mr. Cleveland, the idol of civil service reformers, took the reins of government. He was given a most fair and impartial trial. And what of his admirer, Mr. Foulke? Four years later, in 1888, we again hear him speak. Is he praising Cleveland and the democratic party for their brave adherence to civil service reform? Not so. He is found advocating the election of Benjamin Harrison, whom he has known as a neighbor and as a man of much sincerity of purpose. Cleveland, unable to withstand the pressure from the large spoils element of his party, has disappointed Mr. Foulke and his co workers, and is not then considered as at all worthy of a re-election. Harrison defeats Cleveland and is put on trial, but instead of having the support of the civil service advocates, from the first he suffers unstinted criticism, criticism not noted for fairness and which seems rather to be more in a spirit of self-satisfaction than of regret. His party honors him with a renomination, and now where do we find Mr. Foulke? He appears on the political stage, but he has seen-sawed back to Cleveland, who has also once been tried and found wanting, and the party of that noted reform(?) organization, Tammany. We beg to ask wherein is to be found the consistency in such support? Democracy, with all its record of opposition, with Cleveland's failure and broken pledges—wherein has it retrieved itself that such implicit faith as your journal continually breathes should be felt? The party is the same party and Cleveland is the same Cleveland; their records are unchanged, their promises are no more to be relied upon, and as an additional argument against them comes the nomination of Stevenson, notorious as the headsmen of the Cleveland regime, in direct recognition of the "real democrats" of the democratic party. Surely this slap in the face of civil service reformers can not inspire them with renewed confidence? What then is there to expect at the hands of Cleveland and his party except a repetition of past experiences, with the loss of the restraining influence of an ambition for a re-election which doubtless favored the reformers in his first term?

The nation has prospered under President Harrison, who has kept every personal pledge he has made, and while he may not be perfect—who is?—I believe that the verdict of the people, who remember that a president is not all powerful, and that all reforms promised by a party can not be accomplished in the brief period of four years, will be that he is entitled to and shall receive the endorsement of a re-election.

The speech at Indianapolis on the 15th inst. by George W. Julian, to which you give space in your last number, I regard as simply an example of what personal pique can do for a man, no matter how brilliant he may be when away from the subject of his grievances. Mr. Julian was an appointee under Cleveland and his remarks, which are full of a spirit of personal dislike for President Harrison, are not to be accounted altogether disinterested.

CIVIL SERVICE FAIR PLAY.

SPOILS AT LARGE.

One of the most acrimonious and bitter political fights in Onondaga's history is now on between the two factions of the republicans—the Beldenites and the Hendricks-Smithites. In the contest are involved the Standard, which supports Belden, and the Journal, Postmaster Smith's organ and the advocate of Col. George N. Crouse's canvass for congress. The attacks on both sides have been of the most virulent character, and the outcome will be the most vicious knifing. Although the war between Congressman Belden and Postmaster Carroll E. Smith dates back to war times, the present issue is on the call for the congressional convention. Belden gathered together the old congressional committees from Onondaga and Madison, her new political sister, on June 16, and called a convention for August 24 in this city. There will be 117 delegates from Onondaga and 42 from Madison.

The Hendricks-Smithites bolt this convention entirely, claiming that the state committee alone has power to call the congressional conventions, in view of the resolutions empowering them to organize the new congressional districts of the state, passed at the last state convention.

Belden claims that congressional nominations are a national matter, and entirely out of the jurisdiction of the state committee. On these lines Belden and Smith have been calling each other liar and scoundrel, until the party is wrought up to the highest pitch over the war of words. The matter will be fought out before the state committee at Albany next week, and it may be expected that neither party will give in without a supreme struggle.—Syracuse Dispatch to New York Times, June 26.

* * *

The Belden-Smith feud is still waging with unabated ardor, though probably there will be no pyrotechnics until the hearing before the sub-committee of the republican state committee in this city on July 8.

Both sides are busily organizing. On Thursday night a meeting of anti-Belden republican office-holders was held in the office of Collector Francis Hendricks, where the headquarters of Col. G. N. Crouse will be. The call was issued to all the republicans of Onondaga. Corporation Counsel Charles E. Ide announced that the purpose of the meeting was to organize for a fight against the renomination of James J. Belden. He said he presumed that all present were supporters of Col. Crouse, and asked any who were not to retire. Luther S. Merrick, a prominent republican and grand army of the republic man, arose and said that if it was that kind of a game they wanted to be counted out. Others followed this example and left the room.

Postmaster Carroll E. Smith was in charge, and made a speech assailing Congressmen Belden on every side. The conference lasted a long time, and considerable enthusiasm was shown. Col. Crouse was present.—Syracuse Dispatch to New York Times, July 3.

* * *

Col. George N. Crouse, who has been contesting the republican congressional nomination in this district against Representative Belden, has withdrawn from the fight, although one town caucus has been held. The sentiment for Belden was too strong, although Crouse was supported by Collector Hendricks, Senator Hiscock, Postmaster Smith, editor of the Journal, and other federal and city office-holders. Belden will be renominated by acclamation. The Hendricks machine in this county is thoroughly demoralized and Belden's influence promises to be supreme. The Journal has been fighting Belden with the greatest bitterness, even threatening to bolt his renomination, but it will probably desist from further open opposition before and after the renomination.—Syracuse Dispatch to New York Evening Post, July 22.

* * *

The first meeting which the republican city committee has held, called for the purpose of naming the time and places for holding the caucuses in the congressional election, was held to-night in the assembly room of the new city hall. It was the most disgraceful fracas of all the broils of the contest between Congressman James J. Belden and his opponents of the Hiscock-Hendricks [collector] ring. The shouts, hisses, groans and threats of the meeting could be heard at the hotels several blocks away and in the heat of the turmoil the delegates were standing on their seats yelling and calling for the blood of Clarence G. Brown, a Hiscock man, the chairman of the committee. The trouble began in the naming of substitutes. The Hiscock-Hendricks people offered a number of substitutes which the Beldenites openly declared to be forgeries.—Syracuse Dispatch to New York Times, July 28.

Senator Frank Hiscock and Collector of the Port of New York Francis Hendricks arrived in town to day, and Congressman J. J. Belden left after a brief conference with them. He has gone to his summer home in the St. Lawrence. The probable meaning thereof is that Hiscock and Hendricks have promised to keep their hands off Belden's canvass for the renomination to congress, and Belden in his goodness of heart has conceded to his opponents the supreme court judgeship. The last probability is strengthened by the fact that this afternoon Frank H. Hiscock, a nephew of the senator, came out as a candidate for the position, having previously held off Mr. White has been conducting a canvass for at least six weeks on the supposition that he was backed by Collector Hendricks. He has made the assertion openly. It is stated now that he will make the fight in spite of being thrown overboard by the Hiscock-Hendricks people.—Syracuse Dispatch to New York Times, August 6.

* * *

The appointment of Edward G. Harrison as postmaster to succeed A. R. Toland, who was appointed by ex-President Cleveland, stirred up a hornet's nest in the ranks of the republicans in this section. A majority of the workers favored Water Commissioner George W. Treat for the post. Ex-Assemblyman Oviatt, Gen. Sewell's lieutenant in this section, did not look favorably upon Treat's candidacy and sent in the name of John L. Coffin, formerly editor of the Journal. The two factions waged a bitter war for six months. Now that a dark horse has walked off with the prize, the Treat men are furious. Several leading republicans to-night denounced both Gen. Sewell and President Harrison, and a number of them declare openly that they will vote for Cleveland in November. Treat's friends say that they will disband the Young Men's Republican Club at the next meeting and pass resolutions denouncing Sewell and Harrison.—Asbury Park Dispatch to New York Times, July 15.

* * *

There is widespread dissatisfaction here among business men with the administration of the post-office by John T. Platt, who was appointed by President Harrison a year and a half ago. Platt combines with his post-office duties the light and airy job of writing editorials for the Poughkeepsie Eagle. He was appointed against the protest of the respectable republicans, who distrusted him because of his record in the assembly, where his name was often associated with the notorious Poughkeepsie bridge lobby. His first act when he received his appointment was to remove Deputy Postmaster Samuel Smith, a trusted official of thirty years' experience. In his place he put Ezra White, a general utility man who had been defeated for mayor by 500 votes. Smith died of a broken heart a few months after his removal. The local newspapers contain daily complaints of the laxness of the postal service. Mails are not distributed for two hours after they are received, and each one of the twenty-five employees seems to be a postmaster in himself. It is notorious that carriers leave in the office letters that take them any distance off their regular routes until it is convenient to deliver them.—Poughkeepsie Dispatch to New York World, August 18.

* * *

President Harrison's appointment of Grocer Kessler as postmaster at Short Hills has aroused the indignation of the residents of that suburban resort. When Short Hills was first laid out it was urged that a post-office would be a convenient thing to have, and that the railway station would be a convenient place for its location. So, at the request of the Short Hills residents, J. C. Goodrich, the station agent and telegraph operator, was named to take charge of it. Short Hills was a small place at that time. Its mail service was a small thing, even for a place of its limited population. It has grown since, and Mr. Goodrich has so improved the service that the post-office is now a presidential appointment, with $1,800 per year attached to it. The $1,800 tempted Grocer Kessler and he began circulating petitions for his appointment. The result is that President Harrison has just named him to succeed Mr. Goodrich. The residents agree that his store is not half as convenient a place as the station, and that he is not half as nice a man anyhow as Mr. Goodrich, and so they are all up in arms.—Newark Dispatch to New York Times, July 17.

FREDERICK ALMY, secretary of the Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association, 24 Law Exchange, Buffalo, New York, will be glad to get a copy of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for October, 1889, to complete the file of the association.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE continues its references to the part played by federal office holders in the campaign in order that the record may be as complete as possible. These same brisk fellows, paid by general taxation, and a couple of weeks ago such busy and brazen henchmen, are now so hump and apprehensive that they rather excite pity.

In other columns will be found taken from the Indianapolis Evening News a long list of those who "aspire" to federal offices from different localities in Indiana. Other lists are promised by the News in the future. The value of this service to the public can not be overestimated. The publication of the acts, facts, and motives which are always part of any scramble for spoil is the one thing that the scramblers do despise.

THE "best citizens" among the republicans are astounded and heartbroken at their defeat. But, as a matter of fact, these republicans have looked on with apparent indifference while their party in office was carrying out a wholesale violation of its promises. With a few exceptions, like Henry C. Lea, nothing seemed treacherous or scandalous enough to call for a protest. Mahoneism, Quayism, Plattism and Elkinsism were viewed with equanimity. The efforts of civil service reformers to keep the administration to its promises did not have the least support from these "best citizens." They looked on while Harrison manipulated and with offices bought his re-nomination, and then woke up with surprise because voters who had voted for him in 1888 would not vote for him again. These "best citizens" will have to learn that they have a duty to perform between elections. One of these duties is to see that the promises which they and their party have made are kept.

THE republican state committee of Indiana undoubtedly knowingly violated the law in its circular soliciting money from federal employes. The case of the postmaster at Ditney, Ind., is now in the hands of Attorney-general Miller. Almost all federal officers answered that circular with contributions. That, however, was not enough. All who made one contribution at once received the following communication, the words "favorably situated" in these circulars meaning that the recipients are in some office:

INDIANA REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE.
Rooms 4, 30 and 32, The Denison.
Telephone No. 1419.

INDIANAPOLIS, Oct. 29, 1892.

Dear Sir—We appreciate what you have done in the way of general work in this campaign, and thank you for whatever aid you have rendered the committee direct, but we must ask you for further assistance.

Indiana is a republican state. It must be kept where every business tie and interest places it—in the republican column. She, of all other states, should participate in the electoral college that will re-elect her worthy citizen, and retain the position she holds in the counsels of the government.

The result in the nation may depend upon this state. Let every republican do his duty. We know that you desire to be as industrious and as liberal as others as favorably situated, and that you wish to continue so worthy an administration. You will appreciate the importance of promptness at this hour.

May we not hear from you further?

Yours very truly,

FRANK M. MILLIKAN, Secretary.

THE President in no way failed more disgracefully than in the way in which he allowed United States marshals to prostitute their offices to party uses. Marshal Dunlap of Indiana was a typical example. In law he had the right to appoint deputies to keep the peace at the election. It is a dangerous power if in the hands of an unscrupulous man, and a marshal could have no higher duty than to act in this matter free from partisan bias. Marshal Dunlap made his appointments under the direction of republican politicians of the most obnoxious sort. He was ashamed to let the public know the names of his deputies. He did not know how many he was appointing, which makes it appear that he was appointing all of a certain class whose names were suggested by his party workers. He finally appointed five hundred and seventy-five, who will be paid ten dollars each for their services. They are reputed to have been among the class known as "doubtful." There was not the least need of appointing a single deputy and no one knew it better than Dunlap. The Indiana law requires deputy sheriffs from both parties at the polls. When asked if he would appoint any democrats, here is what this peace officer, who is paid by and who is supposed to act impartially for all the people, said:

Not a democrat. In business my office is run for the people, in politics it is managed solely for republicans.

MARSHAL JACOBUS appointed some five thousand deputies of a similar class in New York. Such reckless use of power is full of the gravest danger. It needs but a conflict between state and federal officers with a "strong" President to send troops to the support of his marshals and we have reached imperialism. Those who laugh at such fears should study the career of Balmaceda in Chili.

THE action of John I. Davenport, chief supervisor of elections at New York, is a clear illustration of the length to which desperate professional politicians in office will go. He sent out the following letter:

UP-TOWN OFFICE CHIEF SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS, {
501 FIFTH AVENUE, COR. FORTY-SECOND STREET, }
NEW YORK, October —, 1892.

SIR: Your right to register and vote in the 31 Election District of the 16 Assembly District of the city of New York has been questioned. By calling at this office you may be able to satisfactorily explain the matter and thus avoid further trouble.

Yours, etc.,

JOHN I. DAVENPORT, Chief Supervisor.

MARTIN NORTON, Esq., 400 East Fifty-fourth Street.

MORE flagrant or violent abuses of official position are rare in this country. Davenport had not a shadow of authority for such an action. It was a bold attempt to scare timid voters by unscrupulous and violent henchmen, openly encouraged by the administration.

THE Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post is informed that the President is considering whether it will not be "good politics" to extend the civil service rules only in a trifling way, and to trust that the democratic party will be wrecked by its rapacity for office. It was well known among Mr. Cleveland's friends in 1888 that whatever the results of the election, it was his intention to substantially extend the rules. It has been understood by President Harrison's friends for a long time that it was his intention after the recent election to materially extend the rules. It would have been better had Mr. Cleveland done his work earlier, and the same is true of President Harrison. It is hardly conceivable that the President will be so petty as to neglect this in order to annoy his successor.

INDIANA politics have always been notorious and interesting, and the recent campaign affords another illustration of the political backwardness of this state. The Columbia Club of Indianapolis is a powerful republican organization. It has a handsome club house with a dining-room to which the members might invite a young Boston republican with complacency. To belong to the club is a distinct social advantage. Its members call themselves, and they undoubtedly are, the "leading young men" of the city. To such a club, if anywhere, one would look for the best spirit of the republican party, that tendency "for reform within the party," of which much has been heard.

In Massachusetts the members of such a club would be the aggressive enemies of the spoils system. They would denounce the blackmailing of government employes. They would not view with indifference the methods by which Harrison's renomination was secured. They would remain republicans but they would not occupy a cowardly attitude in relation to the reform spirit said to exist among the better elements of the republican attitude. Has the Columbia Club any of that reform spirit, or is it organized as an aid to common, ordinary, every day ward politics?

A Philadelphia correspondent, thoroughly convinced that the use of the federal service as spoil is the most serious menace to free institutions, said to the writer in a recent private letter:

"The part that Tammany will play in this campaign, and the presence of Stevenson on the presidential ticket, makes it to my mind extremely doubtful that the interest of good government will best be served by the success of the democratic ticket."

He says in effect, we are now under the heel of Quay, Dave Martin, Hackett and Platt, and a change will only substitute the heel of Tammany. Our correspondent should not forget that the greatest obstacles to successfully throwing off tyranny are the apathy and acquiescence of the subjects. Especially in Pennsylvania is any effort for relief hampered by the fact that the present generation has never known any other condition than servitude under a Cameron dynasty or its successor, Quay. But aside from the valuable habit of frequent revolts against bosses, many of us think that if we must carry a boss, it lightens the weight to shift the load; that it is no worse to be spoiled by a Tammany than by a Quay and that, moreover, every time a boss is beaten he is weakened.

If any one can point out in detail the way by which the republican vampires who have for years been draining the life of the republican party can be destroyed by the method, which is our correspondent's, of the supply of fresh carcass, it ought to be done.

ANOTHER correspondent says: "I have, myself, little faith that the democratic party will do any better for the civil service than the republicans did." This has been for years a typical attitude of a large number of people and it has more impeded reform than hostility to it. The question is what course will in the long run most effectually kill patronage. The answer seems clear—sharp and immediate punishment to the offender now, four years from now, again in eight years, and again in twelve years if the lesson has not been learned before.

But what is going to be the immediate effect upon the civil service reform movement provided the democratic party should do no better than the late republican party? The answer to that seems equally plain if experience goes for anything. Spoil was divided in 1884, and again in 1888 and each time it was an object lesson that did ten-fold more to arouse popular disgust for the spoils system than all the efforts of all the civil service reformers. If there should be another distribution of spoils in 1892, the President who permitted it would violate his oath of office and he and his party would suffer; but the reform of the civil service would in fact go on the faster.

THE DEMOCRATIC CHANCE.

The democrats have on various grounds won a great victory. The situation has nowhere been better summed up than by the Indianapolis Sentinel, which realizes that more than one thing brought it about. No one can yet say that the democratic party is equal to its time and its opportunity, but it gives such promise that it is entitled to the chance. If now the democrats regulate the tariff in a way that pleases the greatest number of Americans and yet turn the civil service over to their Quays and Platts, and put their party in an attitude of opposition to the civil service law and civil service reform, their majority will all be worn away and they will be defeated in 1896. The reason is that enough voters to turn the scale have an irreconcilable hatred of being ruled by bosses, and of the use of the civil service as spoil. The lessons of the defeats of 1884, 1886, 1888, 1890 and 1892 may be read by all. No party in power can stand the grinding power of public criticism of its prostitution of the civil service to personal and party ends.

The democrats so far bear their victory well. It is only in republican papers that the democrats are going to set up wildcat banks, destroy our manufactures, and repeal the civil service law. A repeal of the civil service law would be about like the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Under the present administration six republican congressmen introduced bills to repeal that law and the whole six went into private life at the next election—not solely for this reason but this was one of the reasons.

For three successive presidential elections the party which has had the offices has been defeated. Yet we shall hear once more, though probably not to such an extent, the exploded argument that the offices are essential to party success, and about the Boys with cold toes, and so on. Mr. Cleveland is in a position to smile grimly at all such nonsense. In fact, he is in a position to reform the civil service to almost any extent he desires. His platform makes the simple statement that the civil service law shall be enforced; that the offices ought not to be subject to change at every election, or be a brief reward of party zeal, or be a prize fought for at the polls. This covers the whole ground, and good faith requires that matters be put in such shape that the principles of the platform will be permanently established. The further this is carried the stronger the party will be at the end of four years.

It does not seem possible that further attempts to trick the civil service law will be made, or that the new commission will be less efficient, aggressive and fearless than the present one. It ought to be a sine qua non that heads of offices within the law shall be friendly to it. Beyond this a few measures will complete the reform of the federal civil service. The first is the passage of a bill introduced by John F. Andrew, a democrat, taking the fourth-class postmasters out of politics. The second is the passage of a bill, also introduced by Mr. Andrew, establishing the Boston labor service system in the federal labor service. The third is the addition by the President to the classified service of the remainder of the federal service which is capable of being put under competition. About 35,000 places are now under the rules, and probably 25,000 more can go under. These include a large number of places like heads of divisions in the departments at Washington, and in large offices throughout the country. These are now used to quarter political hacks upon the people, and these political hacks are usually ignorant of the law and of their duties, and are, in most cases, enemies of the merit system. Such appointments are like choosing collectors of customs from professional smugglers. These places should be thrown open to competition among the under employes, from whose numbers better men can be obtained than have ever filled them yet.

When President Harrison, before his inauguration, was urged to adopt a plan of reform, he declared that he would have none, but would deal with each matter as it came up. We see where this led to. The greatest danger before Mr. Cleveland would be in having no plan of dealing with the gravest questions that will be presented to him—the demand for spoil—and it will be presented at once. There is no half-way ground. To substitute party workers for party workers, in office, is mere favoritism. Such a gift of offices has been for all time the most conspicuous mark of arbitrary government.

The incalculable value of a secret ballot has been made plainer than ever. It has seemingly destroyed the business of actual buying and selling votes at the polls in Indiana. Some slight changes will make voting much more satisfactory. The law is designed to make "scratching" difficult, but the politicians may as well give up trying to compel voters. Independent voting is happily going to increase, not diminish. The voter is now compelled to stamp opposite the name of every candidate for whom he wants to vote. Where there are thirty or forty candidates on each ticket this is a needlessly tedious and care-requiring operation. Usually one ticket contains the majority of a voter's candidates. He should be allowed to stamp the head of this ticket and then the names of candidates on the other tickets for whom he wants his vote counted. If he will vote for none of the candidates for a given office he should be required to stamp them all out. Again, the booths are too small. There is plenty of room and plenty of lumber, and there is no reason why a voter should not have elbow-room and a shelf wide enough to lay his ticket on. There will be a good deal of talk by the enemies of the system about the number who lost their votes by mistakes in stamping. This number will steadily decrease, and even now it is not so large as the number who formerly sold their votes.

"Steve" Elkins is seeking to justify his appointment as secretary of war by working night and day for the success of the national republican ticket in West Virginia. Since Mr. Harrison was nominated Elkins has spent but little time at the war department, and about every matter of importance there is left pending. "Until after the election" has become a common expression at the department in connection with inquiries concerning the secretary's absence. How very necessary the republicans deemed the polling of every possible vote is shown by the fact that on Saturday last the employes of the sub-treasury in this city were peremptorily ordered to go to the polls yesterday and cast their votes for the republican candidates.

They were informed that their positions in the treasury depended on their doing their whole duty, and that the defeat of the republican ticket meant that their places would be taken by Tammany men. The orders were given without any attempt to gloss things over.

One man who has been in the treasury for over a dozen years said that this was the first time that he had ever been instructed or even asked to vote since he has been in the employ of the government.--New York Times, November 9.

BUSY BLACKMAILERS.

H. G. Ewart, ex-republican congressman from North Carolina, was in Charleston last week soliciting funds for the national republican campaign committee from federal office-holders in this city. He kept very quiet, but had many conferences with office-holders here.

The following is a copy of the letter sent by Ewart to office-holders:

CHARLESTON, S. C., Oct. —, 1892.

DEAR SIR--Your name has been given me by our friends here as one likely to aid the cause. You must appreciate its importance. Funds are urgently needed, and at once. Please be prompt. Delay is tantamount to refusal. That you have already rendered local aid is no reason or excuse for not assisting in this, which is of far greater importance than local contests.

I inclose certificate No. —, which I am assured you will take. If so, please fill in name and address, and mail with amount, — dollars, to me as per address given below. If not taken, return certificate at once to the same address, unless it is convenient for you to pay the amount by Nov. 1, in which event retain the certificate till that date. A favorable and immediate answer is expected. Yours respectfully,

P. S.—If certificate has been sent you, will you be kind enough to either refund at once or return the same?

An assessment circular, which must have had the approval of the republican national committee, has been sent to the departmental employes in Washington by the republican state committee of West Virginia. A copy of it fell into the hands of a democrat, who forwarded it to the democratic national committee, together with an explanatory letter.

The "stand and deliver" circular follows. Note the bulldozing postscript and the threat of dismissal it contains:

WEST VIRGINIA REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE, 32 TENTH STREET, WHEELING, WEST VA., Sept. 8, 1892.

DEAR SIR--The prospects for republican success in West Virginia are most excellent. We confidently expect to win. It is now simply a question of securing means wherewith to complete the splendid organization begun. If we are enabled to do that success is sure. We solicit from you a contribution of $——. This will cover all your contributions to the national, congressional and other political committees. We are in urgent need of funds now. If you will help us, do so at once. Send remittances to P. B. Dobbins, treasurer, Wheeling, West Va., who will acknowledge receipt. Hoping you will assist us at once, and substantially, we are, yours very respectfully, WILLIAM M. DAWSON, Chairman.

G. W. ATKINSON, Secretary.

N. B. SCOTT, Member of National Committee.

P. S.—Do you think you can afford to ignore the suggestion of this committee?

Some one in Ohio, who signed himself "A Friend," forwarded to Mr. Theodore Roosevelt copies of two circulars sent by the Ohio republican state committee to a government clerk, calling for contributions. The name of the person addressed, presumably the author of the anonymous letter, was cut out, so that the commission might not profit by it. The circulars show that Chairman Dick, of the Ohio state committee, has been violating the spirit, if not the letter, of the civil service law. If they were addressed to the clerk at his place of employment, Dick can be proceeded against.

The first circular was as follows:

DEAR SIR: The republican executive committee of Ohio, which has been actively at work for the past two months, finds itself at this stage of the campaign greatly in need of funds, and is obliged to call upon republicans throughout the state for contributions to carry on its work. The prosperity of the whole country depends upon the continued success of the republican party. As an individual, you are interested in the party's success, and as such we ask you for a contribution to aid this committee in the furtherance of its work.

This is the only request that will be made of you by any committee, therefore an early response, with a liberal contribution, will be thankfully received and acknowledged, and, as promptness in our business is of the utmost importance, we will be pleased to hear from you at once. Yours truly,

CHARLES W. F. DICK, Chairman.

JOHN R. MOLLOY, Secretary.

(Remit to C. W. F. Dick, or, if more convenient, pay in person to W. H. Campbell, 36 West Third street, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Evidently the person solicited believed in the assurances of the civil service commission, for he made no reply, as the following circular shows:

DEAR SIR—Nearly five weeks ago we wrote you requesting a contribution to the republican campaign fund. Our books show to that request you have not responded. A number of your associates in the public service have replied to our letter, and hold our receipts as evidence of their fidelity to the cause and interest in the success of the party under whose administration they are holding positions. It is due them, and to you as well, that all should share alike in the legitimate expense of the campaign.

In this campaign Ohio is compelled to take care of herself, and if those who are direct beneficiaries of public positions do not contribute, it is unreasonable to expect non-office-holders to do so. We again call on you for a reasonable contribution, and hope you will not delay in sending it, for which we will mail you a receipt and give you due credit on our books.

We would be pleased to have your reply at once.

Respectfully, C. W. F. DICK, Chairman.

JOHN R. MALLOY, Secretary.

The Times's correspondent was informed here to-day that the chairman of the republican committee had assessed the office-holders in Jefferson county to the amount of over $10,000. Every postmaster and custom house employe has been asked to contribute from 5 to 20 per cent. of his salary. The campaign fund derived from the post-office in this city alone will amount to over $1,400. Every letter carrier in the city has been assessed $40, and even the janitor of the federal building has been asked to stand and deliver $50 for campaign expenses. In several instances where contributions have been delayed, the victims not being willing to submit to the demands, threats of removal have been made to force payment. These threats have come from the republican managers and not from the superiors of the men assessed.—Watertown, N. Y., Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 21.

One of the office holders to whom this circular was sent was Postmaster Preston E. Terry, Terryville, Suffolk county. Mr. Terry is a prominent prohibitionist, but he was lucky enough four years ago to be appointed postmaster at Terryville by the republicans.

Treasurer Samuel Thomas' circular reached Postmaster Terry on August 5 last. It asked, practically, for a share of his salary for campaign purposes.

Mr. Terry made up his mind that no one had a right to assess him in that way. He not only refused to deliver up, but sent word back to Gen. Thomas that he would not contribute.

Now, mark the speed with which the National government avenged itself upon Postmaster Terry. Before September 1 Mr. Terry received notice that his services were no longer required. He was dismissed from office.

Naturally, he was desirous of knowing what had caused his dismissal, and he wrote to the post-office department at Washington about it. What satisfaction he got can be found in the following letter received by Postmaster Terry:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER, GENERAL APPOINTMENT DIVISION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 7, 1892.

SIR: Your communication of the 27th ult. relative to the recent appointment at Terryville has been received. In reply, you are informed that it would not be practicable for the department to enter upon written discussions of its causes for changes. Very respectfully,

E. G. RATHBONE,

Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

To Mr. P. E. TERRY.

An edict went forth a few days ago that the postal employes should make some contribution to the republican campaign fund. Accordingly yesterday the local republican county committee issued a circular which was sent to every person employed in the postal service. The assessment is 10 per cent. of the year's salary. Thus the clerks in the post-office who receive from $400 to $900 a year are assessed from $40 to $90. The carriers, who get from $600 to $1,000 per annum, are mulched $60 to $100, and so on up to the $400 assessment of the postmaster himself.—Buffalo Dispatch to New York Times, Nov. 2.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., October 19, 1892.

DEAR SIR—In order that we may win the election in November, it is of vital importance that we have funds with which to thoroughly organize our friends throughout the state.

It will be necessary to have each county thoroughly canvassed, and to do so it will require a number of speakers whose expenses will have to be paid by this committee.

If you are in sympathy with the movement to elect the nominee of the convention held at Lake View, near Birmingham, on the 15th ultimo, we respectfully ask that you contribute the sum of $50, which is the amount assessed you by the campaign committee.

Send the money by registered mail or post-office money-order to L. W. Willis. By the same mail please notify E. M. Smith at Montgomery, Ala., that you have done so, and state the amount sent. Very truly yours,

BEN DE LEMOS,

Secretary Republican Campaign Committee.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., October 28, 1892.

DEAR SIR—Some days since you were notified by the committee that you are assessed fifty dollars, to which no reply has been received. Your attention is again called to this matter, as you have had a sufficient time to make a reply.

The position which you have held under this administration has paid you sufficiently to have justified a demand for four times this amount.

This committee keeps a list of subscribers, showing the amount of money contributed opposite their names. We must insist that the amount requested of you be transmitted as directed in this letter, forthwith, the sum of which is $50.00.

If no reply is received by or before November 6, 1892, it will be considered sufficient evidence of your refusal to contribute as requested.

Send the money by registered mail or money-order to L. W. Willis, Montgomery, Ala., and notify by same mail E. M. Smith, post-office box 634, Montgomery, Ala., of the amount you have sent, that the same may be credited on the pay roll of public officials of this state.

Treasurer of Republican Campaign Committee.—New York Evening Post, Nov. 3.

HEADQUARTERS OF REPUBLICAN ADVISORY COMMITTEE, ROOM 108, IMPERIAL HOTEL.
BALTIMORE, Oct. 29, 1892.

At a meeting of this committee and city members of the republican state central committee, held on the above date, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, There is a large number of persons holding office in Washington and accredited to Maryland as republicans, many of whom do not vote or reside in Maryland; now, therefore,

Resolved, That the committee heretofore appointed to receive contributions from those holding office in Washington who are accredited to Maryland be instructed to communicate with such office holders and inform them that it is the sense of this committee that republicans holding office should help to bear the campaign expenses of their state, and a refusal on their part to do so will justify this committee in asking that their places be filled by more useful republicans.

Inclosed with this circular was the following notice, addressed to the person in each case to whom the circulars were sent:

"The committee will be at 737 North Capitol street, on Tuesday, Nov. 1, between the hours of 11 and 5 o'clock, to receive contributions. Frank G. Duhurst, William T. Roberts, committee."—New York Times, November 3.

A BUSY CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26, 1892.

To the Honorable Attorney-General:

SIR—The commissioner forwards herewith a copy of testimony taken by it in reference to an alleged effort by Samuel Thomas, treasurer of the republican state committee of New York, to assess employes in the treasury department, Washington, together with the original letters, envelopes, and enclosures sent to three of the employes, marked exhibits A 1, 2, 3; B 1, 2, 3, and C 1, 2, 3.

It appears that H. A. Dobson, Luther W. Covill and Andrew H. Stamp are clerks in the sixth auditor's office; that on or about 21st of October, as shown by the postmark of the Washington post-office on the letters in question, Messrs. Dobson, Covill and Stamp received each a letter from the republican state committee of New York. This letter was printed, the signature "Samuel Thomas, Treasurer," being also in print, and it had at its head the names of the chairman of the executive committee, the treasurer, the secretary, and the chief clerk of the committee. It contained a request for a contribution to defray the legitimate and necessary expenses of the campaign in New York. No amount was specified for contribution, the request merely being for such amount as the receiver might choose to give. Inclosed was a stamped envelope with on it, in printing, the address "Samuel Thomas, Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York City." The head-line for the address in the printed letter was filled in in writing, in one case with the name "Andrew H. Stamp," in another with the name of "Luther W. Covill," in the other with that of "H. A. Dobson." The envelopes were addressed: "Andrew H. Stamp, Washington, D. C., Treasury Department;" "Luther W. Covill, Washington, D. C., Treasury Department," and "H. A. Dobson, Washington, Treasury Department." It appears that there is no H. A. Dobson in the treasury department, but that Mr. H. A. Dobson frequently receives mail thus addressed. In the case of Mr. Stamp and in the case of Mr. Covill, however, the address is correct.

It thus appears that the New York state republican committee has sent letters, signed in print with the name of Samuel Thomas, treasurer of the committee, to certain New York clerks in the departments at Washington, these letters being addressed to them at the treasury department, which is, of course, a government building, and containing stamped and addressed envelopes in which their contributions could be sent back to Samuel Thomas at New York. Clearly, therefore, the New York state committee, through Samuel Thomas, and whoever had been concerned in addressing the letters, has been soliciting by letter government employes in a building occupied in the discharge of official duties. The commission has always held that the prohibition to solicit, "in any manner, whatever," in a government building, includes solicitation by letter. It is, therefore, of the opinion that the offense committed by Samuel Thomas, and perhaps other members of the republican state committee of New York, comes under section 12 of the civil service act, and has the honor to forward the papers to you for such action as you may deem best.

Very respectfully,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,

Acting President.

Attorney General Miller, when questioned on the subject this afternoon, said he had just received the papers in the case, and had not yet had time to examine them. He added that he would investigate this particular case himself, but certainly would not act until Mr.

Thomas had full opportunity to answer the charges against him.—New York Times, Oct. 1.

* * *

Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt forwarded this communication to the attorney-general's office to-day:

"SIR—The commission directs me to inclose to you a copy of the report and testimony taken by the secretary of the commission, Mr. Doyle, in an investigation held at Watertown, N. Y., by the direction of the commission.

"It appears from this that DeWitt C. Middleton, the chairman of the republican county committee in Jefferson, has been engaged in an effort to assess the federal employes in the post-offices in Jefferson county, having attempted to collect very large sums of money from them. Subsequently, when it was announced in the papers that the commission would investigate the facts an effort was made to withdraw these circulars. It does not appear that any money was contributed in response to them and the secretary of the commission, Mr. Doyle, states that it has even been decided that no money will be received from the officers and employes at the post-office at Watertown. It does not appear that Mr. Middleton is responsible for this latter action, and it will be observed that he repeated the solicitation on October 15, the first letter having been written on Sept. 19.

"The commission has been able to get but one of the envelopes in which the circulars were sent. This is the one addressed to the postmaster and is addressed "E. M. Gates, city." It was delivered to him at the post-office. The postmaster furnished frankly all the information in his power. It was more difficult to obtain it from some of the other employes, and the commission does not feel competent to decide whether the circulars making the assessments can be considered as directed to the employes in a government building or not, nor does it feel that it would be advisable for it to continue further the investigation, in view of its inability to administer oaths and summons witnesses.

"It appears, however, beyond question, that a resolute attempt was made to assess the federal employes, and that the letters containing the assessment circulars were delivered in the government building. The commission turns the papers over to your office for such action as you may deem wise in the premises.—New York Times, Nov. 3.

* * *

The civil service commission have sent to the attorney-general copies of a circular sent to C. K. Ketcham, the postmaster at Ditney, Ind., and of a letter written by this postmaster to the editor of the Nonconformist.

"It appears from this circular," says the commission in its letter to the attorney-general, "that John K. Gowdy, the chairman of the Indiana state committee, has sent a letter to Mr. Ketcham, this letter being addressed to him as the postmaster at Ditney, Ind. In this letter request is made for funds to insure republican success, the letter stating in one place the legitimate expenses must be met, and in another, 'the success of the ticket is involved as well as the pleasant conditions about you.' It would certainly appear that in addressing the letter to C. K. Ketcham as postmaster at Ditney, Mr. Gowdy has been guilty of soliciting him in a government building. The papers are also turned over to your office for such action as you may deem wise."—Associated Press Dispatch, Nov. 6.

THE ONSLAUGHT.

FT. WAYNE.—Charles A. Zollinger is named as a candidate for the postmastership, but it is said he prefers to be state pension agent, which he held during Cleveland's former administration. Wright W. Rockhill, one of the proprietors of the Ft. Wayne Journal, wants to be postmaster. John H. Winge-mach, principal of the Lutheran schools, is a candidate. P. J. Fallon is talked of as having a promise of the deputy postmastership. Montgomery Hamilton, one of Congressman McNagney's hardest workers, wants the Heidelberg consulate. Andrew J. Moynihan, editor of the Journal, is talked of for an Irish consulate. Wm. Kaough, ex postmaster, wants something, he is not particular what. Louis Jacquiel thinks he (Jacquiel), should have the post-office. W. P. Denny will be pushed for a place in the patent office at Washington. P. W. Schader has aspirations for a place in the attorney-general's office. Thomas Mannix, who looked after the mail transfer agency four years ago at the depot, is sure of reappointment. Clarence Edsall, clerk of democratic headquarters, and Joseph Cope are candidates for government clerkships. Over one hundred men have already made the rounds of politicians to secure places in the post-office and government building.

EVANSVILLE.—August Brentano, Jack Nolan, and James D. Saunders are the conspicuously-named candidates for the post-office, with Nolan having much the strongest following. Thomas C. Bridwell has an eye upon the revenue collectorship. He has just closed a losing campaign for county clerk. Joseph Cox, of Howell's Station, is after the position of surveyor of customs. He held the place under Cleveland four years ago. Captain F. M. Dougherty is looking after the supervising inspectorship, but there will be several more applicants.

GOSHEN.—The great scramble here is for the post-office. Elias Gortner was the first to spring into the arena with a petition which is being numerously signed. Mr. Gortner has a son-in-law, J. C. Beck, jr., in the mail service. J. C. Beck, sr., is also a full-fledged candidate, and so is Thomas A. Starr, who rendered Congressman-elect Conn great assistance. Mr. Starr is the Goshen Times' candidate, while Martin V. Starr, also a candidate, is supposed to be backed by the Goshen News. J. A. Beane, of the Goshen Democrat, will also be pushed forward. D. L. Miller and Milton Galentine are candidates and there is a possibility that J. A. Arthur will be sprung as a dark horse. The struggle for this place overshadows all other possible gifts by the incoming administration just at present.

ANDERSON.—For the postmastership John Baker, the Adams express agent; B. B. Campbell, deputy county clerk, and George Beehe, secretary of the democratic central committee, will contest. C. K. McCullough, whose name has been mentioned in Washington dispatches in connection with controller of the currency, is not a candidate, and his friends think that springing his name is only intended to sidetrack him and get him out of the way of some good home appointment. James J. Netterville, John L. Forkner, D. F. Mustard and W. R. Myers will control the patronage in this county, while A. C. Davis a House employe, will be pretty close to Mr. Bynum when it comes to naming men for places at Washington.

COLUMBUS.—Wirt Hord, formerly of Indianapolis, and financial secretary of the Gray club, is a candidate for government printer under the Cleveland administration. Bud King wants a position in the government printing office. The list of would-be postmasters includes Col. H. Daily, of Mexican war fame, Capt. G. E. Finney, ex-editor of the Herald; David Stobo, ex-county recorder; the Hon. W. S. Swengel; C. M. Spencer, ex-mayor; W. W. Stader, ex-mayor; John Mahoney, ex-city treasurer; George King, jr., ex-recorder Jackson county

Jas. F. Toohey, proprietor St. Denis hotel; C. Cooper, city attorney; Thos. A. Rush; John Carr, councilman; and Dr. Barrett, ex-state senator.

NEW CASTLE.—For the post-office, so far as heard from, Sam Arnold, Ed Smith, T. A. Balser, D. A. Tracy, P. M. Gillies, C. F. Sudworth, Dr. Kissell, John Heichart, Col. John Mulford and Julia Loer. Thos. Bogot has his eye on the mission to Norway and Sweden; James Brown wants very badly to go to Rome; John Branch would like a good clerkship, and Col. Reuben Barr is looking out for a good thing in the treasury department, something about the size of first auditor. There are others aspiring to clerkships in the postal service.

GREENSBURG.—Cicero Northern, the only democrat elected to the mayoralty of this city for the past ten years, is a candidate for postmaster. John Lugenbell, a party orator, same case. Col. Hugh Gallagher, defeated candidate for county treasurer, was Cleveland's agent at Pine Ridge. He will not ask to be reinstated. Abel Ewing, who recently resigned the position of deputy warden in the prison south, will demand recognition. James E. Mendenhall, ex-editor of the New Era, is a candidate for collector of revenue. He will have the backing of Congressman Holman and the entire party machinery of this quarter of the state. W. J. Johnston wants to be city postmaster, J. W. Fletcher gauger. Hal Hamilton, a recent convert from the people's party, and who made the race for prosecuting attorney, wants to go into the attorney-general's office. Ex-State Senator Cortez Ewing, chairman democratic county central committee, son-in-law of Governor-elect Matthews, is timid about making his wants known, but will enter for something. Editor Clark, of the New Era; Thos. H. Greenfield, Riley Billings, Lewis Wallace, Davison Wilson, H. C. Sandusky and Ale Howard will seek recognition of some sort. Benj. Jenkins, of St. Paul; Sanford Grayson, of Westport; James Tarplee, of Clarksburg, and Fred Wolfe, of Newport, expect to be rewarded for political services.

MT. VERNON.—The principal office of emolument in Posey county is the post-office here, and Col. A. A. Sparks, editor Daily Democrat; J. M. Harlem, chairman democratic county committee; J. C. Leffel, editor the Star; Enoch E. Thomas, ex-mayor; Captain Silas P. Jones and Henry Yunker are already avowed candidates. Col. J. W. Hiatt, of New Harmony, wants an appointment at Washington, waiting for a copy of the "Blue Book" before making a selection. V. M. Courtwright, an old soldier, and ex-county recorder, it is said, wants to be special pension examiner.

NEW ALBANY.—The main topic is the successor to Postmaster Walter B. Godfrey. Charles W. Schindler, recorder of Floyd county, is an avowed candidate. During the campaign he was Congressman Brown's right-hand man, and it is said that Brown will urge his appointment. Schindler's term as recorder does not expire for two years yet, but he has already secured signatures to his petition to be appointed postmaster. Postmaster Godfrey does not anticipate being removed before July next. Sheriff John Thornton, whose term expires next week, is looking toward the post-office with its $2,400 salary and $300 as custodian of the custom-house. Adam Heimberger, a young democratic leader, is being urged for the same place. Thomas Hanlon, chairman democratic county committee, is the only applicant for internal revenue collector, a position now held by Joseph Throop, with headquarters at Terre Haute. Hanlon admirably managed the campaign, and is believed to be backed by Senator Voorhees. Hanlon was appointed collector in 1885 through Voorhees' influence, but after holding the position for one year the United States Senate refused to confirm the appointment. This was due to the opposition of Senator Harrison, who claimed that Hanlon was incompetent.

VINCENNES.—Royal E. Purcell, editor of the Vincennes Sun, is an applicant for the post-office. Dexter Gardner is also a candidate. Patrick Kelleher and John M. Berry are aspirants for agricultural agent of Indiana, to succeed Daniel Alton.

RICHMOND.—The post-office with its salary of $3,000 per annum is sought by the Hon. Luther M. Mering, defeated candidate for congress; John H. Rolling, a zealous worker; John P. Thistlewaite, ex-mayor, and Henry Cutler. Frank Elder could have the place, but he is provided for. John H. Macks, a former collector, and W. K. Young, deputy oil inspector, want to be collector of internal revenue. Judge L. C. Abbott, nothing special in view, would like to be United States district attorney.

KENTLAND.—For the post-office, C. F. Wittenberg, W. J. Cunningham, W. T. Drake and J. B. Howe. Public sentiment leads to Wittenberg, but the chances favor Cunningham because of zealous party work. J. T. Sanderson is mentioned as a candidate in the future for United States judge; is a life-long friend of Senator Turpie, and in 1844 was a candidate for territorial judge.

HUNTINGTON.—For the post-office, J. M. Wright, A. J. Roscbrough and N. A. Myers, old soldiers, have a goodly following. The railway men are understood to be supporting James Claybaugh, who is employed by the Chicago & Erie line. John J. Young, a retired business man, has the office in view. J. A. W. Kintz will probably present himself as a candidate for collector of revenue in the sixth district.

ENGLISH.—Mrs. Melissa Bird is a candidate for postmistress; no opposition. William J. McDermott will seek position as proof-reader in the public printing department. Ed Wells wants to be postmaster at Bird's Eye, and Joshua Holland at Taswell. George W. Balthis will seek similar recognition at Marengo. John V. Benz, of Harrison county, will be pushed for collector of revenue in the seventh district, while William L. Gregory, it is understood, will stand for postmaster at Grantsburg.

HARTFORD CITY.—Dr. Henry C. Davison, who was pension examiner under Cleveland, wants his old appointment. Dr. W. N. Cronin is also an applicant. James Ozenbaugh, an old soldier, and James Kenney, as well as a host of minor lights, wants the post-office.

GREENCASTLE.—Willis G. Neff wants the post-office. He was the first appointee under the former Cleveland administration, Geo. J. Langsdale resigning before expiration of term rather than serve under Cleveland. Rival candidates are W. B. Vestal, chairman of the Democratic central committee; Louis Steeg, Ed Haneman, T. C. Grooms and Judge Bachelder. Putnam has a candidate for speaker of the Indiana house in the person of the Hon. Frank D. Ader, joint representative-elect of the counties of Clay, Putnam and Montgomery. Dr. N. G. Smith will be presented for appointment as adjutant-general.

CRAWFORDSVILLE.—Walter Hulet will be pushed for internal revenue collector. He is a warm personal friend of Congressman Brookshire. James Wright, John A. Booe and William E. Henkle are conspicuously mentioned for the post-office.

LOGANSPOUT.—Three strong candidates for the post-office are V. C. Hanawalt, chairman of the democratic county committee; B. F. Lonthain, editor of the Logansport Pharos, and T. J. Immei, a prominent business man. It is said that H. D. Hattery, the presidential elector from this district, will have the naming of the man, and he is quoted as saying that if it becomes too difficult to decide, he will take it himself. The Hon. D. P. Baldwin, formerly a republican, is prominently mentioned for a good consulate. Dr. H. J. Banta, ex-republican, and formerly agent of the Mescalero Indians, is said to be booked for a good paying agency in return for his democratic campaigning. Wiles Berry, an artist, wants something. The Hon. J. C. Nelson, beaten by Chase for lieutenant-governor, and C. N. Graffis, deputy county auditor, will seek recognition. A. D. Fansler, Frank Riley, and H. H. Six, among the younger democrats, have the first call for clerkships.

SHELBYVILLE.—Squire L. Major, who held the post-office under Cleveland, it is understood, will not refuse a second term. A relative of his, Mr. William J. Buxton, ex-county recorder and for two years chairman of the county central committee, is an avowed candidate for the place. So is ex-Mayor John W. Vannoy. Judge K. M. Hord, who managed Congressman Holman's campaign in Shelby county in the nominating convention against Bellamy S. Sutton, favors Vannoy. Edward A. Major, present city clerk and son of the late Judge Steven Major, is after the same office. Mr. Major, as secretary, practically managed the campaign in this county two years ago.

CONNERSVILLE.—Applicants for the post office: William Merrill, chairman of county central committee; John M. Higgs, editor Connorsville Examiner, and Elder Charles M. Reed, a medicinal agent. Dr. Joshua Whitwood wants to be minister to some place where the German language is spoken. E. J. Smith, attorney, will take a clerkship; so also Alf Hatchlas, secretary of the local democracy. A. M. Mayer would like to get into the post-office. James L. Miller wants the deputy-postmastership. George Mayers, Willard Walley, Charles Hires, Michael Gillespie and Vincent Gibes want to be mail carriers. Dudley Murphy and James Downs want to be revenue collector. Thomas J. Higgs wants a department clerkship.

MADISON.—Judge John R. Craveus and the Hon. C. A. Worby are named for foreign missions. Candidates for postmaster: Ex-Mayor Joseph T. Brash-ear, Capt. Jos. C. Abbott, Ed G. Nicklaus, A. S. Chapman, editor of the Democrat; John Adams, proprietor of the Herald; John McGregor, Simeon E. Leland, Mrs. Bessie H. Woolford, C. I. Branham, John W. Scott and G. K. Lodge. Congressman Brown says that the democrats of Madison must decide on one before he will make a recommendation. Thomas Gavin is mentioned for deputy revenue collector. Fergus Cochran is a candidate for superintendent of construction of the new public building here, and Ben Serling for surveyor. Fred Schran, Alex Cochran, Thomas Leland, Michael Hughes, Andrew Steinhardt, Will White and others want to be mail-carriers.

LIBERTY.—For postmaster, Theo. Miller, John Maley, Geo. W. Pigman, Luther Leonard, Charles A. Drapier and Dr. W. W. Shriner. Railway mail service, William Driggs, Will Hamilton wants a place at Washington. Thomas Pentecost, of College Corner, wants to join the revenue service.

MARION.—Post-office, Clarence E. Hawkins and W. J. Houck, of the Marion Leader, defeated for senator by O. A. Baker. Mr. Hawkins served four years as a mail clerk under Cleveland, and did good work as chairman of the county central committee. Charles Kile, of the Leader; Gilbert Wilson and Miles Murphy are also aspirants. Dr. Marshall Shiveley served on the pension board under Cleveland, and it is believed he will again hold the place. Dr. Hubbard and Dr. Kimball are also mentioned.

GOSPORT.—For the post-office petitions are already circulated, but it is thought it will take a local election to decide. Aspirants include W. D. Deitrich, Clinton L. Wampier, Dr. F. V. Stucky, Joseph P. Gentry, James Chenoweth and Chas. M. Rogers. Luther U. Downey and Edward S. Davis are expecting some favor of Cleveland. Edward F. Graham wants to be clerk in the post-office. Dr. J. W. Smith, Dr. J. M. Stucky, Dr. C. A. Pritchard and Dr. Ben Fox hope to be appointed on the pension examining board.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Isaac P. Gray wants something good. S. E. Morss is credited with a willingness to succeed John C. New as consul-general to London. William E. English wants to be sent abroad. William F. Christian will ask for the Indianapolis post-office. Lewis Jordan wants any good paying position. Richard Herrick, of the state committee rooms, wants any $3,000 a year place. Thomas Colbert, present superintendent of police, wants to be United States marshal in case Edward Hawkins is not a candidate. Mr. Hawkins says he does not want the place again. He will probably be a candidate for mayor and will give way to others seeking federal recognition. John Steeg, present secretary of the board of public safety, wants to be collector of customs. So does August Kuhn, who was collector under Cleveland before. So does A. Abromet. Charley Taylor wants any fat place about the federal building. There are two or three hundred ward workers who will ask for places in this building or at Washington. John W. Kern would like to succeed Smiley Chambers as district attorney. So would Leon Bailey. The few colored men in Indianapolis who worked for and voted with the democratic party in the recent election will be disappointed unless they are rewarded. "There are more than two thousand places, paying from $1,000 to $2,000, held by colored men, such as chaplains in the United States army, timber agents, land agents, heads of bureaus, food inspectors, etc.," said one of these colored politicians to-day. "Democratic colored men should be given these places as far as possible." It is said that the following appointments would suit the colored democrats of Indiana: Minister to Hayti, E. E. Cooper; fourth auditor of the treasury, A. E. Manning; recorder of deeds, L. E. Christy. These aspiring colored democrats are carrying around with them the following list of the best offices held now and heretofore by colored men: Recorder of deeds, $15,000, B. K. Bruce; minister to Hayti, $5,000, John Durham; minister to Liberia, $4,000, W. D. McCoy; consul to San Domingo, $2,500, H. T. Downing; consul to Kingston, $3,000 (white man); consul to Louisa, $1,500 (white man); superintendent Freedmen's hospital, $2,500, Dr. C. B. Purvis; assistant librarian house of representatives, $2,000, W. H. Smith; surveyor port Galveston, Texas, $5,000, N. W. Caney; Indian agent, Oklahoma, $2,000 (white man); recorder general land office, $3,000, the Rev D. P. Roberts; fourth auditor treasury, $4,000, John R. Lynah.

WASHINGTON—R. C. Davis, of the Peoples' National Bank, wants to be national bank examiner of the state. Ex-Congressman O'Neal is talked of for district attorney. For postmaster, J. W. McCarty, jr., Hamlet Allan and Wm. Guy. Deputy revenue collector, the Hon. John H. Spencer.—From the Indianapolis Evening News, Nov. 17 and 18, 1892.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

Mr. Curtis was the most influential representative of that true patriotism which Washington invoked in his last words to his countrymen, and his loss is a national calamity which long will be felt.

In course of time the whole American people will recognize the pre eminent value of his services in this second struggle for political freedom which now is waging. George Washington delivered his country from the despotism of the British crown, but the superstition of divine right was not exterminated by the union of our states. As Mr. Curtis well said, "It was transferred, in justification of Washington's warning from a king to a party," and George William Curtis as the honored leader of the army of independents, fought the first battles in the war for our political rights against the tyranny of party. To use his own words again:

"The old fiction of the law in monarchies, that the king can do no wrong, has become the practical faith of great multitudes in this republic in regard to party."

He was the independent whom all partisans were forced to respect and whose leadership all patriots freely recognized.

As Washington was reviled as the traitor, insurgent and rebel, so Curtis was jeered at by the creatures of that tyranny whose right he denied, as pharisee, renegade and mugwump. * * *

The position of Curtis was almost unique. His political services had been eminent and for them he had asked nothing. His devotion to his party had been absorbing. Of his sincerity there could be no doubt.

The history of all countries has shown that when a leader is needed in a social or political crisis, some great man soon stands forth pre-eminently fitted for that leadership. By birth, associations and many facts of the earlier years of his life, Mr. Curtis was especially equipped for that contest against the political bondage of the American people which glorified his later years. Had he lived at another time his services would not have been called for, or would not have availed so much. Until the end of the administration of John Quincy Adams, and for more than the first third of our history, though party spirit ran high and its bitterness had already caused alarm among thoughtful friends of the republic, it had not yet armed itself with the power of patronage and consequently had not yet been able to overcome the popular will. * * *

In 1808 John Adams said: "Party spirit confounds the distinction between truth and falsehood, right and wrong, and it corrupts the moral sense," but true as this indictment then was and still is, excessive party spirit alone could not prevent the American people from governing themselves according to the system guaranteed by the constitution until it was allied with the spoils system. This combination is what endangers our institutions and destroys confidence in the method of government by party. * * *

To free his countrymen from the chains thrown around them by this alliance was the work of the ripe years of George William Curtis. * * *

The work before him who would attack this evil, involved, first the breaking away from the superstition of party worship, and then the creation of a public opinion in favor of a decent, business-like method of filling the public offices. No man who had not proven his devotion to the principles of one of the great parties could have any influence as an independent in the attempt to show the folly of blind partisanship. No man who had not proven his devotion to the principles which had made the republican party great and grand could have had any influence in the crusade which was preached by George William Curtis. He was ripe for it just when the time was ripe for him. Other questions of more immediate moment had engrossed the attention of the people until the new Declaration of Independence was made in the presentation of the civil service reform bill. A glance at the services rendered by George William Curtis to the republican party will show how eminently he was fitted to lead that crusade. * * * —From the Address of Charles B. Wilby, before the Literary Club of Cincinnati, October 1.

At the September meeting of the executive committee of Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association appropriate action on the death of President George William Curtis was taken by adoption of the following

"MEMORIAL.

"The death of George William Curtis has taken from the civil service reform its foremost champion, and in common with all friends of the cause to which he had given the last and best years of his life, we feel that it has sustained a loss almost overwhelming. He was indeed our great leader, wise, devoted, able, fearless, faithful. He brought to the service of this reform a mind of the first order, trained in the most admirable manner. He was an attractive and vigorous writer, and an orator of such persuasive eloquence that it may be justly said he had no superior. His character was altogether noble. The bitterest opponents of the cause he advocated, equally with its friends, knew and acknowledged his sincerity, and to those who were not well informed as to its purposes and methods it seemed incredible that he should be its devoted leader if it did not merit success. In a time when personal authority is little regarded, his judgment upon large questions of social obligations and public morals carried more weight perhaps than that of any other American.

"But great leader as he was, he never insisted upon primacy. His leadership was never disputed because he never sought it and because he was so hearty and generous a comrade. He died at the height of his power. At an age when most men are ready to retire from active service, he did not seem to have been touched by the weariness and apathy of advancing years. He never doubted of the complete and final success of the cause to which he had consecrated his life. Nor will we.

I greatly appreciate your continued good work. HUBERT TUTTLE.

OXFORD, GA., Oct 8, 1892.

To the Civil Service Chronicle:

DEAR SIR—The junior class of Emory—about forty in number—in my department—Greek—are engaged now with the Greek political economy. In lecturing them upon the Δοξιασσία, or examination for political position, I have made use of every opportunity to press upon their attention, both by comparison and for illustration, our own efforts at civil service reform. Much interest has been awakened in the class upon the subject, and we have a very favorable opportunity for pushing investigation in this line. What books, pamphlets, etc., could the civil service reform association furnish to help on the work? As college students become leaders of thought in after life, and the influence of our college in the South is very commanding, I am anxious that our students should become grounded well upon a policy in which I take a very deep interest. Very truly,

H. A. SCOMP.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

"Public office is a public trust. We reaffirm the declaration of the democratic national convention of 1876 for the reform of the civil service, [Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the government business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot box, be a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor, assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men, nor the instrument of their ambition] and we call for the honest enforcement of all laws regulating the same. The nomination of a President, as in the recent republican convention by delegations composed largely of his appointees, holding office at his pleasure, is a scandalous satire upon free popular institutions, and a startling illustration of the methods by which a President may gratify his ambition. We denounce a policy under which federal office-holders usurp control of party conventions in the states, and we pledge the democratic party to the reform of these and all other abuses which threaten individual liberty and local self-government."—National Democratic Platform, 1892.

THE first volume of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will close with the number for February, 1893. The first number was published in March, 1889, and this volume will therefore cover Harrison's administration. The original intention of making the paper a record of facts connected with the use and enjoyment of public office as spoil, and adding a reasonable amount of editorial comment, has not been departed from. It is believed that as a record the completed volume will be invaluable for historical reference. A full index will be sent with the last number. The price of the completed volume will be twenty-five dollars.

THE management has become more and more convinced that the publication of the accumulated facts is the most effective way to fight the spoils system. Many men like to enjoy office as spoil; very few like to be told or have their neighbors told that they are so enjoying it. It has also generally been found best to state the facts in the words of the authority vouching for them; this permits investigation at original sources. Comparatively few newspapers as yet give attention to this phase of public affairs. For instance, county, city, and township government throughout the United States is honey-combed with trades and deals and favoritism yielding office or a contract or some job reaching into the public treasury, yet local papers as a rule are silent upon the subject. The press can have no greater duty than that of finding out and holding up to the public the tainting element in every public transaction whether it be the favoritism in the selection of a common laborer on city streets or the manipulation of the national service to the personal ends of one man.

On September 8 there was a conference of prominent democrats with Mr. Cleveland at the Victoria hotel in New York. At this meeting Lieutenant-Governor Sheehan and Edward Murphy, Jr., seem to have given Mr. Cleveland to understand that there must be forthcoming certain "promises" or "stipulations," or "conditions" or "understandings," or "encouragements," or some equivalent thereof, which "would make the workers feel that the candidate was and meant to be a democrat." He heard them through and then according to the Brooklyn Eagle of November 16:

"They learned that Mr. Cleveland would make no promises or anything of the sort to any of them, or to or for any others through them; that he had not sought the nomination which, on the contrary, had sought him; that he considered the success of the ticket in this state a matter of much more importance to them than to him; that he repelled the idea that his democracy was questionable by them or doubtful by any one; that they knew he was aware who had been his friends before nomination and would know who had and who had not been his friends after election; that he would have no friends to reward on account of friendship, and no former opponents to punish on account of former opposition; that he would go to election or to defeat equally free and absolutely uncommitted; but that, if the democratic people and ticket were beaten in this state by the democratic machine, another democratic organization was ready to take its place at once, and that, in such case, the youngest man present would not live years enough to see that machine sufficiently strong to win or betray a cause thereafter, or one of their number ever sitting in a state or national convention again."

On the same day at the dinner of the Single Tax Club, Thomas G. Shearman, referring to the Eagle article, said that Sheehan did the talking and that Mr. Cleveland answered him as follows:

"Mr. Sheehan, I have listened with the utmost attention to what you have said. I have followed you very carefully, and I think I understand you perfectly; and what I have to say in reply, Mr. Sheehan, is, that I'll be damned before I pledge myself to any man on any subject whatever, and I'll be doubly damned before I give to you those particular pledges for which you have asked at this particular time."

The New York Herald of November 27 completes Mr. Cleveland's reply:

"I will appeal from the machine to the people. This very night I will issue a declaration to the electors of the state, telling them the proposition you have made to me and the reason why I am not able to accept it. I will ask them to choose between us. Such is my confidence in the people that before the week ends I believe your machine will be in revolution against you. I can not make the promise you ask."

The presidency was really at stake. Desperate and unscrupulous leaders in full control of the most powerful political machine in the country and seemingly able by a word to turn away from Mr. Cleveland the electoral votes of the greatest state in the union, thus securing his defeat, literally called upon him to stand and deliver. There is nothing in our time to compare Mr. Cleveland's act with, for we live in a time when public affairs are trades and deals, bargains and sales, and, on similar occasions, independence and manhood go for a price. Considering what was at stake, this was an act genuinely great—by far the greatest done by Mr. Cleveland or by any contemporary public man. It indicates a power strong enough to permanently drive party machines away from the public treasury as a means of subsistence.

At a reception given to Mr. Cleveland by the Manhattan Club in New York, November 19, amid great enthusiasm, he pointed out in the following words the revolution which has taken place in this country:

The American people have become politically more thoughtful and more watchful than they were ten years ago. They are considering now vastly greater questions than then. Party policy has become the important thing in contradistinction to party spoils. The distribution of party rewards for party action is no longer the mainspring of a political campaign. The situation must be gravely and intelligently met by those in charge of our political organization. No party, I care not whether democratic or republican, can get the support of the mass of the voters by merely promising party rewards for party supremacy. The whole people will be satisfied with nothing less than the redemption of the sacred pledges made to them collectively—the administration of wise policies, and the carrying on of an honest government. I would not have it otherwise. I am willing that the democratic party should only hope to succeed by meeting the situation fairly and squarely, by being absolutely and patriotically true to its principles and its professions. This is the assured guarantee of success, and I know of no other.

MR. THOMAS TAGGART, chairman of the state democratic committee said the other day in Chicago, that "we are a unit," for Ex-Governor Gray for a cabinet position under President Cleveland. It is not quite clear whom Mr. Taggart meant by his "we," but if he means the people or even the democrats of Indiana he is mistaken. Only those in Indiana who think they might "get something" if Gray were in office, want him in the cabinet or in any other office. Nothing more discouraging could happen. His business in life is to plan and scheme to get himself into place. This is the beginning and the end of his statesmanship.

ISAAC P. GRAY has spent several busy years posturing as a Presidential Possibility on the plan of aiming high to get something. For the last few months he appears to have been working up coups on the cabinet. It is probably a fact that Gray's grammar and spelling, which in unrevised state papers have tickled the newspaper men, are no disqualification for dividing spoil. That is Gray's understanding of a public office. As a matter of personal taste, we should suppose that even spoilsmen would feel themselves unable to endure four years of Mr. Gray's Smile, but they probably have in mind what he said at the jubilee meeting held here November 11, 1884, a few days after Cleveland's election, according to the Sentinel the next morning:

"One of the peculiar phases of the campaign just passed, and, I think the most peculiar that I have ever seen in any canvass I have ever been engaged in, is that our republican friends put forth an argument to the people that if the democratic party obtained control of the government, it would turn the republican office-holders out. Of course we will; there is no doubt about it. This has been a contest between parties. There have always been political parties in this country, ever since the formation of the government, and I presume there always will be. The republican party, in its long twenty-four years' lease of power, has filled the offices exclusively with republicans. That was right. When the democratic party obtains control of the government, which will be on the fourth of March next, then we will expect the offices, as rapidly as can be done with safety to the proper administration of government affairs, to be filled with democrats."

EX-GOVERNOR JAMES E. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, is evidently finding his political level and means to make it low. He closed his speech at the Reform Club dinner in New York December 10 as follows:

"I am also in favor of the boys who want the post-offices, because from the postmaster at Confederate cross-roads to Van Cott in New York, I am in favor of putting them all out, and putting in men who voted for Grover Cleveland."

This is the standard of Dave Hill and Ed. Murphy. Campbell evidently means to join with them. His speech places him on a par with Flannegan of Texas. He must have known that the division of spoil, which he took advantage of his opportunity to bawl for, was directly opposed to the principles of the Reform Club whose guest he was and to the principles of the chief guest, Mr. Cleveland, in whose presence Campbell spoke, and to the principles of the platform upon which Mr. Cleveland was elected. Though apparently not aware of it, Mr. Campbell owed something at least to good manners, to say nothing of his readiness to disregard the promises of his party.

IN gratifying contrast with the demagogical utterances of Mr. Campbell is the speech of Carl Schurz, delivered on the same occasion, and of which the following is an extract:

"So long as democracy means the preservation of popular self government in its whole sphere; the maintenance of sound constitutional doctrines; honesty and wise economy in administration; war upon the corrupting agencies of our political life; war upon selfish monopoly and favoritism by law; taxation not for the advantage of the few at the expense of the many, but just to all and for the benefit of all; a currency system that will cheat nobody and keep us in harmony with the money of the world's commerce; a public service not the spoil of party, but honestly organized upon the principle that a public office is a public trust, so long as democracy means in itself a government for the people and by the people, so long will those who came from outside the democratic party to vote for Cleveland continue to march in its ranks. * * * * *

"These friends rejoice to know that you will enter upon your high duties not only unembarrassed by personal pledges but unburdened by any personal obligations. No man, and no set of men, has a claim upon your political gratitude, for the uprising of the people for your cause and yourself was so spontaneous and overwhelming that there is no man and no set of men whose efforts in behalf of your election might not safely have been spared. Whatever of personal triumph there is in this you owe only to the generous confidence of the American people; and their confidence greets you at the threshold of your second administration with an abundance that has but few precedents in the past history of the republic. But great as is the popular confidence, so is the popular expectation. This consciousness, no doubt, rests upon your heart as a heavy load of responsibility. But be assured as you are true to the moral forces in American politics which nominated and elected you, so these moral forces will be true to you to the end. Doubt not, whatever struggles and perplexities your efforts for good government may bring upon you, you may always confidently appeal to the good sense, the honesty and the patriotism of the American people—and you will never appeal in vain—against any unjust assault from the opposite party as well as against any cabal of selfishness within your own."

PRESIDENT PATTON, of Princeton College, is reported to have recently said: "I am interested in philosophy and theology, and these are the only things I want to be known in. I vote for neither party." It is a stigma upon President Patton, an American citizen, to show such callousness to his duty. It ought to be a stigma for the trustees of an American college in which American boys are to pass four years to retain as president such a man; and it ought to be a discredit for any parent to permit his son to be under the influence of one so wanting in the appreciation of the elements that go to form character. Of what ancient stuff are his theology and philosophy made? Those genial cynics who claim that it is necessary to buy and sell votes, steal and lie in politics, are really less dangerous than this college president who is so admirably suited to pursue theology and philosophy in a Russian college.

His annual report shows that Postmaster General Wannamaker still smarts under the strictures upon his action in shielding the Baltimore post-office employes. He ought to understand by this time that denials or statements from him of any kind cut no figure with the American people. In this Baltimore matter he started in with the deliberate purpose of protecting law-breakers, and that purpose he impudently carried out in the face of conclusive proof of their guilt. After years of ready denunciation of others as Pharisees the republicans have produced some apparently perfect specimens, and one of these is Mr. Wannamaker.

MR. OLIVER T. MORTON's admirable essays on civil service reform, which originally appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, have, with several other papers, been issued in a volume by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Mr. Morton's answers to the objections to civil service reform are the best that have been made. He has assumed that the objections have been made in good faith and from an honest patriotic doubt, and he proceeds with the utmost patience to satisfy every possible degree and sort of objection. When the essays first appeared, the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE urged that they be reprinted for general distribution in the shape of short tracts. Their fitness for this is as apparent now as then.

THE report of the civil service commission was made public December 6. During the year ending June 30, 1892, 3,919 applicants were examined for the departments at Washington, and of these 1,315 failed to pass. For the railway mail service, out of 4,597 examined, 1,648 failed; for the customs service, out of 1,624 examined, 662 failed; for the postal service, out of 9,162 examined, 3,611 failed; for the Indian service, out of 158 examined, 64 failed. The whole number examined was 19,460, of whom 12,160 passed, and 7,300 failed. Over the previous year there was an increase of 386 in the whole number examined. During the year 3,961 received appointments. In the departments 245 men, and 86 women were appointed.

THE commission says:

The classified service, should be extended as rapidly as practicable to cover every position in the public service to which it can appropriately be applied; as, for instance, to clerks and writers in navy-yards, to almost the entire body of officials in the District of Columbia, to the internal-revenue service, to custom-houses with twenty-five employes, and to free-delivery post-offices.

It also recommends the enactment into laws of some such bills as those introduced by Mr. Andrew, to take federal laborers and the fourth-class postmasters out of politics.

Most friends of civil service reform were surprised to find this report signed by Commissioners Roosevelt and Lyman only. Then follows the remark:

"I approve the body of the report, but prefer that the recommendation for the extension of the classified service on page 8 shall conclude with the sentence, 'The classified service should be extended as rapidly as practicable to cover every position in the public service to which it can appropriately be applied.'"

This is signed by Commissioner Johnston. When asked about his action by the correspondent of New York Evening Post, Mr. Johnston said:

"I regretted very much the necessity of differing with my colleagues, even apparently. I am a civil service reformer and believe in the extension of the merit system, but I consider that at this time it is well that the commission should move slowly. The passage in the report to which I refer in my paragraph at the end contains a number of specific recommendations, with some of which, I may say, I am in sympathy. As to others I am not able to speak positively, because I have not yet had an opportunity of giving them the necessary study. I could not conscientiously join with my colleagues in recommending specific extensions of the rules without fully assuring myself of the wisdom of these proposals. The first sentence in the passage under consideration is a broad general one on which we are entirely agreed—that is, that the classified service should be extended 'as rapidly as practicable.' Beyond that I did not feel that it would be wise to go at this time. I had no desire or expectation of being drawn into the newspapers with reference to this matter, as I sedulously avoid unnecessary publicity, but your inquiry leaves me no alternative but to make this explanation."

The question is naturally asked, why is Mr. Johnston, with his doubts and lack of knowledge, serving on the civil service commission? He is not put there as a novice to learn a business. Why should the commission move slowly "at this time?" To save places to divide as spoil among democrats? The recommendations of the commission are moderate. This matter has been discussed and successfully experimented upon for years. Has

Mr. Johnston been hidden in the swamps of Louisiana all this time? Under Mr. Cleveland's first administration we had experience with commissioners who hid behind generalities, and wanted to "move slowly," and the experience was not happy. We do not want any more Edgertons.

MR. CLEVELAND owes it to the country to retain Mr. Roosevelt and make him the head of the civil service commission, and Mr. Roosevelt owes it to the country to accept the place. He has been the advocate of fair play for democrats as well as republicans. Emphatically, he has not been afraid, and this means almost everything. He has compelled respect for and observance of the law. There is no one to take his place. He has the confidence and respect of the country. With him at the head of the commission there would be no uncertainty, either as to what President Cleveland meant to have done or as to what would be done.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S annual message was sent to congress December 7. We have read it carefully and here give those parts bearing upon the reform of the civil service:

The civil service commission asks for an increased appropriation for needed clerical assistance, which, I think, should be given. I extended the classified service March 1, 1892, to include physicians, superintendents, assistant superintendents, school teachers and matrons in the Indian service, and have had under consideration the subject of some further extensions, but have not as yet fully determined the lines upon which extensions can most properly and usefully be made.

I have several times been called upon to remove Indian agents appointed by me and have done so promptly upon every sustained complaint of unfitness or misconduct. I believe, however, that the Indian service at the agencies has been improved and is now administered on the whole with a good degree of efficiency. If any legislation is possible by which the selection of Indian agents can be wholly removed from all partisan suggestions or considerations I am sure it would be a great relief to the executive and a great benefit for the service.

We can not refrain from quoting once more, and in close proximity to this record of performance, the promise from the platform of 1888, and we suggest that it is not yet too late to do much to diminish the prodigious difference in size:

"The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided."

THIS paper prints in full the newspaper reports of the attempt of Senator Higgins by bribery to defeat the ballot, because whatever the actual facts, the admissions illustrate vividly the baseness of the patronage system. Postmaster Smith is the senator's henchman and, paid by the public, does the base service of his chief. Senator Higgins admits, callous to the shame of it, that he was ready to purchase influence with an office. And last, a minister, the republican nominee for congress, is reported to have sat by and heard Postmaster Smith promise a "good office" for help this fall, and to have responded that he would do all he could to carry out the postmaster's suggestions in regard to federal patronage.

DEMOCRATIC PROMISES.

VERY early in the next administration the democrats will have to decide what they will do with the civil service. The demand that it shall all be divided as spoil, will be presented to them at once, and they will have to make some answer. They have won by decisive numbers. Their superior numbers however are spread thin over a large extent of territory. It will be a fatal mistake for them to believe that they can indulge in a carnival of spoil and experience anything but defeat in 1896. President Harrison and his administration from the start treated the reform element of the country with contempt, and this was carried to an extent that patience and forbearance ceased to be a virtue and almost to a man the reformers became hostile to the administration, and they pursued and published its multitude of glaring faults with a relentless persistence that would have been a warning to wiser officers. This element now looks to the democrats with the most cordial good wishes, and with the highest hopes of what they will accomplish. But it should be remembered that it has not forgotten how to criticise and that it will do its duty.

The democrats have every reason urging them to the completion of the reform of the federal service. They have bound themselves to do so in their platform. They said that the service ought not to be subject to change at every election, or be a prize fought for at the polls, or be a brief reward of party service. This can not be made to mean anything except that these principles shall now be put into practice. They were the principles of the party under Tilden, and they are now its principles under Cleveland; and Tilden and Cleveland are the only successful national leaders their party has had for a generation.

We are not saying that republicans not within the civil service law shall be kept in office; but we do say that sixty thousand republican heelers shall not be succeeded in the fourth-class post-offices by sixty thousand democratic heelers. That would be a carnival of spoil. There is a well devised system of appointment free from politics and favoritism. Let it be adopted and then if the party demands it let the places be vacated and filled accordingly. Every part of the unclassified service should be treated in a similar manner, or should be classified under the present law. Heads of bureaus and under secretaries, should be made permanent, though always with all other officers subject to removal for cause. With a change of administration only the highest officers should be changed. This is the way to get rid of a change of officers at every election or to keep the offices from being a prize fought for at the polls or from being a brief reward for party service.

THE MASSACHUSETTS CIVIL SERVICE REFORMERS.

The following resolutions were adopted at a conference of Massachusetts Civil Service Reform Associations, held in Boston, December 8, 1892:

We welcome the announcement of President Harrison that he contemplates an extension of the civil service rules, and we hope that the extensions already recommended by the National Civil Service Commission will be made without delay, viz.: "to clerks and writers in navy yards, to almost the entire body of officials in the District of Columbia, to the internal revenue service, to custom houses with twenty-five employees and to free delivery post-offices," and that the system introduced into the navy yards by the secretary of the navy will be adopted in permanent form.

We urge our representatives in congress to spare no effort to secure a liberal appropriation for the needs of the civil service commission.

The withdrawal of Mr. Roosevelt from the National civil service commission would be a serious loss to the cause of reform, and we respectfully urge him to reconsider his announced intention of resigning.

A committee of three shall be appointed by the chairman of this meeting, to secure, if possible, from the leading supporters of President-elect Cleveland in Massachusetts, an indorsement in writing of the views recently expressed by him in condemnation of the distribution of patronage as spoils, and their promise of support in any effort which shall be made by him to discontinue this odious and demoralizing practice.

We urge upon our representatives in congress the passage of the fourth-class postmaster bill and the bill for the selection of laborers, favorably reported in the last session by the house committee on civil service reform.

Inasmuch as the duty of the officer is to the country, and not to a party, we disapprove the resignation of a non-political officer in deference to the pernicious theory that a change of administration should involve a change of officers.

Arthur Hobart,

Boston, December 12, 1892. Secretary of Conference.

WHO WAS ELECTED PRESIDENT?

Since the election there have been at least ten democrats who have in some manner made known their intention to become candidates for postmaster at this place. These parties, through their friends, have so pressed Congressman Cooper for indorsement that he has made known his intention to favor George E. Finney, ex-editor of the Herald, for this position, and now there is a howl from the rank and file of the party that extends all over the county. Finney and Congressman Cooper held the post-office under Cleveland, Cooper resigning to become a candidate. Finney succeeded him, holding the office for about four years. The young working democrats are the ones that are mad, and there is trouble ahead. A numerous signed petition for the appointment of a man by the name of Guthrie as postmaster at Nashville, Brown county, was handed to Mr. Cooper yesterday, but he informed the party that he would recommend Alonzo Allison, of the Brown County Democrat.—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, November 18.

* * *

One of the most bitter post-office fights that ever took place in this part of the state is on in this city. It was charged against Congressman Cooper that he had made up his mind before election as to whom he would recommend for the post-office, but many thought that this could not be the case. These parties now say that they were deceived. He publicly announced that George E. Finney was to be the man for the place, and late last night, after this statement appeared in the local democratic organ, sixty-four leading and influential democrats, many of whom were Catholics, called on Mr. Cooper and asked him to reconsider his action and leave the appointment open to the decision of the voters of the democratic party receiving their mail at this office. This the congressman refused to do, and, to a few, gave as the reason that if an election were held that a hoodlum might be chosen, as no one would be allowed to vote for postmaster that did not vote for Cooper. This remark did not set well, and an election will be held, and the man chosen will receive the indorsement of all other applicants for the place, and his appointment urged against the wishes of Cooper.—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, November 25.

* * *

Congressman Cooper to-day announced to the democracy of Franklin that he had determined to recommend Samuel Harris to be appointed postmaster at Franklin. As a result the local democracy is worse torn up than ever at any time within its history. Cooper is accused openly of lying and treachery. He announced that he would be in no hurry to make the appointment, and that he would come to Franklin and consult those interested in the matter. He never came, and he consulted nobody. Democrats here are opposed to the appointment of Harris. They vow that Harris shall not be confirmed. They also vow that Cooper will never again get a delegate from Johnson county to secure renomination. The war is on.—Franklin Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, November 25.

* * *

The Franklin Republican has interviewed some of the afflicted, who have expressed themselves freely, as the following extracts show:

"J. A. Smith said: 'It looks as if it were

Mr. Cooper's appointment on personal preference, and not on the recommendation of the people. Mr. Cooper has made a mistake. He should have come to Franklin as he promised and found out what the democrats wanted.'

"Fred Staff said: 'Cooper has lied like a dog. Even in a dog fight I like to see fair and honorable treatment. He has decided the case before he heard it. Cooper has broken his promises and acted in bad faith. He will regret it.'

"Ben Brown said: 'You may quote me as saying that George Cooper has lied and deceived knowingly in the matter, and has deceived his best friends in an ungentlemanly manner. He has shown himself to be a coward in that he has not come to Franklin and given all a fair show. I can find no fault in that I did not obtain Mr. Cooper's indorsements, but I do have a right to find fault with Mr. Cooper's lying and deceptive method of treatment. I wish that I had not been a candidate that I might be free to make the vigorous kick which such cowardice and treachery makes consistent and proper.'"—Indianapolis Journal, November 28.

Besieged from every quarter, "cussed" and discussed on every street corner, and driven almost wild by the constant ringing of his door-bell by men who want place under the incoming administration, Congressman Cooper has left his district and gone east, but to what point the average democrat does not know, and can not find out to a certainty. For days his home in this city has been invaded by men wanting places and his influence to secure them, and these men have come from all parts of the district. To a few he has promised his support publicly, and in each case this has brought committees with protests until it really appears that his decisions have not pleased his constituents in a single instance, but, on the contrary, have worked them up to fever heat against him. As he stepped off the Big Four train he looked as if he had just recovered from a severe spell of sickness, and appeared to be glad that he would soon be out of the reach of those who were wanting favors at his hands.—Columbus Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, November 29.

* * *

Congressman Cooper has aroused in Danville the same storm of opposition over his action in recommending a new postmaster that he did in Columbus, Edinburg and Nashville. Three-fourths of the local democrats have placed their names on a petition asking that they be allowed to hold an election to select their postmaster. While this petition was in circulation, letters were received from Cooper stating that he would recommend Mr. Will King, editor of the Danville Gazette. Immediately there was a cry against such action, but Cooper still persists in his course. It is generally admitted that King would have stood no show in an election, and it is taken as an indication that Cooper feels that he will need newspaper support in future campaigns. The rank and file of local democracy will hold an election, and send certificates of the result to the powers that be.—Danville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, December 17.

The democratic contest for the post-office at this place has narrowed down to but two candidates, J. A. Lewis and John Duncan. Lewis, it is said, has been promised the place by Congressman Cooper, but Duncan's friends claim it was promised Lewis provided he could "satisfy the boys," and the boys won't be satisfied. Neither will withdraw from the race; neither favor an election, but will resort to this only as a last means of settling the difficulty.—Martinsville Dispatch to Indianapolis News, December 16.

* * *

The democrats of this place and vicinity are on the "ragged edge" over a letter received a few days ago by Superintendent T. J. Charlton, of the reform school, from Congressman Geo. W. Cooper, under date of December 12, in which he says:

It has been my purpose, whenever I could, to decide all contests for postoffices as soon as possible. I think it is better to do so and announce the decision as soon as reached, in order that prolonged and bitter contests, resulting in greater disappointment, may not follow.

I have decided to recommend Mr. Isaac Holton for Plainfield. In arriving at this conclusion I make no reflections on any good democrat who has applied for the place. I have about 180 of these cases to investigate and decide, and my hope is that I may be able to get through with them in time to give the appointees the benefit of the full term of Cleveland's administration.

Whatever your views or personal aspirations may have been I sincerely hope that this determination will meet your approval, and believe that Mr. Holton will make an efficient and faithful officer.

Respectfully, Geo. W. Cooper.

The publication of the letter in the Plainfield Progress last Thursday was like a bomb thrown into the rank and file of the democracy of Guilford township, and caused a crestfallen look to spread over the faces of the other half-dozen or more candidates for the position. Immediately the kicking began, and as time rolls by the defeated candidates are getting madder and have started on the war-path. One of the defeated candidates declared that he intends to have Mr. Charlton's scalp dangling in his belt as soon as the legislature meets. By this it is inferred he proposes to have Mr. Charlton removed as superintendent of the reform school.

Another gentleman who received one of Congressman Cooper's manifold letters is said to have written a letter telling him that it would have been better for him to have hied himself to the wilds of Brown county and never entered public life. Still another democrat, it is asserted, has written a short, crisp letter to Mr. Cooper in which he uses this expression: "You have played h—l!"

Mr. Holton knows, and Mr. Cooper was advised, that his favored candidate would stand no show for the post-office if the matter was referred to a vote of the democrats of the township. It is going to be a Kilkenny cat-fight, and no means, fair or foul, will be left untried to induce Cooper to change his views in regard to recommending Mr. Holton for the Plainfield post-office.—Plainfield Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, December 19.

THE ONSLAUGHT.

BOURBON.—Post-office: James Laurence and George Stuckman.

BLUFFTON.—For district attorney: Edwin C. Vaughn. For the post-office: James R. Bennett, ex-recorder; Wm. B. Bennett, ex-postmaster; Maurice Sawyer, ex-postal clerk; Marcellus M. Justice, ex-sheriff; Robert F. Cummins, son of Representative Cummins; B. F. Kain, recently candidate for treasurer, and Gus Michaels, who has never held an office. Congressman Martin is understood to favor the selection of postmasters by popular vote.

WINAMAC.—Post-office: W. E. Jackson, Charles Shine, S. Pearson, J. J. Gorrell, J. B. Agnew, Sr., M. H. Ingram and T. B. Hedges. Mr. Ingram, editor of the Democrat-Journal, served as postmaster under Cleveland before. Charles H. Howard wants the post-office at Star City.

ROCHESTER.—Valentine Zimmerman, native of Germany, run for Congress, Tenth district, 1888, will be pushed for a consulate at some important city of his native land. Merritt A. Baker, deputy prosecuting attorney, wants a place in the law department at Washington. Charles Meyer wants the revenue collectorship of this district. John C. Phillips, Oliver P. Waite and Andrew T. Bitters want the post office.

DANVILLE.—Post-office: James W. Williams, who was displaced by Harrison, H. B. Lingenfelter, Joseph G. Bowen, Will A. King, editor of the Gazette, and R. D. Snyder. Cleveland appointed A. P. Pounds, postmaster in 1885, and he died in office. Miss Anna Pounds, an efficient deputy, was an unsuccessful applicant as her father's successor. She is now a possible candidate. John McClain, of Avon, wants the same place in the treasury department he held under Cleveland before. R. F. Hiatt wants the post-office at Plainfield. Lewis Marsh, Jr., of Danville, wants a small place at Washington. Levi A. Barnett expects to be again appointed trustee of the reform school by Matthews. Simon Rammell, of Danville, a life long democrat, has purchased a grocery at New Winchester, in the hope of becoming postmaster there.

ATTICA.—For the post-office: Martin Schoonover, Henry G. Schlosser, Wm. Lippold, Chas. Hatton, O. S. Clark and Ed Hemphill.

DELPHI.—Want to be postmaster: Rhen Isherwood, editor of the Times; A. B. Crampton, editor of the Citizen; Allison Rogers, president of the democratic club; Albert Brewer, Fred Neiworth, the Hon. John C. Odell, Mrs. Lydia Pollard, mother of Judge Chas. R. Pollard, who was a delegate to the Chicago convention; Mrs. A. Ball and John G. Troxell. Charles Walker dropped from the mail service by the Harrison administration, wants his old place. So does Allison Rogers, if he fails to get the post-office. Col. Isaac Dreifus, who made the race for mayor two years ago, will apply for a post-tradership. [Judge C. R. Pollard will be an applicant for something, but he has not determined what he wants. Judge Chas. R. Pollard, of Delphi, is casting an eye toward the office of commissioner of emigration, his friends say. The office is the one at present filled by ex-Congressman Owen, of Logansport. Mr. Pollard was a delegate to the national democratic convention, and has been chairman of the democratic committee of his county for several years. It is said that his candidacy will have the backing of many of the influential democrats of northern Indiana.—December 3.]

MUNCIE.—The Hon. R. S. Gregory, who recently joined democratic ranks, will apply for a high-salaried position, possibly a foreign consulate. Alex. Kirkwood will be satisfied with a post-office inspectorship. For the post-office: Editor Thomas McKillop, of the Herald; ex-postmaster John Banta, Vernon Davis, John Ritter, ex-mayor Charles Kligore, B. Frank Gubben, Arthur Shideler, John Graham, Val. Gilbert, Percy Craig, Ed. Everett and Thomas Duncan. Want to be door keeper at the White House: Robert Winters, a young journalist; Mark Batton, Daniel Kelly, Mark Bechtell, Will Kirk, Frank Bechtell, Frank Beemer, William Patterson and Ed. Mauck. Capt. Hilligas, W. W. Walby, Lafayette McCormick, Charles Bell and Dr. Searcy will ask for paying clerkships at Washington, or to be mail agents.

SOUTH BEND.—Would-be postmasters: Sorden Lister, postmaster under Cleveland four years ago, and chairman of the democratic central committee; John Gallagher, Adolph S. Ginz, present councilman from first ward; August Beyer, Andrew J. Jaquith and Patrick Sheckey. Emmet F. Marshall, member of the democratic state central committee, wants to be post office inspector, and John M. Shimp revenue collector.

LEBANON.—For postmaster: Ed. F. Hughes, Henry C. Ulin, secretary of the county committee, and the Hon. S. M. Ralston, presidential elector for the ninth district.

SHOALS.—The Hon. Thomas M. Clarke wants a judgeship of some kind; wanted one in the Oklahoma country in 1884. For the post office: A. C. Hacker, editor of the News; Fabius Gwinn, a young attorney; W. K. Smith, postmaster under Cleveland formerly, and H. M. Carroll, I. N. Plummer and Dr. G. M. Freeman, want places on the pension board.

WABASH.—For the post-office: E. A. Edwards and John Hipskind. W. W. Wood, the present incumbent, has over three years to serve.

LA PORTE.—For the post-office: S. E. Grover, chairman of the democratic county committee; S. J. Kessler, one of the owners of the La Porte Argus; N. McCormick, defeated candidate for sheriff; D. C. McCollum, of the state monument commission; George H. Storey, superintendent of the water works, and Thomas Fargher, an ex-soldier. W. H. Parker, ex-gauger, will seek re-appointment. David Walker, Charles B. Kenney and Wm. C. Criss, want to be mail carriers.

BRAZIL.—The Hon. J. M. Hoskins, chairman of the congressional central committee, is a candidate for revenue collector. E. M. Henkel and John Stough want the post office.

SPENCER.—For the post-office: F. M. Field, postmaster under Cleveland before; O. T. Dickerson, ex-auditor; Joseph W. Workman, deputy auditor, S. N. Chambers, ex sheriff; Michael Wolf, ex marshal; M. V. Halton, Capt. J. W. Archer, Mrs. W. S. Johnson, wife of county clerk Johnson and sister of Miss Nellie Ahern, assistant state librarian, and Mrs. Wm. Howard, a cousin of Mr. Cleveland.

GOSPORT.—B. F. Hart, C. L. Wampler, J. P. Gentry, Dr. Fred Stuckey and B. F. Fox. Judge Wm. M. Franklin, who was a candidate before the democratic state convention for appellate judge, will be pressed for the best appointment due this quarter of the state.

MITCHELL.—Dr. J. T. Briggs, Moses Clinton, Ed. C. Burton and James Moore are aspirants for the post-office. Most talked-of man for the place is Walter L. Shanks, the defeated candidate for sheriff of Lawrence county. J. F. Dilley and Oscar Williams want good government places.

SALEM.—Candidates for the post-office are ex-Postmaster J. D. Alvis, W. M. Rudler, H. R. Winsklet, D. V. B. Motsinger and John Shanks. For the pension board, Dr. W. J. Purkhiser, Dr. H. M. Paynter and Dr. J. J. Mitchell.

PLYMOUTH.—For the post-office, Adam Vinnege, J. A. Palmer, Thomas Webber and J. C. Jillson. The Hon. Daniel McDonald wants to be commissioner of pensions. W. E. Peterson would be route agent on a mail line.

BEDFORD.—For the post-office, John Johnson, Jr., and Mrs. Frances Wilson, widow of the late Judge Wilson. McHenry Owen wants a place in the pension office.

LAFAYETTE.—For the post-office, James B. Falley, wholesale merchant; George T. Beardsley, city treasurer; W. Bent Wilson, of the Daily Journal; Michael

H. Kennedy, wholesale merchant; Nicholas W. Box, retail merchant; F. E. D. McGinley, now holding his fifth term as mayor, and Walter J. Ball, real estate dealer. Rumor has it that the local managers promised the post-office to Mr. Beardsley if he would manage the campaign. Mr. Wilson publishes the only morning democratic daily in the ninth district, and his friends urge him because he has no county patronage. Drs. W. S. Walker, Samuel S. Washburn, Emil Schnaible, J. T. Littell, George W. Washburn and Samuel Seawright want to be on the pension board. Col. John S. Williams, third auditor under Cleveland's first administration, wants something.

PERU.—Those desiring office include Jerome Herff, Frank McElheney, Clarence Jackson, Wm. Angor, M. W. Ream, C. Huffman, W. W. Robbins, J. M. Jackson, Orson Durand, John Toll, M. Rosenthal and C. McDowell.

VALPARAISO.—For the post-office, E. Zimmerman, editor of the Messenger and Sun. He was postmaster for three years and eleven months under Cleveland before. Henry Binnaman, John H. Magee, Cyrus Axe, S. R. Martin and J. Brodie are possible candidates. Postmaster De Motte's commission expires May, 4, 1894.

WATERLOO.—Alfred Kelley wants to be deputy revenue collector, but will take the post-office. Candidates for the latter place: John Koons (if nothing better offers), John Duncan, Benjamin Duncan, Oliver P. Smith, I. J. McFadden, Miss Ella Jackman, Miss Maude Kepler, Wm. S. Getz and Marion Bemenderfer. Homer M. Henning wants to be postal clerk. Bemenderfer, John Duncan and Ella Jackman have petitions already in circulation.

PLYMOUTH.—The Hon. Dan McDonald, editor of the Plymouth Democrat, in a special from that point, was credited with aspiring to be commissioner of pensions. Says Mr. McDonald, in a note to The News, "That office is always given to a distinguished soldier, and it so happens that I served my country in the late unpleasantness by proxy, and am therefore ineligible."

LEAVENWORTH.—For postmaster at this place Peter Ouerbacker, James Clark, George E. Sherron, Clarke F. Craeleus, Thomas Westfall and William Callaghan are named as candidates. The office pays $1,200 annually.

MOORE'S HILL.—Eighteen democrats at Newton, a little suburb of Lawrenceburgh, are circulating petitions for government office.—Indianapolis News, November 23.

TIPTON.—This city has its full quota of candidates. Those mentioned for the post-office include John R. Bowlin, present county superintendent; B. W. S. Ressler, Samuel Vawter, R. M. Roberson, who held the office under Cleveland before; A. Bennett, Chas. Means and John Woodruff. Mr. Roberson is also mentioned as a candidate for door-keeper of the house. James Mettlin wants a place in the mail service where he served during the last democratic administration. W. O. Legg also wants a similar place. The Hon. W. R. Ogleby would like to go abroad, having a preference for the Italian mission. M. T. Shiel wants a place in the pension department, and E. E. Van Buskirk desires to go west and teach in the Indian schools. He was a teacher until relieved by Harrison. A number of young democrats are already importuning influential men to secure places at Washington.

FRANKLIN.—There were about fifteen applicants for the office of postmaster of this place, and a city election was talked of to determine a choice, but Congressman Cooper threw a dampener thereon by writing a letter to Samuel Harris, pledging Harris that he would be recommended. Mr. Harris is ex-county clerk and ex-mayor, and during the last campaign he was chairman of the county committee.

COLUMBUS.—Congressman Cooper has announced that George E. Finney would be recommended by him as postmaster here. This has given offense to friends of other candidates, and a committee waited upon Mr. Cooper and urged him to reconsider his determination, and leave the election open to popular choice. Congressman Cooper declined to accede to the request, fearing that an unworthy person might be selected. However, it is now the understanding that the local democracy will insist on an election, and will urge the appointment of the applicant receiving the greatest number of votes. It is further said that a formal remonstrance will be prepared against Mr. Harris's appointment, to be laid before the President. This failing, the matter will be carried to the senate, hopeful of preventing the confirmation. The additional aspirants for office under Cleveland include ex-Mayor Charles M. Spencer, who desires a clerkship in the pension department. Abe Terhune will seek appointment in the government printing office, and Dr. C. V. Kent, of Hope, will ask to be appointed medical examiner. Alonzo Allison, editor of the Brown County Democrat, and James Guthrie are applicants for postmaster at Nashville. It is understood that Congressman Cooper will recommend Allison. Ephraim Norman wants to be postmaster at Hope; also, J. K. Richter, a physician, and S. C. Felsberg, editor of the News-Journal.

ENGLISH.—Dr. C. D. Lockett will seek a position on the board of pension examiners. James R. Duffin, George W. Davis, James P. Smallwood and Louis N. Jobe are named for postmaster at West Fork. Richard Byrd is seeking similar recognition at Oriole. Dr. William A. Cole, of this place, will apply for the collectorship of the Seventh district.

LAPEL.—N. W. Klepfer is circulating a petition to be appointed postmaster at this place under the new administration.

ATLANTA.—The candidates for postmaster are: J. M. Whisler, Dr. J. C. Driver, Dr. L. C. McFatrige, Amos Scott, Daniel Achenbach and J. E. Washington.

MOORE'S HILL.—Foremost among those who worked to swing southeast Indiana solidly against Gray and solidly for Cleveland at Lawrenceburgh were Hunter and O'Brien, editors of the Register. Dr. Hunter is strongly talked of as consul to the port of Lisbon. O'Brien looks toward the collectorship, so said Warren Tebbs wants an Indian agency, Captain Rief, for revenue agent, and likewise Ed Frederick, William Bryan, Henry Huseman, Parker Rand, Mike Fitterer, William Huston, Jacob Shepard, Louis Ellerbrook, and Charles Wilson are actively asking. Mentioned for postmaster are John Tittle, Ernst Everhart and George Columbia. Here at Moore's Hill petitions for the postmastership were in circulation two days after the election. Charles Robinson has the most signers to his petition. There are twelve other applicants. Mr. Holman's preference is the unknown quantity.

MILAN.—At Milan there are six post-office applicants. Thomas Kaue went to see Mr. Holman right away after the election. Mr. Holman has promised a pretty gift, it is reported, to Mr. Kammon, north of Milan.

GUILFORD.—Martin Miller, merchant, would read postal-cards. Little competition.

SUNMAN.—Virado Bigney, druggist, would more than gladly accept his old place as postmaster.—Indianapolis News, November 26.

LA GRANGE.—Candidates for the post office, to succeed Dr. J. H. Rerick, editor of the Standard, whose commission expires in March, 1893, are looming up. David Fawcett, editor of the Democrat and secretary of the county central committee, who came here from Delphi in 1886, is in the race. Through his exertions McNagney, democratic congressman-elect, secured one-half of the votes of this county in the congressional convention, over the protest of the other half, headed by Ballou and Hanan. Ora Rowe, a brother-in-law of Ballou, democratic elector and chairman of the central committee, whose candidacy was opposed by the Lowery democrats in 1884 and the office given to Snyder, is still in the ring. A split in the party followed Snyder's appointment, and Congressman Lowery was defeated for re-election by the anti-Loweryites voting for Stanley and White. H. M. Kramer, pension attorney, is being backed by the old soldier boys, but the bee in the bonnet has been so often knocked out that his candidacy is looked upon as a chestnut. His attempt a few years ago to start a democratic G. A. R. is being worked against him for all it is worth. He has been a lifelong resident of this county.—Indianapolis News, December 1.

The following is a list of the candidates for the different post offices over Grant county:

Van Buren—William Whittaker, Charles Griffith, T. E. Ballard, Dr. G. A. Landis, A. J. Barnes and G. W. Hulce.

Roseburg—Milton Druckemiller.

Swayzee—Isaac Smith, George W. Fisher, M. D. Bish, Harrison Mark, Thomas Hubbard and O. W. J. Larkin.

Sweetser—Mrs. N. E. Spurgeon.

Point Isabel—J. V. John, G. A. Brizendine and William Manu.

Fairmount—At this place the democrats held an election, the polls being open from 6 a. m. until 6 p. m. Four names were presented: W. H. Campbell, L. R. Whitney, Samuel Stokes and Jefferson Fowler. W. H. Campbell was chosen.—Indianapolis News, December 3.

—It has been given out among the Indianapolis democrats that ex-Congressman C. C. Matson, of Greencastle, wants to be made United States pension agent for Indiana. Mr. Matson is allied to the Voorhees-Gray wing of the party, and the original friends of Cleveland here are recalling that during the meeting of the national democratic convention in Chicago, Mr. Matson was referring to Cleveland as the "stuffed prophet of Williams street."

John W. Cravens, clerk of Monroe county, is at the Grand Hotel. Mr. Cravens has his eye on the post-office at Bloomington, and his friends say he will get the appointment. He is still under thirty. When just of age he went to Bloomington from Danville. He was soon elected superintendent of the schools of Monroe county, and after having filled that office two terms, he was elected county clerk.—Indianapolis News, November 22.

—Now that the campaign is over and the democrats have gained such a sweeping victory, the prominent politicians of democratic faith in this city and county have begun to look for offices.

The post-office, with its salary of $3,000, is the chief objective point, and as many as a dozen are looking after this. Among these are Hon. Luther Mering, late candidate for congress; Frank Elder, postmaster under Cleveland's first term; John W. Thistlewaite, George Eggemeyer, J. C. Maeke, S. C. Whitsell, editor of the Independent, and others.—Richmond Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, November 29.

—Richmond is not the only place in Wayne county where the contest for the post office promises to be a warm one. At Hagerstown also the eligible are looking after their interests. Ex-Postmaster Mike Conniff wants it. Joseph Walliek is also an aspirant. Besides these two, J. C. Fritz, John B. Allen and Jack Richey are each being urged by his friends.—Richmond Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, December 2.

—The Hon. Thomas J. Newkirk of this city is a candidate for internal revenue collector of this district. Mr. Newkirk was chairman of the democratic county central committee.—Rushville Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, December 3.

INDIANAPOLIS.—William E. English wants to be sent abroad. William F. Christian will ask for the Indianapolis post-office.

There are a good many aspiring democratic attorneys who have their eyes on the district attorneyship. Republicans generally believe that John W. Kern will be the appointee, although he has not the support of the Voorhees-Gray wing of the party. Mr. Kern, it is said, will have the indorsement of the original Cleveland men, with whom he cast his lot when the Cleveland-Gray-Hill fight was on before the meeting of the national convention. The other men who would like to have the office are Frank Burke, of Jeffersonville; John W. Holtzman, of this city, and Mason J. Niblack, of Vincennes.

So far as can be learned there are not so many persons after the United States marshal's office. Indianapolis democrats seem to think that Geo. W. Geiger, the commercial traveler, has earned the office, and it is said that he will get a strong support from here. The men who think they know all about how the offices will be distributed say that Indianapolis will not be permitted to gobble up everything in sight, and that it is foolish to talk about both the district attorneyship and the marshal's office coming to this city. They say that Indianapolis will do well if it gets one of these offices.

"My mail is almost as heavy as it was during the campaign," said Chairman Taggart to day. "The applications for post-offices I send back with directions that they be referred to the local committees. I can't undertake to have anything to do with the selection of officers that affect no one outside the community where the officer is to serve."

Mr. Taggart does not say what he does with the applications for other offices that come in, but those who claim to know say that he is filing them all away, and will, when the proper time comes, take a hand in the recommendations to be made. "Taggart is a man who remembers his friends," said a democrat to-day, "and you can rest assured that when the proper time comes he will have something to say about who is recognized in Indiana. He will not decline any invitation to assist in portioning out the spoils."

Mr. A. Connor is an applicant for the North Indianapolis post-office.

BLOOMINGTON.—The avowed candidates for the post-office are: R. H. East, Peter Bowman, S. R. Phorer and W. P. Dill. James Ryan and Samuel Gilmore want to be wagon inspectors at the government depot at Jeffersonville. Other applicants include: For the mail service, John Riley, John Harris and George Riley; Indian agency, Joseph N. Alexander and D. D. Spencer. John R. East, C. R. Worrall and John D. Morgan are liable to present claims for recognition.

VERNON.—James W. Clarkson, J. W. Forsyth, who was postmaster under Cleveland, E. J. Hutton and J. W. Sinnett will be applicants for the post-office at Butlerville.

WATERLOO.—Lee F. Stamets is an applicant for the post office. He was not included in the former list.

FRANKLIN.—Benjamin P. Brown, who served four years under Cleveland, desires re-appointment as postmaster. Samuel Harris, ex-mayor and chairman of the county central committee, is prominently mentioned; so also William Neal, ex-sheriff, S. M. Forsythe, Aquilla Mathes, J. M. Needham, John Diel, A. B. Colton and A. M. Ragsdale. J. C. McNutt, prosecuting attorney of the Shelby-Johnson circuit, will petition for appointment as judge, vice Judge Hackney, elevated to the supreme bench. At Greenwood John Taylor Green, John Arbuckle, J. S. Pernet, Samuel Jennings and Jordan Graves want the post-office. Dr. Meyers, of Edinburg, commander G. A. R. post, wants on the board of pension examiners. Dr. W. C. Hall, L. L. Whitesides and J. F. Jones, of this city, aspire to the same position, as also Drs. Lee and Province, of Union Village, and Dr. Willan, of Trafalgar.

WINCHESTER.—Lewis Ellingham, Frank Preston, Conrad Meier, Oliver Davis, Charles Favorite, Andrew Lewis, Garland D. Williamson, Mrs. Emma Riley and S. O. Irvin are named as applicants for the post-office. Mr. Irvin was tendered the position eight years ago, but declined in favor of John Neff, who was an old man and an applicant for the place. It is understood that ex-Governor Gray will support Mr. Irvin. Col. Martin B. Miller, who held a position in the pension department under Cleveland, will be an applicant for something similar.

LEBANON.—Mr. S. M. Ralston writes to the News that he was wrongly classified as an applicant for postmaster at Lebanon. He should not have been included in the list forwarded from that point.

LAPEL.—J. W. Barrett is named as a probable successor of W. H. Walker, the present postmaster.

MARTINSVILLE.—Eb. Henderson, deputy commissioner of internal revenue under Cleveland, is desirous of being appointed commissioner. James A. Lewis, who served as postmaster twenty-two months under Cleveland, and who is chairman of the county central committee, is thought to have a good chance for reappointment as postmaster; he will be opposed by John C. Duncan, Harry Tarlton and John Fuselman, Sr. Drs. S. A. Tilford, J. C. Paxon, R. H. Tar-ton and S. H. Schofield have an eye on the pension examiners' board. Col. Jeff K. Scott is mentioned in connection with the adjutant-generalship of the state.

ANDERSON.—It is pretty definitely settled that Dale J. Crittenger, editor of the Anderson Democrat, will receive the appointment of postmaster for Anderson under the Cleveland administration. He is the son-in-law of Postmaster Daniels, and it is thought the latter will resign soon after the 4th of March, so that Crittenger may take the office.

ROCKVILLE.—The Parke county democrats are not talking much about the offices. Lo Humphries, county chairman, is mentioned for postmaster; so, also, John Overman, T. F. Gaebler. J. R. Strouse, editor of the Tribune, is being boomed by the Republican, the opposition paper. Mrs. Maggie Stockbridge, chief deputy under W. E. Henkel, postmaster under Cleveland before, is talked of. No aspirants for federal positions are heard of, Parke county democrats standing little chance with their hungrier brethren in Montgomery and Vigo counties.

JEFFERSONVILLE.—Strangely enough, the office-hunter has not yet developed with anything like the expected virulence in this county or city. Sheriff P. C. Donovan can have the post-office if he wants it. S. B. Diffenderfer is asking for it, and friends are pushing Capt. "Polk" Burlingame for the place. Capt. Henry Dugan, of the ferry company, wants to be inspector of the steamboats in this district. The great government depot of quartermasters' supplies is located here, with half a hundred subordinate positions, ranging from a mule-driver to a two thousand-dollar clerkship. A clean sweep will be demanded.

BLOOMFIELD.—For the post-office: W. E. Inman, deputy under the Cleveland regime; Will Isensee, ex-deputy auditor; Horace V. Norrell, ex-prison director; Geo. E. Endres and M. L. Combs. W. M. Moss, of the Democrat, expects the best thing in the district to be given him.

VALPARAISO.—A mass-meeting has unanimously adopted resolutions favoring the candidacy of John Brodie for the district marshalship of Indiana. Mr. Brodie is chairman of the democratic county committee.

NEW CASTLE.—Citizens regardless of party affiliations are working to secure the appointment of the Hon. George B. Morris as secretary of agriculture under Cleveland. Mr. Morris is vice-president of the First National Bank of New Castle, and a personal friend of Mr. Cleveland.—Indianapolis News, Nov. 22.

GREENFIELD.—The Hon. David S. Gooding wants a paying position either in the foreign service or at Washington. Eugene C. Boyden will apply for a place in the government printing office or in the railway mail service. The Rev. Andrew J. Anderson wants a position as deputy revenue collector in this district. Dr. J. N. Howard, Jr., will seek appointment on the board of pension examiners. Those named for the post-office include: Jonathan Q. Johnson, ex-city clerk; Eugene Lewis, editor of the Greenfield Herald; Charles C. Cochran, who was a candidate under Cleveland before, and Isaiah A. Curry, ex city treasurer and chairman county committee. Captain Curry, while treasurer, sustained a loss of $8,000 by the failure of Indianapolis banks, and he made good the deficiency out of his private store.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

Nothing in the way of a political excitement that ever occurred in this state equaled that occasioned here this afternoon upon the publication, in two afternoon papers, of a story of attempted bribery in connection with the approaching election, in which United States Senator Anthony Higgins is personally involved.

The story of the attempted debauchery of the ballot is told by Isaac J. Wootten, of Laurel, Sussex county, a democratic registrar for the east election district of Little Creek hundred, upon whom the attempt was made. The man who makes this astounding charge against the republican senator from the state of Delaware is a citizen of the highest respectability, against whose character for integrity and veracity not a word can be uttered. He is major of the First Regiment, National Guard of Delaware, and a business man of high standing in the town of Laurel.

Major Wootten has made affidavit to the truth of his statement, which is being held in reserve to refute any denials that may be put forth by the accused parties.

Major Wootten says that George E. Smith, the postmaster at Laurel, who was appointed by Higgins, came into his store about four weeks ago and told him he had been waiting a long time to talk politics with him. Smith, who is a republican "worker" of the most unscrupulous kind, began by asking him, he says, what he expected to get out of politics, any way.

He said that Wootten was a hard-working democrat, and the latter told him he didn't expect to get anything unless Mr. Cleveland was elected. Smith went on to talk about the certainty of republican success, and finally told Wootten that if he would help the republicans they would surely carry Sussex county, in which case he should have "anything he wanted." He added that if Wootten didn't believe him he would summon Senator Higgins to Laurel to convince him.

Wootten continues his story as follows: "I felt like knocking Smith down when he approached me in this way, but I wanted to find out from him all I could, and controlled myself so I could get more from him. He went on to say that I could help the republicans as registrar by 'turning down democrats,' that is, by registering republicans as qualified voters when they were not qualified.

"He said if I wanted to, and just said the word, the democrats would make me voters, assistant, and if I was voters' assistant I could so manipulate the tickets of illiterate voters' that they wouldn't know it, and that I could stamp the tickets so that democratic ballots would turn out to be stamped for the republicans when they came to be counted.

"After our first talk in this way I immediately consulted Col. William T. Records, of Laurel, who is a prominent democrat and the nominee of the democrats for state senator in our county. I asked him to go to Georgetown and see Alfred P. Robinson, chairman of the democratic county committee, and consult him as to what I should do to expose the fraud and bribery which I was satisfied the republicans contemplated in our county.

"Col. Records went to Georgetown, and said he had seen Mr. Robinson, and that they thought it best for me to lead Smith on and get what I could out of him."

Wootten goes on to say that Smith kept pursuing him, and he kept on putting him off until he learned the decision that Records and Robinson had come to. Then he told Smith he could get the place of voters' assistant, and Smith insisted on bringing Senator Higgins down to see him. A few days later Smith made an appointment with Wootten to come to his house on the night of October 13.

Wootten goes on with his story thus:

"About 10:30 or 11 o'clock I went up to Smith's back door as he had requested, and he met me in his back yard and took me into his house, where I found Senator Anthony Higgins waiting for me.

"Higgins began to talk about the certainty of Harrison's election, and went on to mention what states he would carry. 'Delaware is sure for him,' says he. 'If you will do this thing we're all right.'

"He said that he would get me any place under the government I wanted outside the civil service. He said: 'Of course, I can't tell you what a third man will do, but Harrison will back me up and Noble will stand by me.' The next morning Smith came to see me to talk to me, and said to me that Higgins meant what he said.

"I reported all this to some of my friends, and they told me try to get Mr. Higgins to promise me some particular place. So I said to Smith that I wanted the place in the land office that Gus Parsons, of Salisbury, had under Mr. Cleveland.

"Smith told me that he wrote to Mr. Higgins, and when he got a reply showed me Mr. Higgins's letter. Higgins said that he didn't see any Gus Parsons in the Blue book, but found that a J. A. Parsons, of Maryland, had an eighteen hundred dollar place. Smith told me that that wasn't good enough for me.

"The letter which Smith showed me was on one of Mr. Higgins's letter-heads, and in a postscript Higgins told Smith to destroy the letter.

"Last Saturday, when I was sitting on the board of registration, it was necessary to decide to strike off the names of some republicans who had been registered improperly as qualified voters. Smith came to me and said he didn't understand what I meant by such action. I told him that he knew I could not do otherwise, with the democrats all around me knowing what I did, and I think he left me with the idea that everything was all right for his scheme. Wednesday night Smith, I think, went to see Mr. Higgins at some place where he was to speak, to find out a better place for me. I haven't seen him since."

A representative of the associated press saw Senator Higgins this afternoon and handed him a copy of the paper containing the charges against him. Mr. Higgins said:

"About two weeks ago, while I was at Laurel, Wootten called on me at the house of George Smith, informing me that he desired to change his political connection and to solicit an office under the government. Having understood him to be a man of influence and good standing, I told him I thought an office could be had for him. Nothing was said about what work he should do for the republican party; nothing was said about his being registrar nor voters' assistant; nor did I know he was a registrar, nor even hear that he was until a reporter so said to me to-day. Nothing was said as to his doing, nor did I have any understanding that he was to do anything on behalf of the republican party as an official, or in the discharge or abuse of any official duty. Subsequently, Mr. Smith wrote to me to know if Wootten could have a place in the land office held by one 'Gus' Parsons, and I replied that I could find no such person's name in the Blue book, but only one John A. Parsons."—Wilmington Dispatch to New York Times, October 30.

In his explanation of the attempted corrupt deal with Major Wootten for the vote of Sussex county, made public last night, Senator Higgins practically admitted his connection with the unsavory affair, and also admitted having met Major Wootten at the house of Postmaster Smith, the other republican conspirator, in Laurel. His declaration to this effect has been published all over the country.

Last night telegrams were sent flying in all directions in a wild endeavor to find Smith and summon him to Wilmington, presumably for the purpose of holding a conference and agreeing upon some concerted explanation of the perplexing situation. But Smith failed to respond. This morning, however, realizing that it was incumbent upon him to say something, and evidently unaware that Senator Higgins had admitted that he met Wootten at his house, Smith hastily wired to a newspaper in Wilmington the following dispatch:

"LAUREL, Del., Oct. 30.—Wootten's statement is without a word of truth. I defy him to produce the letters. Wootten offered to sell the secrets of his party to me for a position. I mentioned the fact to Higgins and he refused to have a thing to do with the matter, and I declared the whole thing off with Wootten on Tuesday night last. He then became alarmed and made a lie out of the whole cloth, with the help of others in Wilmington, as a cut at an honorable senator. D. E. SMITH."

This bold denial only puts a worse face on the affair, for while Higgins admits the Wootten interview, Postmaster Smith now asserts that Higgins declined to have anything to do with the attempted deal.—Wilmington Dispatch to New York Times, October 31.

Another chapter in the republican plot to corrupt the vote of Sussex county is given in an affidavit made by Cyrus Ward, the democratic nominee for treasurer of that county, a man who is well known and whose reputation stands indorsed by hundreds, if not thousands, who have heretofore recommended him for official appointment at the hands of the governor.

The affidavit shows that Mr. Ward was one of the men whom Senator Higgins went down to Laurel on October 13 to meet at Postmaster Smith's house, and it further shows that the Rev. Jonathan S. Willis, the republican nominee for congress, is as lavish with the offer of federal appointments for party service as is Senator Higgins himself.

In his affidavit Mr. Ward says: "About one week after the democratic county convention at Georgetown, George Smith the postmaster at Laurel, drove up to my sawmill at Coverdale Cross Roads, in Sussex county, where I was at work. In the carriage with him was Jonathan S. Willis, whom I knew only by sight. Mr. Smith got out of the carriage and came into the mill. He asked me to come outside for a little talk, and we went to one side of the mill. He said:

"You have been treated badly by the democratic party and I would like to make a proposition to you to help us (meaning the republicans). I know you are a democrat, but if you will do what we want I will see that you get a genteel, permanent and lucrative position."

"I didn't ask him what it was, for I didn't interest myself in what he was saying, but he went on to state that it was a clerkship; that the work would be easy and not more than eight hours a day, and that it would pay not less than $1,000 a year, and perhaps $1,200 or $1,500. During the conversation he said: 'If you think favorably of this call at my store in Laurel.'

"As he was leaving he asked me to walk out to the carriage and meet Mr. Willis. To Mr. Willis he said: 'Mr. Ward is a democrat and can do as much or more than any man in Little Creek Hundred. I have just told him that if he will help us this fall I will get him a good office that he will think something of.'

"Mr. Willis spoke up and said: 'If I am elected to congress, and every one says I will be, I will do all I can to carry out Mr. Smith's suggestions in regard to federal positions.'

"I replied, 'Very well,' and they drove off. "On October 9, Mr. Smith drove to my house and said that he had seen Senator Higgins, and that the senator said he could get me a place not later than the 1st of January, and perhaps by the 1st of December. He repeated what he had said at the mill. He asked me if I knew how the democrats were going to spend their money. I told him I did not. He said: 'We propose to hire them to stay at home, and that is the way we want you to work your men.' I suppose he meant the men I have some influence with. He said they were giving $5 to $10 apiece to them to stay at home.

"I said: 'If I should conclude to do this, and you should fail, where would I be?' He replied: 'We don't expect you to do it all; we have lots of others who are working for us.' I suppose by lots of others he meant democrats."

In conclusion, Mr. Ward says Mr. Smith set a date for him to meet Senator Higgins, but he did not go.—Wilmington Dispatch to New York Times, November 3.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

If we see nothing in our victory but a license to revel in partisan spoils, we shall fail at every point.—
President-elect Cleveland at New York, November 18.

VOL. I, No. 47.

INDIANAPOLIS, JANUARY, 1893.

TERMS: { 50 cents per annum.
5 cents per copy.

Published monthly. Publication office, No. 23 N. Meridian St., Indianapolis, Ind. Address,
THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.
Indianapolis, Ind.

THE arrangement under which the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has been published will end with the next number. If no new arrangement is made the publication will then cease. The last number will be delayed on account of the index and also to enable it to cover Harrison's administration to the end. It is not necessary to repeat that no one except the printer and the postmaster is paid anything in connection with this publication. The accounts are open to the inspection of subscribers, and statements of them have been at frequent periods sent for inspection to various centers where the CHRONICLE had large support. If publication is discontinued all unexpired subscriptions will be returned and all funds left over will be under the order of those who contributed them. There will be no unpaid debts, and there is nothing in the four years' career of the paper of which those who have been actively connected with it are not frankly and openly proud. Many will be glad to see the CHRONICLE stop.

LETTER-CARRIER DUNN, of the Indianapolis post-office, seems, by the account of his transactions printed in other columns, to have acted in deliberate and insolent defiance of the law. The evidence appears conclusive that he solicited contributions for political purposes of other federal officers and that he did so in a federal building. Postmaster Thompson did his duty in promptly dismissing Dunn. County Treasurer Backus figures in this business. He called upon the democratic employes of the post-office to make up four hundred dollars to pay a debt of the county democratic committee. Having bidden them to the Hendricks club he took them into a room by themselves and told them that the next postmaster was named, and that he was a good democrat, and that those who contributed freely would be remembered. Making his own hide safe, he puts up Dunn to violate the law. Again, after the election and after it is known that these employes will have a democrat over them, who, if he is dishonest, can trick them out of promotion or out of their places, he tells them that the next postmaster is named, and that he is a good democrat, and that those who contribute freely will be remembered. There is a covert threat in this declaration that makes it inseparable from blackmailing. Those who do not contribute freely will be remembered also. That is what the words mean. Further, these men are in the classified service. They get their places by competition, and their right to promotion rests upon their daily record of efficiency. There is no way of "remembering" them, either by way of reward or punishment, without violating the law. This did not trouble Backus, but it will seriously trouble any one who tries to put it into practice.

THE transfer of all of the free-delivery post-offices and the weather bureau service by President Harrison to the classified service is the most notable event in civil service reform that has happened under this administration. In Indiana, for instance, instead of only one city many cities will afford a daily object lesson in the fairest and most democratic method of distributing public employment that has ever been discovered. It is to be regretted that the President did not see his way clear to transfer a much larger portion of the service. There is no fitness nor sense in going out into the streets and picking up ward-heelers, absolutely ignorant of the duties required and making them heads of divisions in the Indianapolis post-office or in any other office as is now the practice, and the stupidity of the practice becomes intolerable when it is considered that these ward-heelers are made superintendents of highly skilled under-employees who are thus cut off from promotion. Nor is there any reason why the pension agency of this city with its twenty-five employes, should continue to be the family perquisite of the agent, nor that custom-houses and revenue offices of the country should again present disgraceful scenes of onslaught for spoil. But we are gladder than we can express to have this large extension to post-offices. It is another conclusive evidence that civil service reform is grinding the life out of favoritism in the public service.

IN the west we have seen in democratic quarters no criticism of the President's action. The Buffalo Courier, which ought to know better, says that it was done with a design to keep republicans in office, and that President Cleveland took care not to put his transfer of the railway mail service to the classified service four years ago beyond the power of his successor and therefore he fixed the date of taking effect, March 15, 1889. Like William Tell and the apple, this story will have to go the way of all the world. The date, March 15, was a clerical mistake, President Cleveland having ordered and intended that February 15 should be the date. The Courier ought to know that this transfer of post-offices does not prevent the dismissal of unfit persons. Their places however must be filled by competition. Complaints against the extension of the rules at this particular time lead to the suspicion that the real grievance is that it so far prevents the quartering of a new lot of democratic politicians upon the public. It undoubtedly does do this unless the law is tricked. All the signs are that Mr. Cleveland does not intend to let it be tricked. In all places where the civil service law is to be newly applied civil service reformers should critically watch every movement made. There should be a local committee of one or more determined men, self-constituted if necessary, whose business should be to note every departure from absolutely fair dealing with competitors. In Indiana the state civil service reform association should appoint such committees.

THERE is still undoubtedly a wide-spread feeling that competitors who are not of the party in power stand no chance. A great change has taken place in this respect. Many postmasters take pride in a rigid and impartial enforcement of the law and in a short time it will be regarded as a public disgrace, rather than as an evidence of "smartness" for any officer to try to "beat" the fair intent of the law. Public opinion more and more requires that the highest on the list shall be taken, unless there is a good business reason for passing to the second or third. In the coming four years it is to be hoped that all parties and creeds will crowd the eligible lists.

No honest democrat can complain of any number of transfers to the classified service. The democratic platform says that the offices ought not to be subject to change at every election and the only way at present to carry out this principle is to place the offices under the civil service law. President Cleveland ought to complete what Harrison has left undone. We are glad to see the civil service rules extended at any time. The merit system can fight its way against any odds. But now at the end of two successive administrations and after the offices in question had been filled with partisans, large extensions have been made. This process puts the hardest possible strain upon the law, because partisans of the incoming administration claim that they have been "euchred" and are tempted to evade the law—a temptation Harrison's administration shamelessly yielded to and thus started on the road to final defeat. The law should now have its turn and should be given a fair chance. Whatever President Cleveland is going to do, he ought to do early. It is established beyond question that a process of turning out republicans and putting in democrats will weaken the party of the latter. Then why do it? Why not put an end to the matter by extending the rules to all offices to which they are applicable? The establishment of the registry system for the labor service is a simple matter, and if congress will not do it, it can be done by an executive order. Then let it be understood that there will be no headman of fourth-class postmasters and no fourth-class post-offices to be vacated until congress has made it practicable to fill them without favoritism.

AMONG the backwoods jokes may be put down the late introduction of a bill by Congressman DeArmond, a Missouri democrat, to suspend all civil service rules during the first year of each presidential term. And very much like it is the bill lately introduced by Congressman Martin of this state to limit the terms of all federal employes to four years. Why not include the Atlas Engine Works of this city where about a thousand men are employed? The trouble with all of these men is that with a blindness like Egyptian darkness they will not see that the same principles apply to public and private business. They think that in public business there is something else than mere business principles—that there is something left over. At present there is something over. There is money to pay to political blackmailers. There is time to be watch-dogs for congressmen. There is time to set up primaries for the renomination of a President. There is time to howl down opposition in and around a national convention and to do many other things to carry out the "policy" of an administration. For more than twenty years congressmen alone have stood in the way of ridding the service of these badges of feudalism and imperialism.

MR. CLEVELAND need not fear that the people are anything but thoroughly satisfied with his openly expressed opinion that Murphy ought not to be senator from New York. No one outside of a lot of cheap politicians is in the least concerned at this "interference." Murphy, like Quay, is the final and finished product of the system by which a party machine gets control of the public offices and public contracts of a state and treats them as plunder. When it is understood that only those who will obey certain bosses can have any chance at this plunder, such present themselves and are employed. Then follow subservient primaries, conventions, and, later, a legislature absolutely under these bosses. This body will choose a statesman for senator if the bosses say so; or it will, if ordered, choose a smart political rounder like Murphy. New York politics will not sink any lower. Mr. Cleveland ought to be at open, irreconcilable, relentless war with this whole crowd. Murphy can not live politically without spoil to divide. Deprived of this, he would pass away as effectually as Roscoe Conkling did for the same reason.

WHEN it is doubted that Mr. Cleveland will be ruled by congressmen in the matter of appointments, the Bourbons answer glibly that he will want the support of senators and representatives and will therefore have to yield to them. Mr. Cleveland is not a safe man to try the stand-and-deliver policy on. This is an old plan, and it has always been more or less successful; but it may not succeed with Mr. Cleveland. Suppose, for instance, he should conclude not to allow Senator Turpie to appoint a postmaster at Indianapolis; what could Turpie do? Nothing but sit in the senate and look glum. And what could Senator Voorhees do if cut off from naming the Terre Haute postmaster? Nothing but bluster. It is said that the senate would not confirm nominations. Then let them go unconfirmed. There is no greater humbug than this pretense of the terrible things congressmen will do if the President does not knuckle to them. Before a determined President they would go down like men of straw, or up like smoke before a wind.

PRESIDENT PATTON, of Princeton college, is reported to have recently said: "I am interested in philosophy and theology, and these are the only things I want to be known in. I vote for neither party." It is a stigma upon President Patton, an American citizen, to show such callousness to his duty.—Civil Service Chronicle.

If President Patton is correctly reported he must have said: "I vote for neither party" with a twinkle in his eye, for he is not an American citizen. He was born on the island of Bermuda and has never been naturalized, because if he did certain property interests in Bermuda would be alienated.—Indianapolis News.

The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is also in receipt of a private letter containing similar information. As the purported statement of President Patton was seen in the New York Evening Post some days before the late election, and was never contradicted, it seemed just to comment upon a college president who could say: "I am interested in philosophy and theology, and these are the only things I want to be known in." This paper is very glad if it is in error.

When Tammany pursues its bold and iniquitous way in New York because of the indifference, selfishness and party bigotry of the decent citizens; when Quay is returned to the senate by influences of the same character in Pennsylvania, there is nothing more depressing than to see young college men return to their homes such political bigots that they smother all their moral senses regarding their own party, or to see them return "interested in philosophy and theology," society or foot ball, but bored by any intimation that they have, as citizens, pressing, disagreeable and continuous duties to perform. There is no doubt but that nearly all American colleges are failures so far as turning out young men who have an active conscience for the duties of citizenship.

THE police commissioners of New York wanted a police matron, and, as the place was within the civil service law, the city civil service authorities put the competitive examination under the charge of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell and Miss Edith Collins as being especially fitted to test applicants in the duties required. There were 114 applicants, and of these only 39 were found fit for a place on the eligible list. All, however, were graded in the order of merit. In the eighty-fourth place on the list was one, Mrs. Lizzie Molony, who had come to the examination saying that she expected to get the place because she had political influence. There were ten weights, and experience was to count two. Mrs. Molony was found to be without experience of any kind, even in housekeeping. The results of the examination were handed in and Mrs. Molony was promptly appointed to the matronship. The Tammany civil service board had taken the papers and given Molony 65 for experience where the examiners who had tested her had given nothing, and 95 for technical knowledge and intelligence where the ladies gave her 60, and 100 for writing where the ladies gave 60, and, after some other dextrous turns, behold a new eligible list with 101 names, and Lizzie Molony standing first. That is the incorruptible way in which Tammany does business. Lizzie Molony turns out to be a professional beggar of twelve years' standing, and her touching appeals for "aid" addressed to various individuals cover pages of the records of the charity organization society of New York.

REPUBLICAN papers are spending their time abusing mugwumps and urging their party to "organize" at once for future work. Mugwumps who know how to remember facts and how to use them in a campaign are amused at any plan which proposes to attain success by organizing a party machine. Republicans may organize until they get their last man into some club and make him a blind and stupid follower of their Quays and Platts and yet they will lack votes, and before they get the lacking votes they will have to learn the simple rule of keeping promises. They know what their platform was in 1888 in relation to extending the civil service law. Yet we do not recollect having seen anywhere any intimation to President Harrison before the late defeat from any republican paper, or club, or party committee, or convention, or organization of any kind, that he ought to make additions to the classified service as the platform promised. The few individual republicans like Sherman S. Rogers and Theodore Roosevelt who urged him to do this were put down by the mass of active republicans as no better than mugwumps. By this and other treachery the republicans have succeeded in driving almost every progressive man out of their party and "organization" will not make up the loss.

THE New York Recorder prints an interview with John Sabine Smith which shows a truly chastened spirit. Being stranded beyond all chance of getting offices, and being without power to put republican "principles" into practice, all should work to establish those principles "without fear or favor." Smith says:

"Being practically out of power at once in the nation, state and city, there is not much left for republicans except the principles of the party, which are eternally true, and the heritage of its great men and great deeds of the past. Once more we can look each other in the face and discuss the great questions of the day without fear of jostling aside any one from his ambition to secure office. Therefore, there seems to me to be no good reason why all of us should not pull together for the establishment of these great principles without fear or favor. This, I believe, will unite and vitalize the party to a degree it has not known since the days of its inception. It is not so much a question of kind or form of organization as it is to bring the whole line into harmonious action for a common purpose."

"APPOINTMENTS" BY CONGRESSMEN.

Bourbon democrats and democratic papers in Indiana are blandly expatiating upon the blessedness of the President having congressmen to make appointments to offices for him throughout the country. All through this state, as our columns show, congressmen have gone to work hearing applications and deciding whom they will "appoint" to all the federal offices, without any apparent knowledge that the constitution absolutely lodges this duty elsewhere, and without the least apparent thought that President Cleveland may have a mind of his own in this matter and may tell them plainly that they are officious and pestiferous meddlers. Congressman Bynum will allow Senator Turpie to "appoint" the postmaster at Indianapolis, and Turpie is giving a large portion of his time to hearing claimants and their friends and backers. Congressman Brookshire will allow Senator Voorhees to "appoint" the postmaster at Terre Haute and Senator Voorhees regrets "that there are so few offices to be given to so many worthy and capable applicants." It is to him "a most painful duty to be compelled to decide between friends who are equally meritorious and capable." Congressman Cooper has been traveling from town to town in his district solely to hear applicants and their backers and determine whom he will "appoint" to the various offices, and so on to the end. Is Indiana never to be relieved of moss-backed, hide-bound, dyed-in-the-wool Bourbons? Every one of these men indorsed a platform which said that the offices ought not to be subject to change at every election and yet before Mr. Cleveland is inaugurated they are working day and night to bring about such a change. Will they never learn that civil administration in this country is advancing, and that the methods under Pierce and Buchanan are not the methods of to-day? The interference of congressmen in federal appointments is not only a usurpation of power belonging to the executive, but it is an unmixed and unmitigated evil and has been so regarded by the best men of all parties for many years. The practice is destined to be completely broken up and a congressman who had a single element of the statesman in him would be trying, as Mr. Andrew tries, to find some way to hasten the end. Yet not a single Indiana congressman ever thinks of the subject with so much attention as he gives to a single cross-roads post-office. Again, the merit system in its different forms adapted to the labor service, the classified service and the selection of fourth-class post-masters is going to prevail in the federal service. Its opponents all recognize and reluctantly admit that "it has come to stay." Next to the relief of the country from slavery, this revolution now going on will take rank. Yet it has not the good-will of a single Indiana congressman.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF INDIANA.

For every member of the legislature who came in here to-day there arrived not less than two men who wanted office under the general assembly, or who had friends whom they desired to help along. The men who are after the principal offices have nearly all been at the hotel since Saturday, with no material at hand on which to work, and when the law-makers began to drop in this forenoon, singly and in couples, they were pounced on as a drove of hungry wolves would pounce upon a flock of sheep. Old politicians declare that the crowd of office-seekers that has preceded the members to the city is the hungriest they have ever come in contact with. If it were left to the candidates for the principal offices to make all the noise, there wouldn't be a great deal of interest in the contest; it is the men who desire appointments under the successful aspirants for the best places that are doing the hardest work. It is estimated that there are, all told, over one thousand of these place-seekers, and each one has his favorite candidate for door-keeper, or secretary of one of the houses. Some two or three hundred aspirants for five-dollar-a-day places are from this city, and they are not permitting the floor of the hotel corridor to get cold under their feet.—Indianapolis News, January 2.

The usual activity preceding the meeting of the legislature is at its height at the state house. The number of visitors is large, and as the time grows shorter the office-seekers fairly swarm in and out of the building. They seem to have centered their clamor at the capitol on Governor-elect Matthews, and his office is constantly besieged by the aspirants. As soon as the doors of his office are opened in the morning the stream of men begins to pour in, and continues until the closing hours in the afternoon.

The candidates have all kinds of foundations upon which they think the secretary of state can base his indorsement of their causes. One candidate sought Mr. Matthews' aid in securing an appointment in the legislature, basing his claims on having knocked a man down during the campaign for having said some slighting things about the secretary. It is authoritatively announced that Myron D. King will be Mr. Matthews' private secretary, and Miss Callie McMechen will be the clerk in the governor's office. Miss McMechen is the first woman that was ever appointed to the position in this state. The appointment of the messenger has not yet been announced. The appointment of secretary of state to serve eight days, and other appointments to be made by the new governor, have not been made public.—Indianapolis News, January 4.

The struggle for the minor positions in the two houses began last night immediately after the caucus ended. The nominees were besieged and importuned upon every side by an army of applicants representing almost every county in the state. The hotel corridors and the lobbies in the capitol building swarmed with them. The successful candidates were given a taste of what political success means.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 5.

THE HOUSE.

Chief Clerk Crawley, of the house, has not made up his list of subordinates, and will not until the house decides how many men he shall have. Mr. Crawley says J. A. Marlowe, of Terre Haute; Benjamin F. Harrell, of Fayette county; Edward Leffel, Tipton, will be on his force when it is made up. He has not yet decided what work he will assign them.

Doorkeeper Glazebrook will not make up his force until the house has had a report from the committee appointed to fix the number of employes and their salaries.—Indianapolis News, Jan. 5.

In the house the method was not precisely the same. Curtis and Crawley had each several managers, as did Carter, but McMahon, of Fulton, "handled" Glazebrook alone. Crawley has nine men under him, which will probably be increased to thirteen; Carter has seven, and will have probably eleven, while Glazebrook will have twenty. They will get their lists this morning. Crawley was rather anxious last night to know whom he would appoint. Bud Swift, for chief enrolling clerk, was about the only one he knew anything about. "I can't give out Glazebrook's appointments to-night," said McMahon, when asked for the list by a Journal reporter. "Yes, I am distributing his patronage, but I got through with only fifteen promises, and I have five places I can do as I please with, so I shall not complete the list to-night." Marion county, however, is to get five doorkeepers and four clerkships, and the delegation is taking much glory to itself therefore. The celebrated "Jack" Higgins, John Mullen and "Mike" Welch are to go on doors, and a young man named Derry is to have a minor clerkship.—Indianapolis Journal, January 5.

The only patronage Speaker Curtis will have to distribute will be the places on committees and the appointing of five pages. There are already a half hundred or more applications for the latter places and each hour the number grows rapidly.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 6.

About the lobby of the Grand Hotel still lingers a horde of minor place-hunters. The men who have the patronage of the house at their disposal decline to give out any list of appointees until the committee appointed yesterday to determine the size of the force, and their compensation, reports, and that committee will probably withhold its report until Monday in the hope that the crowd will starve out, and thin out, and thus give the place-givers some chance for their lives. The committee was in session all yesterday afternoon. The force of clerks will not be cut, and the time for employing the copyists will be fixed about January 20, instead of January 26, as two years ago. All sub-clerks will receive $5 per day. Members of the doorkeeper's force will receive $5 per day from the start, instead of starting in at $4, and being granted an extra dollar a day back pay at the end of the session, as was done in 1891. This force will not be cut. The only question is whether or not Tim Griffin shall be allowed seven extra janitors at $40 a month, as was done in 1891, or only five.—Indianapolis Journal, January 7.

John F. Habernel, of Harrison county, is serving as postmaster of the house. It is understood that John Mullen, Representative Wilson's appointee of this county, is to have the place eventually.

The house pages on duty are Harry Buskirk, Frank Palmer, Leon Smith, James Kackney, Raymond Preston, Frank Fippen, Burrie Redmond, James Burke and Harry Doyle.

Miss Cora M. Alexander, of this county, has been appointed house stenographer and typewriter.—Indianapolis News, January 9.

The caucuses that followed the adjournment of the house this forenoon were for the consideration of the question of employes. The committee that was appointed the first day of the session has been having a hard time to agree upon a report. After wrestling with the question Saturday and most of yesterday the democratic members of the committee decided to leave the matter to a caucus of the democrats of the house. The three democratic members of the committee, through Chairman Cullop, reported that they had decided to recommend the appointment of twenty assistant doorkeepers and sixteen assistant clerks. The report was adopted, but not without opposition. Twenty-six members voted against the appointment of so many doorkeepers, and it is possible that these twenty-six may not abide by the decision of the caucus, but may join with the republicans in cutting down the number of doorkeepers. It was also decided by the democratic caucus that the pay of the assistant doorkeepers and assistant clerks shall be $5 a day each.

The republicans, as soon as they learned that the democrats were caucusing, went into hiding to also consider the question of employes. It was the unanimous vote of the caucus that the minority oppose any effort to increase the number of employes over that fixed by statute. It was decided not to object to the five-dollar-a-day pay of efficient clerks and doorkeepers.—Indianapolis News, January 9.

"Syd" Moon, the new reporter of the Supreme Court, is all right. He got one son in as postmaster of the house and another as assistant in the state museum, and a nephew as page in the house. "Calamity Jim" Fippen, the Tipton reformer, has secured a job for his boy as page in the house. While the little pages were discussing the matter yesterday one of them offered a resolution that "no member be permitted to bring his sons, daughters, wife or hired girl down here to be paid."—Indianapolis Journal, January 10.

Clerk Crawley, of the house, is still absent, and his appointments are not yet announced. Assistant Clerk Carter has filled his force, but declines to give out the list as yet. However, he had at work yesterday, W. I. Zacharias, ex-sheriff of Franklin county; Frank J. Kapps, of Vincennes; Mr. Buskirk, of Bloomington; T. C. Williams, of Terre Haute, and E. H. Deery, of this city.

Door-keeper Glazebrook also declines as yet to give out his list. His chief assistant is F. N. Hoffman, of Rochester, and he had on the doors yesterday W. E. Peterson, of Plymouth, W. H. Winters, of Goshen, Sylvester Bertram, of Starke county, and Philip Dellinger, of Pulaski.—Indianapolis Journal, January 10.

Cullop and his faction favored fixing the doorkeeper's force where it was last session, at twenty-two all told, fifteen doormen at $5 per day, a raise of $1 per day, and seven janitors at $45 per month, a raise of $5 per month over last session. This did not satisfy McMahon and his crowd, and an acrimonious discussion followed, in the course of which two or three of Cullop's followers declared they would not be bound by the caucus. Cullop put his views in the form of a motion, and Rodebaugh, of Fort Wayne, moved to amend by having twenty, instead of fifteen, men on the door, and two extra copying clerks. When it came to a vote the McMahon crowd won by four votes, the vote standing 26 to 30, and Mr. Cullop, as chairman of the committee, was directed to report in favor of twenty doormen at $5 per day, and seven janitors at $45 per month, making the total number of employes of the house, pages, doormen, clerks and janitors all told, fifty-eight, or over half as many as there are members. Daily, Blair, Cravens and one other member thereupon bolted and left the room. Cullop and his friends were feeling pretty badly over this after the caucus, as a little group, containing Daily, Hill, Higby and others, discussed it about Cullop's desk. "They are entirely needless," said Mr. Cullop, "and I had no idea but what our report would go through, but we got left and all these men will be employed." One of the group suggested voting with the minority, but Daily couldn't vote for anything republican, even though it were religion itself, and the group broke up without determining upon any line of action. The republican minority decided to report in favor of the number of doormen allowed by statute, seven, which is all that is needed. When the house convened after the inauguration ceremonies, about its first and only business was the presentation of the majority report of this special committee on house employes, by Cullop. It recommended seven janitors at $45 per month, twenty doorkeepers at $5 per day, seven assistants to the clerk at $5 a day, beginning at once, and three at the same salary beginning January 20, seven assistants to the assistant clerk, beginning at once and receiving $5 per day, five committee clerks at $5 per day, and four pages at $2 per day. These, with the postmaster and speaker's page, make fifty-eight employes. The report had a useless paragraph on the end of it, making it a little bit difficult to further increase the horde or their pay, put in to ease Cullop's conscience.—Indianapolis News, January 11.

Chairman Cullop, of the house committee, appointed to fix the number of employes the house should have, and their compensation, reported to the house yesterday afternoon, after the inaugural ceremonies. The majority report recommended an increase in the force. It favored the employment of seven janitors, at $45 per month; of twenty assistant door-keepers, at $5 per day; seven assistants to the chief clerk, at $5 per day, and three additional assistants on and after January 20; seven assistants to the assistant clerk, at $5 per day; five committee clerks, at $5 per day, and five pages, at $2 per day. The report of the minority of the committee was presented by Representative Brown, of Steuben county. It recommended that the house employ the number of persons allowed by statute. In the discussion of the report, Representative Cullop, who had presented the report of the majority of the committee, stated that the report was not what he desired; that the majority had been against him, and he concluded to carry out the will of that majority. Representative Lindemuth spoke for the republicans. He called the attention of the democrats to the fact that they had just returned from the corridor below where they had heard Governor Matthews, in his inaugural address, caution the legislature to be careful of the people's money. The minority report was tabled by a viva voce vote. The roll was called on the adoption of the majority report, and eight democrats bolted the caucus instructions and voted against the increase of the force. The eight were Representatives Blair, of Cass and Miami; Johnson, of Dearborn; Gill, of Huntington; Smith, of Posey; Higbee, of Sullivan; Montoux, of Vanderburgh; Cravens, of Washington, and Farlow, of Madison. The bolters nearly all explained their votes by saying that they had been sent to the legislature with the understanding that they would favor economy in the management of state affairs; they could not understand why the house needed more employes than it had two years ago.

The report of the majority of the committee was adopted by a vote of 53 to 44.—Indianapolis News, January 12.

It was evident before the house assembled this afternoon that the majority was not in good humor. It was related that the bolters of yesterday who were so "sat upon" by the speaker during the morning were mad, very mad. The keeper of the door to Speaker Curtis's room was busy. There were a score or more of members who wanted to get the speaker's ear. Among those who called was Chairman Taggart, of the democratic state committee. When Mr. Taggart came out of the room he stated that "all is now peaceable." There was much caucusing on the floor of the house, and it was finally stated, in private, that the "bolters" had been persuaded not to bring up the employe question again.—Indianapolis News, January 12.

Barnes has been mollified. He kicked up such a row about the place he was promised for a friend that the other democrats offered to make another place at the state's expense if he would quit. He got them to carry out their promise, but did not quit. Accordingly, yesterday morning early he moved to give Clerk Crawley authority to appoint a roll-clerk, and the motion was declared carried by the speaker on a viva voce vote. Barnes had threatened to offer a resolution ousting Door-keeper Glazebrook. But the howl of the "sore-heads," as the disappointed members are denominated by the rest of the democrats, had gotten beyond Barnes's control. He could not have shut off the subsequent row if he would, and probably would not if he could. During the call for new bills McIntyre, of Floyd, offered a resolution reducing the number of door-keepers from twenty to fifteen, and immediately there were signs of war. Collins at once moved to table it, and Passage raised the point of order that this whole business had been settled and clinched on Tuesday by tabling a motion to reconsider. McIntyre tried to answer the point, and claimed that it was in order at any time to increase or reduce the force. Collins tried to insist on Passage's point of order, but the speaker reminded him that it would be easier to insist on his motion to table. He did so, and the speaker was declaring it tabled when there was such a howl for the yeas and nays that he had to listen to it.

As the roll-call proceeded it became apparent that the salary-grabbers were wiped out. The republicans, consistent in their fight for economy, voted against the motion to table, and the F. M. B. A. combine and "sore-heads" did the rest. Ader and Hench and some of the other noble reformers were in a tight place, and dodged the vote until it was all over, when they asked permission to vote with the crowd.

Quite a number of these claimed to have voted with the majority in order to reconsider, and it is known that Erwin, Lowe and Stover did. When the vote was announced, McMullen at once moved to refer the McIntyre resolution to a special committee of three, and though there was a storm of nays, the speaker declared this carried. The speaker declined to announce the committee until to-day. Door-keeper Glazebrook at once consulted the roll and made up a black-list, knocked off his force the proteges of those who voted against him, and made up his "official" list of employes.—Indianapolis Journal, January 13.

THE SENATE.

There was some surprise this afternoon when Lon McClellan, of this county, candidate for doorkeeper of the Senate, withdrew from the race. The understanding is that Marion county forced Mr. McClellan off the track. Mr. McClellan was assured that he would be elected if he consented not to make any appointments from Marion county. Mr. McClellan declined to make any such promise, and stepped out of the race. He said in reference to his action:

"In withdrawing from the race for doorkeeper of the senate, I desire to return my thanks to the senators from every part of the state who so generously tendered me their support. My chief reason for withdrawal lies in the fact that I could not obtain the place without giving up the right to name my own assistants. It would have been impossible for me to reward my many friends in Marion county. I want no place for myself that will not benefit my party associates here at home. I was not a candidate in the beginning, but became such at the unanimous request of our senators. So far as honor goes, this is honor enough for me."—Indianapolis News, January 4.

The senate cabal has attended to all this very systematically. In this "combine" are twenty-six senators—none from Marion county. In their caucus at the Grand Tuesday morning they not only agreed upon the "slate," but also appointed a committee three to distribute the petty patronage. That committee consists of senators Chandler, of Hancock; Fulk, of Monroe, and McKelvey, of Owen. These statesmen met at the English Hotel last night, compared notes on promises, and made out therefrom a partial list. They were unable to see some senators to whom patronage had been promised, and could not complete it.

This petty patronage consists of a reading, roll, registry and file clerk, and five enrolling and engrossing clerks, nominally appointed by the secretary; a minute clerk, journal clerk and five copying clerks, nominally appointed by the assistant secretary; a postmaster, folding clerk, mail-carrier and fifteen doormen, cloak-room men, spittoon cleaners, etc., nominally appointed by the doorkeeper. But last night Messrs. Pleasants, Friedman and Mannix confessed to a Journal reporter that they had no idea whom they would appoint this morning. "Haven't received my list yet," was the answer of each.—Indianapolis News, January 5.

The demand for subordinate positions was not unusual, but it was felt to an uncomfortable extent by the legislators. In the senate the entire matter of appointments was referred by caucus agreement to a committee composed of Senators McKelvey, Chandler, Ellison and Holcomb. These gentlemen had a merry time farming out the places, and had not completed the task to-day. The heads of the various departments were notified that "their appointments" included the following:

FOR PRINCIPAL SECRETARY, PLEASANTS.

R. T. F. Abbott, Switzerland county, file clerk.
John McNew, Hancock county, reading clerk.
George H. Ball, Tippecanoe county, registry clerk.
Messrs. Spangler, of Huntington county, and H. H. Miller, of Marshall, engrossing clerks.
O. B. Burrell, Jackson, enrolling clerk.
A. M. Waltz, Blackford, roll clerk.
W. E. Stillwell, Gibson, unassigned.

FOR ASSISTANT SECRETARY, JOSEPH FRIEDMAN.

Charles Zuckreigel, Spencer county, journal clerk.
John Holland, Lawrence county, journal clerk.
Joseph B. Workman, Owen county, minute clerk (same as in 1891).
Charles Collius, Miami county, journal clerk.
J. M. Aiken, Sullivan, and Mr. Stillwell, of Gibson, journal clerks.

FOR W. T. MANNIX, DOOR KEEPER.

James Brovard, James Barnett, Charles F. Waltz, John Crabtree, William Snyder, Peter Hoffman, W. W. Kintner, W. L. Hulett, John Smith and five more not yet selected.

John C. Brophy, Minnie E. Galbreath and John Francin were added to the door-keeper's force this afternoon. Miss Galbreath will not "keep doors," but will be one of the folding clerks. The others are not yet assigned.

PAGES.

Fred Trevely, Warren; George Schley, Marion; O. Beck, Carroll; Leo. Lefkovits, Lake.—Indianapolis News, January 5.

The work of senators getting their sons positions as pages at $2 a day, progressed fairly well yesterday. Senator Beck, of Pulaski, and French, of Warren, both unblushingly accomplishing the delicate task.—Indianapolis Journal, January 6.

Senator Sweeny, of Perry, has seen, probably, more public service than any other man of his age in the senate. He has been sheriff three times, door-keeper of the senate, and was in the secret service under Cleveland. He is now engaged in farming near Tell City. He is yet a young man, and while not a public speaker, he knows what is going on and does not get left when it comes to obtaining patronage for his district, which also embraces Dubois. Mr. Sweeny championed Mr. Friedman's cause in his successful race for assistant secretary.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 7.

Just before adjourning yesterday morning, Senator Loveland, of Miami, offered this resolution:

WHEREAS, The debt of the state of Indiana is more than $8,000,000, and

WHEREAS, The taxes levied for the support of the state and its institutions are burdensome, and were increased at the last session of the legislature, rendering rigid economy necessary, to the end that the debt and the taxes may be reduced, and

WHEREAS, Upon yesterday a resolution was passed by this senate providing for the appointment of eleven doorkeepers of the senate in addition to the four provided for in Section No. 4970 of the Revised Statutes of 1881, making a total force of fifteen, and

WHEREAS, There are only ten doors to the senate chamber, including all the doors to the gallery, cloak-room and ante-room; therefore

Resolved, That a committee of three senators be appointed to investigate and make report to the senate on Tuesday, January 10, 1893, with recommendations as to the number of doorkeepers and assistant doorkeepers actually necessary for the dispatch of the business of the Senate, and with such report state the facts on which such recommendation is based.

Before the resolution was read, Senator McHugh, of Tippecanoe, rose to a point of order claiming that it was no time for resolutions. Senator Loveland defended the propriety of his resolution at that time and read the rules that directly supported him, but President Griffith looked down with a beneficent smile, tapping his xylophone delicately while sustaining McHugh's point of order, and the army of unnecessary doorkeepers, against whose employment the protest of the republican minority was filed the day before, and against which every citizen of the state should protest, still holds the fort. This resolution was for the express purpose of giving Senator Kern, of Marion, Senator Wray, of Shelby, and Senator Morgan, of Johnson, a chance to withdraw their support, which they had given spontaneously when the original vote was cast that the order might be temporary. The clincher put upon the steal by Senator Magee, of Cass, who moved the day before to reconsider the resolution and table the motion to reconsider, was an adroit move not anticipated by the trio of democratic senators mentioned, who now claim to be ready for any kind of penance, and would willingly be on record with the republicans.—Indianapolis Journal, January 7.

The following appointments additional to those already announced have been made by the senate:

Postmaster—Fred Zollars, of Allen county.

E. Wright, Johnson county, journal clerk; Edward Mullen, Spencer, copying clerk.

In the senate the appointees to date include fifteen doorkeepers and eighteen clerks—an excess of two in each department over the statutory number.—Indianapolis News, January 9.

Senator McHugh (Marion) offered the following resolution upon which over an hour of the senate's time was wasted by members indulging in the "old soldier racket." Both sides of the house participated:

WHEREAS, The ventilation of this chamber is so imperfect and the heat furnished so irregular as to make the chamber uncomfortable and the services of some one to look after the same needed.

Resolved, That Timothy Dawson, a soldier, be appointed at $5 per day to attend to this duty.

Mr. Loveland was for the "old soldier," but thought some member of the existing force, who was not a soldier, ought to be discharged to make room for Capt. Dawson and offered a resolution to that effect, which was rejected.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

But the "ventilation" question came up again and an hour was taken up fighting the war over. Finally Mr. McHugh's resolution prevailed by a vote of 27 to 18, and Capt. Dawson will regulate the heat and ventilation during the remainder of the session.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 19.

The infant son of the Hon. James M. Fippen, of Tipton, a page in the House, was ill yesterday and the "Sleeping Beauty" did not appear on the floor until about 3 P. M. When he did his first act was to offer a resolution for the employment of three more pages. The members supposed he had three more children unemployed at home and were appalled. The member from Tipton explained with vehement eloquence that these boys were overworked. "I know," he cried in stentorian tones, "the patriotism of Tipton county don't ask us to proceed with insufficient force, and I introduce this resolution so's that we will not be impeded, and so's that the boys won't be impaired by their health." He was called down on points of order and it was explained that the rules required such a resolution to lay over three days, but he moved to suspend the rules.—Indianapolis Journal, January 21.

ECHOES FROM THE PAST.

Another illustration of the way the administration used federal offices to secure Harrison's renomination is afforded by the story of the post-office at Princess Anne, Md., as told by E. F. Duer, the late postmaster. Duer was appointed about three years ago and has managed the office so successfully that it was not long ago raised to a higher grade, which brought the place within the range of a presidential appointment. The rule in such cases is for the President to name the incumbent if his record has been a good one, and his continuance is desired by the patrons of the office. There is no dispute whatever as to Duer's efficiency, or as to the satisfaction of the local public with his administration. He filed his papers with the department in due course on the 18th of May, and was told by the fourth assistant postmaster-general that the appointment would not be made before fifteen days. Notwithstanding this, seven days later W. F. Lankford was appointed, without even a notice to Duer that his claims would be heard, and without any examination by the postmaster-general of the papers which he had filed. The explanation is that Lankford's name was presented by Thomas S. Hodson, who was a delegate to the republican national convention, then soon to meet. As Duer says in his letter to the postmaster-general, "How far these things stood to each other in relation to cause and effect, is a question which each one can decide for himself, and in view of the charges generally made as to the manner in which the President's renomination was effected, it may prove an interesting question."—New York Evening Post, August 3.

The democratic campaign opened in Ohio to-day with a meeting at Woodsdale Island Park, near Hamilton, Butler county. It was estimated that fully five thousand people were in attendance. Ex-Governor Campbell, who was among his home neighbors, made a short and witty speech, confined mostly to sallies at the audience as some one would prompt him with a question. He spoke of Mr. Stevenson's record as a creator of democratic postmasters, relating an incident where the present candidate for vice president had, as a favor to him [Campbell], decapitated sixty-five republican postmasters in two minutes. He regarded a man of that sort as a vigorous and true democrat. When the cheers following this statement had subsided, Mr. Stevenson rose and said he considered that the highest compliment he had received in his whole life.—Cincinnati Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 1.

THE ONSLAUGHT.

"Public office is a public trust. We reaffirm the declaration of the democratic national convention of 1876 for the reform of the civil service, [Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the government business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot box, be a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor, assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men, nor the instrument of their ambition] and we call for the honest enforcement of all laws regulating the same. The nomination of a President, as in the recent republican convention by delegations composed largely of his appointees, holding office at his pleasure, is a scandalous satire upon free popular institutions, and a startling illustration of the methods by which a President may gratify his ambition. We denounce a policy under which federal office-holders usurp control of party conventions in the states, and we pledge the democratic party to the reform of these and all other abuses which threaten individual liberty and local self-government."—National Democratic Platform, 1892.

COOPER'S DOMAIN.

FRANKLIN.—Office aspirants continue to multiply. Prominently mentioned for the post-office at Trafalgar appear the names of J. C. Slack, D. H. Hunter, J. C. White and Mrs. Van Cleve. The promise of Congressman Cooper to recommend Samuel Harris for postmaster here is still a favorite topic of discussion, and A. B. Colton, a defeated candidate, has challenged Mr. Harris to a public discussion why he (Colton) should have been the chosen one. The question may be put to a vote of the citizens. It seems to be authoritative dictum that the next pension board will include Dr. Province, of Providence; Dr. Myers, of Edinburg, and Dr. Whitesides, of Franklin.—Indianapolis News, Dec. 13.

PLAINFIELD.—Isaac Holton, has been recommended by Congressman Cooper as an efficient person to succeed William Stanley as postmaster at this place. Mr. Holton is proprietor of the Mansion House Hotel and one of the leading democrats of the town.—Indianapolis News, Dec. 16.

TRAFALGAR.—The post-office race is ended at Trafalgar, Congressman Cooper having written persons here and in that town to the effect that he had decided to recommend Carey J. Slack.

MOORESVILLE.—The race for the post-office at this place was brought to a sudden termination to-day by several letters to prominent democrats from Congressman Cooper, stating his intention to recommend the appointment of John J. Bayless to be postmaster. The notice was received before other applicants had forwarded their petitions.—Indianapolis News, December 20.

PLAINFIELD.—Could George W. Cooper, of the fifth congressional district, be in Plainfield for an hour or so any day of the week since it has become known that he had decided to recommend Isaac Holton for the postmastership at this place, he would have to listen to the preaching of his funeral before he was ready to plant beneath the sod. A madder set of office-seekers were never seen than at present in this vicinity. The democrats here do not regard Mr. Charlton as a simon pure, dyed-in-the-wool, Jacksonian democrat, and claim that he was a republican during the Grant campaign, and only abandoned that party in hopes of finding pastures more green in the fold of the party of broken promises and pledges. There has not been the best of feeling existing between the prominent democrats of this place and the reform school since the memorable democratic convention held at Gosport several years ago, in which the reform school delegates took such a prominent part against the renomination of Congressman Matson. It is also claimed that Mr. Charlton has held his position as superintendent through republican and democratic administrations solely through his indifference to politics. It is openly charged that Cooper listened to no one except Mr. Charlton in making the selection of a postmaster for Plainfield. One of the defeated aspirants for post-office honors said, in the hearing of the Journal correspondent, Thursday: "An election will be held by the democrats, and the lucky aspirant will be recommended to Congressman Cooper for appointment."—Indianapolis Journal, December 23.

SPENCER.—Congressman G. W. Cooper has announced his intention of recommending C. L. Wampler for the position of postmaster at Gosport.

He was at Spencer last night, and listened to the appeals of applicants for a like position here. Mr. Cooper reserved his decision, but it is conceded that Otto Dickerson, ex auditor, will be recommended. Many desire an election to settle the matter.—Indianapolis News, December 27.

SPENCER.—Congressman Cooper was in Spencer last night, and gave audience to candidates for the post-office and their friends. A majority of them favored holding a primary election, but this Mr. Cooper would not sanction. He has decided to recommend O. T. Dickerson. This is in return for personal favors to himself. When Cooper was needing votes to nominate him, Dickerson and S. L. Wallace (now of Indianapolis) were the only friends he had in Owen county. C. L. Wampler will be recommended at Gosport.—Indianapolis Journal, December 27.

GREENCASTLE.—Congressman Cooper has been here among his constituents and disposing of the patronage at his command. Applicants for the different post-offices in the county have been here to interview him. The fight for the office at Cloverdale is between Horn and Foster, with the chances in favor of Foster. Milroy Gordon and Oliver Hubbard are both named for the office at Bainbridge, with the chances in favor of Gordon, if he wants it. Charles E. Winn will probably be chosen at Russellville and Charles Lewis at Okalla. There will be no primary election held at this place for the purpose of choosing a postmaster, but the impression is that Willis G. Neff will be the lucky man. Mr. Neff held the office under Mr. Cleveland.—Indianapolis Sentinel, Jan. 7.

GREENCASTLE.—Hon. George W. Cooper visited this part of his political bailiwick to day, with a view to the distribution of political patronage among his henchmen. The principal bone of contention was the Greencastle post-office, and how to reconcile the conflicting claims of the legion of aspirants puzzled the congressman. It is given out that Willis G. Neff, who held the position under the former Cleveland administration, has the promise of a reappointment, and that the claims of the young democracy will be subordinated to the demands of the court-house ring. Mr. Cooper was urged to submit the contest to a popular election, but turned a deaf ear to the appeals, and the curses visited upon him by the disappointed aspirants were both loud and deep.—Indianapolis Journal, January 7.

BLOOMINGTON.—Last week Congressman George W. Cooper was in our city looking after the patronage which will be at his disposal after March 4. He made his headquarters at the Stockwell House where a large number of friends were cordially received. Almost every position in the county, which will be controlled by Mr. Cooper, had more than one applicant, and consequently he was placed in the exceedingly embarrassing position of making a choice between personal friends and equally good democrats. The choicest position was the postmastership at this place and it was sought by the following named well known citizens: Dr. Peter Bowman, John W. Bnskirk, Edwin Corr, W. P. Dill, R. H. East and Dr. S. K. Rhorer. Friends of each candidate presented the claims of their favorite, and be it said to the credit of all concerned that the contest was conducted in an honorable and gentlemanly manner. We are not prepared to say what disposition will be made of the applications, and until Congressman Cooper makes a definite statement we will not venture an opinion.

Delegations were here from other places in the county asking official favors for friends and to all these Mr. Cooper gave respectful attention. He has taken all applications under consideration and hopes to make known his decision for the entire district before March 4. There are about two hundred postmasters in this district, and these together with other applications will require all his extra time between now and the date of inauguration.—The Bloomington World.

THE TERRE HAUTE OVERLORDSHIP.

"My mail these days is something appalling," said Senator Voorhees. "I have had experience before on the approach of an incoming administration, but nothing like this. I am doing the best I can with the aid of short-hand writers to answer everything without much delay, but I find the task impossible. I hope my friends in Indiana will be patient. Every letter received will be carefully noted and filed away for future reference and for consideration. No one shall be overlooked or neglected. My greatest regret is that there are so few offices to be given to so many worthy and capable applicants. It is a most painful duty, so far as I am concerned, to be compelled to decide between friends who are equally meritorious and capable."—Indianapolis News, December 13.

TERRE HAUTE.—The post-office fight at Terre Haute is between A. G. Austin, the hardware merchant, Robert Hunter, a liveryman, and Harry Donham, a young lawyer. The Sentinel correspondent is able to state that the latter will receive the appointment. Both of the other applicants are staunch democrats and well worthy in every way to receive this honor, but Mr. Donham's active services in the late campaign entitle him to this reward in the estimation of democrats who appreciate the value of Mr. Donham's services as chairman of the Vigo county democratic committee.—Washington Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, December 23.

TERRE HAUTE.—The Terre Haute postmastership is again to be a bone of contention. Two congressmen have been defeated for re-election by members of their respective parties on account of this office, and it looks as if Congressman Brookshire, the present congressman from this district, is to be the third victim. A few weeks ago Congressman Brookshire announced that he would leave the recommendation for postmaster entirely with Senator Voorhees. Under ordinary circumstances that would be sufficient excuse for the congressman's non-interference, but in this instance circumstances alter the case. A democrat whose name is familiar to all who have observed political affairs in this district, talking about the situation, said:

"I understand that Voorhees has said he will recommend the appointment of Harry Donham, and I suppose Donham will be appointed. The other applicants, and hundreds of democrats who are not applicants for office, would not object to Brookshire's action if they felt that the senator himself was the one who is to make the selection, but they know it would be waste of time for them to appeal to him unless John E. Lamb be on their side. Donham was Lamb's obedient henchman during the campaign.

Lamb and editor Ball, of the Gazette, have no liking for each other's political methods. The editor doesn't like bossism and Lamb doesn't like any one who bolts a 'regular' cut-and-dried programme. Ball was the steadfast Cleveland advocate here prior to the Chicago convention. As you know, he and Lamb had a bitter contest for delegate to the Chicago convention, Lamb capturing it, although 90 per cent. of the democrats in this district were for Cleveland. Lamb was recognized as an anti-Cleveland man, and did, in fact, lead the anti-Cleveland Indiana forces at Chicago after Senator Voorhees left the city in the midst of the struggle. For a year or more, until immediately after the election, it had been understood that Mr. Ball was to have the position of collector of internal revenue in the event of the election of a democrat to the presidency. Well, now comes in Mr. Lamb's master stroke. Without any delay it is made known, in a quiet way, to leading local democrats that Mr. Voorhees has decided to recommend Donham for postmaster. If Donham be made postmaster Mr. Ball can not be collector. Donham married Mr. Ball's sister not long ago, and it would not do for brothers-in-law to hold two big offices of the district."

Two of the other applicants for the post-office are Col. Bob Hunter, brother of Andy Hunter, elected congressman at large in Illinois, and Mr. A. G. Anstlin. The former is a carriage manufacturer and the latter a hardware dealer. Hunter was a member of the "Kickers' Club," or anti-Lamb organization, in 1886, when Lamb was defeated for congress. Mr. Anstlin is a good business man, but does not know much about political wire-pulling. He has reason to expect Senator Voorhees' aid, but, of course, he will be disappointed.

The impression here is that the Lamb faction has agreed upon Hoskins, of Clay county, for revenue collector. He was made chairman of the congressional committee by Lamb in a unique manner, early in the year. The ex-congressman was chairman of the convention, and, without assistance from the convention, so to speak, declared Hoskins the choice for the position, although the Parke county delegation had come instructed to vote for Dr. Gilum, of that county. But Lamb did it so smoothly that hardly any one realized how it had been done until after the convention had adjourned. Within the past few days the report has been circulated here that the Hon. Mason Niblack, of Vincennes, would be an applicant for the collectorship.—Indianapolis Journal, December 29.

The Washington dispatch to the Journal of yesterday, announcing that Senator Voorhees would recommend Harry Douham for postmaster is in accord with what was known here by the senator's friends before he went to Washington, and which was first made public in these dispatches. Since then Donham has proceeded upon the assumption that all yet to be done was the formality of placing Cleveland's signature on the commission. The more the local democracy, and especially that portion which espouses the claims of either of the other applicants, ponders over the cut-and-dried proceeding the greater becomes the resentment of what is termed bossism. The fact that the bosses are the ones who were bitterly opposed to the renomination of Mr. Cleveland and set up the primaries in this county, where 90 per cent. of the democrats were unequivocally for the renomination, so that an anti-Cleveland delegation was chosen, increases the feeling of indignation which is sure to result in an open revolt sooner or later. One of the reasons why it has not broken out before this has been the hope of the hungry to get some of the crumbs of office. Now that the hope of five hundred (more or less) has been shattered by the President's order there is more likelihood of the outbreak before the time for the appointment of a postmaster comes around.—Indianapolis Journal, January 8.

CHIEFS OF HIGH AND LOW DEGREE.

The democrats of Indianapolis have been notified from Washington that Congressman Bynum has decided to leave the selection of a postmaster for this city entirely with Senator Turpie. This announcement has been expected. It is related among democrats that, before he returned to Washington, Congressman Bynum said to some of his friends that he intended to escape all responsibility for the selection of an Indianapolis postmaster by turning the appointment over to Senator Turpie.—Indianapolis News, December 21.

Senator Turpie, who is at his home in this city spending the holidays, is besieged by office-seekers. The men who are after government positions go direct to the senator's residence, as he is remaining away from the hotel corridors where expectant democrats delight to congregate and lay in wait for men of influence. Among the callers on the senator today was W. D. H. Hunter, of Lawrenceburgh, who wants to be re-appointed collector of internal revenue for the southern district of Indiana. Dr. Hunter filled the office under Cleveland before, and he feels that he is entitled to it again. He requested that Senator Turpie say a good word for him to Mr. Cleveland. Another one of the callers the senator has received this week is D. F. Allen, of Frankfort, who is anxious to succeed Nicholas Ensley as United States pension agent for the district of Indiana. Captain Allen, like ex-Governor Gray, made a visit to Cleveland at Gray Gables, and he thinks his acquaintance with the President-elect, together with a few words from the Indiana senators, will secure him the office. Still another caller was Frank Griffith, of Muncie, who also wants to be collector of internal revenue in the southern Indiana district. John S. Williams, of Lafayette, has also paid the senator a visit since his arrival at home. Mr. Williams was fourth auditor of the treasury during Cleveland's former administration. He is anxious to go a step higher this time; he desires to be appointed third auditor of the treasury. During his stay at home Senator Turpie has also been furnished the names of the men who would like to be appointed United States attorney for Indiana. They are Judge Nelson, of Logansport; John W. Kern, John W. Holtzman, of Indianapolis; William A. Cullop, of Vincennes; Frank B. Burk, of Jeffersonville; W. O. Pickens, of Spencer, and C. E. Vohn, of Bluffton.—Indianapolis News, December 30.

FORT WAYNE.—It is learned from the best authority that on Monday Congressman McNagney, of Columbia City, will be in Fort Wayne and decide who shall be postmaster under the new administration. This will end a good deal of suspense and will probably be the cause of considerable ill-feeling. It is said Mr. McNagney will meet all the candidates and hear their respective claims. It will be decided probably some day next week, but the decision will not be known at the time. The most prominent candidates are William Meyer, proprietor of one of the leading furnishing stores; Wright Rockhill, proprietor of the Fort Wayne Journal; Prof. Ungemach, who is at the head of the Lutheran schools in this city; John B. Monning, a real estate agent; Dr. Samuel Metcalf and M. V. B. Spencer, a leading attorney.—Indianapolis Journal, January 8.

DELPHI.—Congressman-elect Hammond, of this district, is having a lively time with applicants for office, there being from one to a dozen candidates for every post-office in the district. R. M. Isherwood, editor of the democratic paper, and chairman of the county committee, is the most prominent aspirant, and it will be the field against Isherwood. The men composing the field are now circulating petitions praying Hammond to leave the settlement of the question to a vote of the democratic patrons of the office, and these petitions are being generally signed. Isherwood will oppose such an election, taking the broad and comprehensive ground that he has earned the place. His claims will be seconded by Charles R. Pollard, who was a delegate to the Chicago convention and an uncompromising Cleveland man.—Indianapolis Journal, December 31.

It is stated at democratic headquarters that Congressman-elect Conn, of the thirteenth district, has decided to escape all responsibility by having an election for every postmaster in the district. So far as can be learned the other congressmen from the state are pursuing the old course of receiving all the applications and recommendations that come in, and then appointing the man who seems to be the favorite in the community.—Indianapolis News, Dec. 21.

Congressman Jason B. Brown was in the city last evening. He came from Washington. Mr. Brown said that so far he had not been bothered by his constituents seeking office. "I have stated two or three times," he remarked, "that I would take no part in the struggle before Mr. Cleveland's inauguration. It would be hardly proper for me to do so, and my constituents know my position fully, I think, and I don't anticipate being troubled any."—Indianapolis Sentinel, December 23.

SALEM.—The unsettled condition that has existed here since the election of Cleveland as to who should be postmaster took a sudden turn to-day. While it is generally understood that Congressman Jason B. Brown is opposed to a primary by the people about all the candidates met to-day and entered into an agreement to hold a primary, and the chairman of the democratic county committee, who is also a candidate, issued a call for it to be held February 4.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 17.

KNIGHTSVILLE.—The democracy have a post-office fight on hand. The office is worth about $350 or $400 a year. Scott Inge, postmaster under Cleveland, is an aspirant for re-appointment. David Lawson, the man who controls 1,300 miners' votes, but was opposed to Congressman Brookshire, is also an aspirant. Benjamin Males and George Hoaglin are also pressing their claims. One prominent young man wants to be gauger at Terre Haute. John O'Neal, who is a warm friend of Brookshire, will try and have Mr. McQuade's position as mine inspector. H. C. Payne is also an aspirant for mine inspector. 'Squire Eckles says he will be satisfied with fish commissioner. Taken altogether the fight for office is going to be hotly contested.—Knightsville Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Nov. 22.

ELWOOD.—The post-office is a plum that many democrats are eager to pluck. Although the term of the present incumbent will not expire for over a year, petitions by different democratic aspirants are being circulated and generously signed. The first applicant in the field is France Harbit. He is widely known here, and is a ceaseless and untiring worker for democracy. He is at present a member of the city council, from the first ward. "Dock" Peed is also an aspirant. He is making no flourish of trumpets, but he wants the office as bad as anyone. James Parsons is also in the field. He is working like a trooper and the race between him and Harbit is being watched with interest. The claims set forth by Parsons are known only to those who are on the inside of several political contracts and compromises, which were enacted between the democrats last spring and fall. Parsons was a candidate for the nomination for sheriff. Dave de Hority of this city, was also an aspirant for the same nomination. Both are popular men. The race was warm, but as both were from Pike Creek township the chances of each were impaired. Something had to be done. It was decided among the leaders that the only way out of it was for Parsons to withdraw from the race. A prominent democrat said a committee waited on Mr. Parsons and he consented to withdraw, after receiving $100 from De Hority. The money was to pay the expenses already incurred by Parsons in his canvass. Besides this, it was understood (by Parsons at least) that, in case of a democratic victory, Parsons was to be indorsed for the post-office. The democratic victory came, and now Parsons demands his reward. At Anderson a number of prominent democrats signed an agreement to use their influence in securing the post-office for Parsons. This paper is said to be in possession of Mr. Parsons, and he will produce it in his claims. Leading democrats of Elwood gave a promise of a similar nature, but were wise enough not to do so in writing. Your correspondent's informant said that those who promised Parsons their assistance are falling to the rear. When the paper was presented to De Hority he refused to sign it, saying that he fulfilled his contract when he paid the $100.—Elwood Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, Nov. 29.

PORTLAND.—The Portland post-office is now the bone of contention among eligible democrats, and as Congressman Martin does not care to mix in the scramble, it is not unlikely that a city election will be held to determine a choice. Among the prominent candidates are W. W. Timmouds, editor of the Portland Sun; A. W. Evilsizer, justice of the peace; W. A. Humphries, chairman of the county central committee; S. T. McGovney, ex-member of the state legislature; L. S. Burkett, timber man; George F. Whittaker, ex-prosecutor, and S. A. D. Whipple, deputy clerk of the circuit court.—Indianapolis News.

GREENSBURG.—The democracy of this county openly declare that the republican office holders will not serve out their time, and this declaration is bringing out a new crop of office-seekers. Three new candidates have appeared for the post-office. S. F. Rogers, George Shoemaker and George Magee. Outside of Greensburg there are only six or eight paying post-offices in the county. At St. Paul the scramble is terrific. The candidates are Jeff. DeBolt, Daniel Dickey, ex-State Senator Howard, Luther Bailey and Benjamin Jenkins. The principal applicants at Adams are W. O. McKee, Robert Kirby, James Darby and John Turner. James Tarplee is booked for the office at Clarksburgh, and James S. Harper has the call at Sardinia. Sanford Grayson and Samuel Webster will contest at Westport. There is some talk here of having the choice of postmaster determined by popular election, and this is favored by those who consider themselves strong with the people but a little shaky with the appointing power.

ROCKPORT.—Mentioned for postmaster under Cleveland at this point are George Procrasky, the former incumbent, Henry Hoeh and Calvin Jones, ex-editor of the Rockport Democrat. C. N. Douglass, present editor of the Democrat, is an aspirant for a clerkship at Washington. A. E. Stevenson, formerly of the state committee, wants the position of judicial examiner, now held by Sam Kercheval, of this city. Allen Armstrong, who was the candidate for county clerk, stands a chance of entering the revenue service, and Hugh Haler, defeated candidate for sheriff, expects a position in the secret service.—Indianapolis News, December 7.

GREENSBURGH.—The democracy are preparing to boom Judge J. K. Ewing for collector of internal revenue. It is said that he will be supported by Congressmen Holman, Brown and Cooper, and the state officials. The Hon. William H. Bracken, formerly of this county, but now of Franklin, is also in the race. He was an elector-at large candidate, and made a strong canvass of the State. Bracken has congressional aspirations, and if disappointed in his present quest he may contest for the congressional nomination two years hence. Dr. Hunter, editor of the Lawrenceburgh Register, was collector under Cleveland before, and, it is said, is again aspiring. The Hon. Jacob Benham, of Ripley, is in training. He is a presidential elector. Other candidates for the collectorship are said to be Frank J. Hall, of Rushville, and Dan Manning, of Switzerland.—Indianapolis News.

NOBLESVILLE.—There seems to be no end to the list of applicants who will fight for the Cicero post-office. The number has already been increased to nearly a dozen. Among the prominent applicants are Samuel Dale, Grant Jacobs, Samuel Dunham, George Anthouy and J. S. Williamson.—Indianapolis Sentinel, December 21.

GREENFIELD.—Captain Osafah A. Curry, ex-county treasurer and chairman of the county democratic central committee, and a highly estimable and well-known citizen of this city, at the solicitation of many of our prominent business men and citizens, has announced his intentions of being a candidate for postmaster, and will begin a vigorous canvass at once.—Indianapolis Sentinel, December 13.

GREENTOWN.—After a wrangle over a choice for postmaster, the Greentown democrats concluded to ballot. L. C. Knight received 31 votes; Wm. Duncan, 29; T. H. Price and T. A. Scagraves, 15 each; J. B. Mazingo, 12; Chas. Hawberger, 8, and William Wooters, 7. Duncan is admitted to be the best qualified man for the place, and the result of the ballot has only increased the dissatisfaction.—Indianapolis News, December 13.

James Chapman has discontinued publication of the Review, at Converse. Mr. Chapman was a post-office candidate, but was defeated in a popular election. He complains of ill-treatment by the local democracy.—Indianapolis News.

PORTLAND.—James H. De Tray, of this city, is applicant for the position as minister to France under the next administration, and is circulating petitions to that effect. De Tray is a "Buckeye" by birth. He came to Portland in 1885. He is a fourth cousin of the famous General Lafayette, and at the time of the Yorktown celebration, in 1881, he was present by invitation from the secretary of state as the American representative of the Lafayette family.—Indianapolis News, December 17.

BEDFORD.—John Johnson, jr., is an applicant for the postmastership here, and it is stated that Congressman Bretz will probably see that he gets it.—Indianapolis Sentinel, December 18.

RICHMOND.—The candidates for the Dublin post-office held a caucus Monday night to determine upon a plan for the selection of a postmaster. They determined upon an election to be held January 21. All known democrats who voted for Grover Cleveland will be entitled to vote at that time. The following persons are candidates: Ira Ellis, Mrs. Sarah J. Roberts, W. B. Smith, Dr. J. R. Hollingsworth, G. W. Steffy, Tolbert More and Thomas Kemmer.—Indianapolis Sentinel, January 7.

LEBANON.—The question of Lebanon's next postmaster seemed to be a difficult one a few weeks ago, when there were as many as half a dozen aspirants, but now it seems narrowed down to a single person Henry C. Ulin, secretary of the county central committee, is circulating a petition which is being generally signed, and from the present outlook Mr. Ulin has almost a clear field.—Indianapolis News.

WABASH.—The post-office fight here is becoming decidedly interesting. A month ago less than a half dozen candidates wanted the place, but now there are seventeen. The contest is growing somewhat personal in its character, and so fearful are the democratic local managers that there will serious party trouble grow out of the scramble that an election has virtually been decided upon as a solution of the controversy. All but two or three aspirants have signed the compact, and the primary will take place February 14. The candidates are: Dr. M. R. Crabbill, John Katchem, Jonathan Haas, James Early, E. A. Edwards, James Jackson, Sam Junfee, H. H. Milllean, W. J. Alber, Frank Alber, Simon Swartz, John Hoover, Valentine Smith, William Collus, James V. Simpson, Ed Kinerk and John Hipskins. The commission of Postmaster Wood does not expire until December 10, 1895, and it is not expected there will be a change short of a year or two, as Mr. Wood is competent and in no sense an "offensive partisan."—Indianapolis News, January 18.

THE WORST CASE YET.

The report of Commissioner Roosevelt to the United States Civil Service Commission on the investigation of a peculiar political assessment case in Indianapolis, has just been given to the press. The facts ascertained from the witnesses examined point to a special variety of offense differing from any other that has yet come to the public notice.

It appears that the democratic campaign committee in Indianapolis found itself, at the close of the late campaign, several thousand dollars in arrears. The committee had its headquarters in the rooms of the Hendricks club, to which some of its members belonged. County Treasurer Backus, a prominent committeeman, spoke to C. J. Dunn, a letter-carrier, of the shortage, and suggested, apparently as a conclusion of the committee, that the democratic employes in the post-office—the so-called "hold-overs" under the present administration—ought to make up about four hundred dollars as their share of it. Mr. Backus further notified Dunn to request various employes to come to a meeting at the club "to see what they felt like doing."

Accordingly the invitations were distributed, mostly by Dunn, it being understood that the meeting was partly for the purpose of raising funds; partly with the idea that the employes should press one of their number, Mr. Lorenz, for superintendent of carriers under the incoming administration; and partly in order to meet a Mr. Sahn, who, according to the common talk among "the boys," had been decided upon as the next postmaster. Mr. Lorenz himself, also, seems to have been instrumental in inducing the carriers to attend the meeting.

Alexander McNutt testified that Dunn told him of the straits of the committee and asked "if we could reach in our pockets and help them out;" that Dunn approached him in regard to making a donation to make up the deficiency, the request being made in the letter-carriers' office, but no specific amount being named, although it appeared as if about ten dollars apiece was expected. McNutt said that he did not contribute, and that he and Dunn had not been on good terms since.

W. A. Balk, a letter-carrier, testified that Dunn asked him, in the carriers' room, for a contribution to a campaign fund.

R. O. Shriner testified that Dunn said to him: "The committee is short some money and we want to know if you can't help to make it up," or something to this effect.

Jacob Mathias testified that Dunn asked him to come down to the Hendricks club, saying that there was a shortage in the democratic campaign fund, and that he was authorized to notify "the boys"—meaning the democratic carriers in office—that they had to raise some money.

William Darby testified that Dunn said to him, in the street, that the committee would require ten or fifteen dollars apiece from "the boys," and invited him to attend the meeting at the Hendricks club.

F. A. Lorenz testified that Dunn told him, in the street, that the committee was short and wanted the democrats in the post-office to help it out, adding: "What will you do?" or "Will you do anything?" or "Can you do anything?" and stating that he expected the democratic carriers to contribute four hundred dollars.

C. W. Parish testified that Dunn mentioned to him the committee's need of money; told him to go to the Hendricks club on a certain date, and asked for a contribution, as it was desired to raise about four hundred dollars from office-holders. Parish refused to give anything.

W. P. Marlatt testified that Dunn told him, in effect, that the democratic committee would be glad to receive any contributions any one desired to give to make up the shortage.

Dunn's sole defense was a lack of memory. He did not remember speaking about the finances when he invited "the boys" to the Hendricks club, but afterwards admitted that he "might have told one or two that there was a shortage."
